

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. DECIDED IN THE ## Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

The Western Union Telegraph Company v. The City of Richmond.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Interstate Commerce—Foreign Insurance Companies—Taxation.*—The council of the city of Richmond has authority, under the charter of the city, to impose a license tax upon a foreign telegraph company having an agency in the city and doing business therein. And there is nothing in the constitutions and laws of the state or of the United States which forbids such a tax, if it is equal and just in its provisions.

2. City Ordinance—Construction.—Though the ordinance of the city imposing taxes speaks only of persons or firms doing business in the city, yet it imposes a tax in terms on telegraph companies, and obviously intends to include incorporated companies as well as individuals.

3. Same—Corporations—When Deemed "Persons."†—Corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in a statute.

2    *4. Federal Agencies—State Power to Tax.—For a thorough and exhaustive investigation of the power of a state, and its limitations, to tax agencies of the United States government, see the opinion of STAPLES, J.

5. Same—Same—Power of Congress to Exempt.—Corporations which derive their existence and exercise their franchises under authority of state laws, but are employed by the national government for certain duties and services, whilst Congress may exempt them from any state taxation which will really prevent or impede such services, yet in the absence of legislation by Congress to indicate that exemption is deemed essential to the performance of governmental services, it cannot be claimed on the mere ground that the corporation is employed as an agency of the government. And the tax may be either upon the property or business of the corporation.

6. Same—Same—Distinction.—The cases recognize a distinction between taxation of the property belonging to a private corporation employed by the government, and taxation of the instrumentalities or means of the government in the possession of such corporations. The state may tax a banking institution; but it cannot tax the currency or the government's bonds belonging to such bank. It may tax the railroad, but not the mail or the munitions or other property of the government. It may tax the contractor with the government, though not the contract.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, brought in May 1873, by the Western Union Telegraph Company against the city of Richmond, to recover the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, the amount of a license tax which the company had been compelled to pay to the city of Richmond. The only questions in the cause were, whether the company could be subjected to pay a license tax to the city under the laws and constitutions of the state of Virginia and of the United States, and whether corporations were included in the terms of the city ordinance.

The Western Union Telegraph Company is a corporation chartered by the legislature of the state of New York, and has an office and transacts business in the city of Richmond. The ordinance of the city classified telegraph companies and this company was placed in the third class, and the tax on the companies *in this class was fixed by the ordinance *Telegraph Companies—Interstate Commerce.—In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Seay, 182 U. S. 472, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, the court held that telegraph companies which have accepted the provisions of Rev. St. U. S. sections 5263-5268, cannot be taxed by the authorities of a state for any messages or receipts arising therefrom, from points within the state to points without the state and vice versa, as this is interstate commerce, but may be so taxed or messages carried wholly within the state.

†Corporations—When Deemed to Be Persons.—In Lynchburg v. Railroad Company, 80 Va. 237, it was held that a section of the charter of the city of Lynchburg which grants authority to impose a license tax upon persons engaged in certain enumerated callings, and "upon any other person or employment, which it may deem proper, whether such person or employment be herein specially enumerated or not" does not empower the city to impose such tax upon a railroad corporation, which is neither a person or employment within the ordinary acceptance of these words. The decision is based on the rule of ejusdem generis. In support of the rule that corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons, see Stribbling v. The Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 180; Railroad Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Gratt. 663; U. S. Bank v. Merchants' Bank of Baltimore, 1 Rob. 573. In Miller v. Com., 27 Gratt. 110, it was held that corporations are included under the term "persons" unless they are exempted by its terms, or by the nature of the subject to which the statute relates. See Crafford v. Supervisors of Warwick County, 87 Va. 116, and cases cited. In that case, act of March 2, 1888 (Acts 1887-88, p. 405) providing that the judge of the county court should, upon the application of persons paying one-third of the taxes on real estate in the county of Warwick, order a poll to be opened to ascertain the sense of the qualified voters as to whether or not the site of the courthouse should be changed, was continued and it was held that the word "persons" used in the act, included corporations.

at one hundred and twenty-five dollars. This tax the agent of the company refused to pay, until the property of the company was levied on by the officer, when he paid it under protest. The case was submitted to the decision of the judge without a jury, and he rendered a judgment in favor of the city. And thereupon the company applied to this court for a writ of error; which was awarded. The laws and ordinances, as well as the facts, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of Staples, J.

F. L. Smith, for the appellant.

1. There is no mode provided in the ordinance whereby the proper classification of chartered companies could be ascertained; and the placing said telegraph company in the third class for taxation, and subjecting said company to a tax of $125, was wholly unauthorized by the said ordinance or any law whatsoever, state or municipal.

There is no law which authorizes the city of Richmond, by its ordinance, to declare that the word "person" or "firm" should embrace bodies politic or corporate.

2. That the statute of the state of Virginia in relation to commissioners and collectors of the public revenue for the year 1872 provides that but one license shall be required of a telegraph company; and that, upon the issuing of which license, messages and communications may be transmitted through any county or corporation in the state.

That the city of Richmond a municipal corporation, deriving its powers from the legislature, has no power, in violation of this exclusive grant, to require 4 another *license and superadd another tax upon the business of the said telegraph company.

3. That the action of the corporate authorities of the city of Richmond, in requiring a license from the Western Union Telegraph Company, and imposing a tax thereon, is in violation of the third clause of section eight of article one of the constitution of the United States, which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states.

The agreed facts, stated in the record, show that the messages sent by this company often pass through many states; and, beyond all doubt, such communications constitute, within the meaning of the constitution, commerce or intercourse.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. R. 189, Chief Justice Marshall said: "Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more, it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse."

So in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 371, 379, Judge Washington says: "Commerce with foreign nations and among the several states can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those states for the purpose of trade, be the object of trade what it may; and thus intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by free navigation of the waters of the several states, or by a passage overland through the states, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the states."

In State of Pennsylvania v. The Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Company, 18 How. U. S. R. 431, Nelson, J., said: "The regulation of commerce includes intercourse and navigation."

5 In Crandall v. State of Nevada, 6 Wall. U. S. R. 35, *the Supreme court of the United States unanimously declared a statute of Nevada unconstitutional which imposed a tax on every passenger leaving the state.

So in Minot v. The Phila. Wilm. & Balt. R. R. Co., 2 Abbott's U. S. R. 324, it is decided that a tax imposed under a statute of the state of Delaware on the use of locomotives and cars on railroads in that state was unconstitutional, so far as it applied to locomotives and cars used in commerce between the states. That the transportation of persons or property through a state is beyond its power of taxation, under the commercial clause of the constitution of the United States.

In the case of The Western Union Telegraph Co. v. The Atlantic and Pacific States Telegraph Co., 5 Nevada R. 102, the act of Congress, approved July 24th, 1866, entitled "an act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes," came under review before the Supreme court of Nevada. The question was directly raised, whether telegraph communication between the states was a part of commercial intercourse within the jurisdiction of Congress, under the commercial clause of the constitution of the United States and the court held that it is. They say: "Is telegraphy any branch of commercial intercourse? To ask the question is to answer it. So interwoven has the custom of communication by telegraph become with trade and traffic, that to separate it, without serious disturbance of vast trade relations and financial transactions, would be a task as difficult as to cut the pound of flesh without a drop of blood. It is the life and soul of civilized commercial transactions: many of the most important are daily ruled by telegraph. The banker, the merchant, the farmer, the broker, all traders, depend upon the telegraph for 6 *speedy information and means of intercourse in their various business and traffic. If the ship that carries the cargo comes within the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce, as it confessedly does, as a means of commercial intercourse, certainly the instrumentality through which is directed the lading, sailing and unlading of the ship, the purchase and sale of the cargo, and all the minutiae of the venture and the voyage, is equally a means, only of a higher and more advanced grade."

The decisions of the Supreme court of the United States, which review the power of Congress on this subject, are fully examined by the court in that case.

We beg leave also to refer to the cases of Brown v. The State of Maryland, 12 Wheat. R. 419, 429; and the Passenger Cases, 7 How. U. S. R. 283.

In the case of The Phila. & Reading R. R. Co. v. The Commonwealth of Penn., recently decided by the Supreme court of the United States, and not yet reported, the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several states is fully considered. The court held that a tax imposed under an act of the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania of August 25, 1864, on articles carried through the state, or articles taken up in the state and carried out of it, or articles taken up without the state and brought into it, is unconstitutional and void.

Waves of electricity are quite as fully subjects of exclusive dominion and property as any other external thing.

The wire of a telegraph line is nothing but a way, a means of passage; and the thing passing is not the less property because it is one of the imponderable elements.

“There is no distinction in principle between electric *fluid conveyed through a parish, and water conveyed through a parish.” Alderson, J., Electric Tel. Co. v. Overseers of Poor of Salford, 24 L. J. Ex. 151-’2, new series, p. 324. It has repeatedly been ruled by the Supreme court of the United States that no state can tax either persons or property passing through it. It is an interference with interstate communication and intercourse, which is declared illegal. If this be true, then by what authority can the state of Virginia, and still less a municipal corporation created by its legislature, lay a tax on a license for sending telegraphic messages through the state, or out of the state into other states?

The power of taxation condemned in the Pennsylvania case above cited does not, in principle, differ from that exercised by the city of Richmond in imposing a license tax on the Western Union Telegraph Company. If Virginia can tax a telegraphic communication passing through it from other states, however distant, why may not such other states do the same thing, and thereby break down the whole system of telegraphic communication by onerous taxation.

By the statement of facts set out in the record, the Western Union Telegraph Company is one of the important agencies of the Federal government in the management and conduct of its various departments and national affairs; and, as such, no state or municipal corporation has a right to impose a license tax upon it, whereby the operations of the government may, at least to the extent of the usefulness of this instrumentality, be obstructed and impaired. We would refer on this question to the following authorities: Cooley Const. Lim. ch. 14, pp. 480-’1,-’2; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. R. 316, in which the court held that the law of Maryland imposing a tax *on the Bank of the United States was unconstitutional. In the unanimous opinion delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, he says: “The result is a conviction that the states have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government. This is, we think, the unavoidable consequence of that supremacy which the constitution has declared.” Weston v. Charleston, 2 Peters. R. 449, in which the court (Judge Marshall again delivering the opinion) say that a tax on stock of the United States, held by an individual citizen of a state, is a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and cannot be levied by or under the authority of a state consistently with the constitution. Bank Tax Case, 2 Wall. U. S. R. 200. A tax laid by a state on banks, “on a valuation equal to the amount of their capital stock paid in, or secured to be paid in,” is a tax on the property of the institution; and when that property consists of stocks of the Federal government, the law laying the tax is void. Bank of Commerce v. New York City, 2 Black’s R. 620; The Banks v. The Mayor, 7 Wall. U. S. R. 16; Bank v. Supervisors, 7 Wall. U. S. R. 26; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. R. 419; Osborn v. Bank United States, 9 Wheat. R. 738-859; Dobbins v. Commissioners Erie County, 16 Peters. R. 435.

The learned counsel for the appellee refers to the case of Railroad Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. U. S. R. 5. In that case most of the authorities bearing on this question are cited, and the distinction is there broadly drawn between a tax on property and a tax on the business and operations of a corporation—the former being held liable to taxation, but the latter not so liable.

I *ask the special attention of the court to that case. At page 35, the court expressly decide that a tax on the operations of an instrument employed by the general government to carry its powers into execution is unconstitutional. The court say (page 36): “This distinction, so clearly drawn in the earlier decisions, between a tax on the property of a government agent and a tax on the action of such agent, or upon his right to be, has ever since been recognized;” and such continues the distinction to the present time.

The appellant objects that the tax complained of was unauthorized by any law whatsoever, state or municipal; that the city of Richmond, acting under delegated authority, exceeded their authority in the imposition of this tax; that by the use of the words “person” or “firm” the ordinance did not include a body corporate, such as the Western Union Telegraph Company; and that the statute of the state of Virginia by implication forbids taxation on the part of the city.

The legislature of Virginia, by its act providing a charter for the city of Richmond (Sess. Acts 1869-'70, p. 138, § 70), expressly grants to the municipal authority power to "grant or refuse licenses," and to "require taxes to be paid on such licenses to agents of insurance companies (and several other specified employments), to commission merchants, and all other business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system under the preceding section." The preceding section provides for taxation of property by assessment. We submit that the business of the Western Union Telegraph Company comes fairly under the head last mentioned.

10 * "A corporation is a political person, capable, like a natural person, of enjoying a variety of franchises." 1 Kyd. 15. "The construction is that when 'persons' are mentioned in a statute, corporations are included, if they fall within the reason and design of the statute." Angel & Ames on Corporations, p. 3, § 6. "A corporation has been held to be included in the term 'individual' in a tax law." Otis &c. v. Ware, 8 Gray R. 509. In an important Virginia case it is settled that when the word "person" is used in a statute, corporations, as well as natural persons, are included for civil purposes. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Gallahue's adm'rs, 12 Gratt. 655. It will hardly be questioned that corporations "fall within the reason and design" of the ordinance, when it is observed that the section containing the words objected to, viz., "person and firm," refers by the number of the section to "express companies and telegraph companies."

In regard to the assertion that the right of the city of Richmond to tax the Telegraph Company is taken away by the statute for the assessment of taxes, licenses, &c., for the year 1872 (Sess. Acts 1871-'2, p. 194, § 143), the appellee contends that the words of the statute refer only to the commonwealth's revenue, and that, in securing this to herself, she does not intend to deprive the city of Richmond of its reasonable income. There are no words to inhibit the city from the exercise of its chartered right. The words, "one license for the same company shall be sufficient," are explained by the remainder of the clause, "and this section shall not be construed to require a license for each office of the same company." It merely declares that the company, as a whole, and not each office for itself, shall obtain from the state authority a 11 *license, subject to the conditions prescribed. Taking this whole section together, and applying to it the just rules of interpretation, its true intent and meaning will be seen to be that the incorporated company, having complied with the statutory regulations, is discharged from further requirements and demands on the part of the state. Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, 23 Gratt. 464; Gilkeson v. Frederick Justices, 13 Gratt. 577; Orange & Alex. R. R. Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

The appellant further objects that the tax imposed by the city is unconstitutional, because it violates that clause of the constitution of the United States which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states. It is asserted that telegraphic messages are a most important element of commercial intercourse between the states, of which Congress has exclusive control. This objection is well answered by the Supreme court in its decision of the case of Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 168.

In that case the state of Virginia required of a foreign insurance company, not only to pay a license tax, but to make a large deposit of bonds, as a condition precedent to carrying on its business within its territory: these requirements, it was contended, were unconstitutional, because the issuance of policies of insurance was a commercial transaction, the parties being domiciled in different states, and that the legislation in question was a regulation of commerce. But the court held otherwise; and in replying to the argument in support of the appellant's view, it was said, that such "policies are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent 12 *of the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one state to another and then put up for sale."

There is much else in the opinion delivered in that case deserving of attention here, but we content ourselves with the brief citation we have made.

The appellee respectfully insists that the communications transmitted across the electric wires are no more articles of commerce, in the view taken above, than are contracts of insurance made by companies chartered in one state with citizens of another. "In Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. U. S. R. 73, the court held that a law of that state imposing a tax on money and exchange brokers, who dealt entirely in the purchase and sale of foreign bills of exchange, was not in conflict with the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce. The individual thus using his money and credit, said the court, 'is not engaged in commerce, but in supplying an instrument of commerce. He is less connected with it than the ship builder, without whose labor foreign commerce could not be carried on.' And the opinion shows that although instruments of commerce, they are the subjects of state regulation, and, inferentially, that they may be subjects of direct state taxation."

Instruments of commerce, then, are the subjects of state taxation. It will hardly be claimed that the electric telegraph is more than an instrument of commerce.

Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia, 12 How. U. S. R. 299, 319; License Cases, 5 Id. 504, and therein opinion of Taney, C. J., (explaining Gibbons v. Ogden) p. 581; Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Peters. R. 245, 251. In the li-

13 cense cases it was decided that the grant of a general authority to regulate *commerce is not, therefore, a prohibition to the states to make any regulations concerning it within their own territorial limits, not in conflict with an act of Congress. A state statute on this subject is valid, unless in opposition to an act of Congress repugnant to it, passed in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. "The act (of the state) is not in violation of this power in its dormant state." 2 Peters. R. 252.

In the Passenger Cases, 7 How. U. S. R. 283, cited by the appellants, Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, adverse to the authority of the state in that case, uses these words: "A state cannot regulate foreign commerce, but it may do many things which more or less affect it. It may tax a ship or other vessel used in commerce, the same as other property owned by citizens. A state may tax the stages in which the mail is transported; but this does not regulate the conveyance of the mail any more than taxing a ship regulates commerce. And yet, in both instances, the tax on the property in some degree affects its use." From the decision of the court dissent Taney, C. J., and Justices Daniel and Woodbury. See opinion of Chief Justice, pp. 470 and 480.

The case of Brown v. Maryland was a direct tax on imports (vide p. 448 of 12 Wheaton). And see Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 123, and opinion of court concerning Brown v. Maryland.

Osborn v. Mobile, 16 Wall. U. S. R. 479. In this case the question was whether an ordinance, in requiring payment for a license to transact in Mobile a business extending beyond the limits of the state of Alabama, was repugnant to the provision of the constitution vesting in Congress the power "to regulate commerce between the several states."

14 Osborn, agent of an express company chartered by *the state of Georgia, was fined for conducting his business without a license in Mobile. The Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, decided that the ordinance was constitutional. The whole of his brief and forcible opinion bears upon the present case.

A statute of Maryland required all traders resident within the state to take out licenses and to pay therefor certain sums from $12 to $150, according to a certain scale. The statute also required from all persons who were not permanent residents of the state, offering for sale any goods or merchandise not manufactured in Maryland, an annual license, for which $300 was to be paid. Held (Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. U. S. R. 418), that the statute imposed a discriminating tax upon non-resident traders, and that it was pro tanto repugnant to the Federal constitution and void. Mr. Justice Clifford, giving the unanimous opinion of the court, says: "Possessing, as the states do, the power to tax for the support of their own governments, it follows that they may enact reasonable regulations to provide for the collection of taxes levied for that purpose, not inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce, nor repugnant to the laws passed by Congress upon the same subject. Reasonable regulations for the collection of such taxes may be passed by the states, whether the property taxed belongs to residents or non-residents; and in the absence of any congressional legislation on the same subject, no doubt is entertained that such regulations, if not in any way discriminating against the citizens of other states, may be upheld as valid."

The appellant further alleges that the Western Union Telegraph Company is one of the important agencies of the Federal government, and, as such, that no state or municipal corporation has a right to 15 *impose a tax upon it, whereby it is said the operations of the government may be obstructed or impaired. On this point they refer to Cooley on Const. Limitations, and McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. R. 316. The discussion in the former work is based upon the latter case. It was there decided that the State of Maryland could not tax the Bank of the United States, a creation of the Federal government, and its particular agent and servant, such as the mail, the mint, patent rights, and other similar federal creations, which the chief justice enumerates as belonging to the same class. "The sovereignty of a state extends to everything which exists by its own authority, or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by congress, to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think it demonstrable that it does not." The rest of his opinion clearly shows that, by "those means employed by congress," the chief justice refers to the governmental creations to which we have alluded. In the Bank Tax case, 2 Wall. U. S. R. 200, the capital consisted of stocks of the Federal government, and the decision in McCulloch v. Maryland applied.

These views are further maintained in the case of National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 353, and especially to the opinion of the court, pp. 361-2. Directly to the point is the case of Thomson v. Pacific Railroad, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 579. In this latter case, the chief justice, in the opinion of the court, says: "We are not aware of any case in which the real estate, or other property of a corporation not organized under an act of congress, has been held to be exempt in the absence of express legislation to that effect, to just contribution,

16 in common with other property, to the *general expenditure for the common benefit, because of the employment of the corporation in the service of the government. It is true that some of the reasoning in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland seems to favor the broader doctrine. But the decision itself is limited to the case of the bank, as a corporation created by a law of the United States, and responsible, in the use of its franchises, to the government of the United States." "We do not think ourselves warranted therefore in extending the exemption established by the case of McCulloch v. Maryland beyond its terms. We cannot apply it to the case of a corporation deriving its existence from state law, exercising its franchise under state law, and holding its property within state jurisdiction and under state protection."

In Railroad Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. U. S. R. 5, a question arose whether a railroad company chartered and aided by congress, partly controlled by the government and subject to its future regulations, the charter of the company conditioned that if the terms are not complied with, or the loans not paid, the road shall come under the control and management of congress, and subject moreover to the use of the government at all times for transmission of mails, dispatches, troops, stores, &c., was subject to state taxation. It was decided to be so subject.

"There are," says the court in its opinion, "we admit, certain subjects of taxation which are withdrawn from the power of the states, not by any direct or express provision of the federal constitution, but by what may be regarded as its necessary implications. They grow out of our complex system of government, and out of the fact that the authority of the national government is legitimately exercised within the states. While it is true that govern-

17 ment cannot exercise its *power of taxation so as to destroy the state governments, or embarrass their lawful action, it is equally true that the states may not levy taxes, the direct effect of which shall be to hinder the exercise of any powers which belong to the national government. The constitution contemplates that none of those powers may be restrained by state legislation. But it is often a difficult question, whether a tax imposed by a state, does, in fact, invade the domain of the general government, or interfere with its operations to such an extent, or in such a manner, as to render it unwarranted. It cannot be that a state tax, which remotely affects the efficient exercise of a federal power, is for that reason alone inhibited by the constitution. To hold that, would be to deny to the states all power to tax persons or property. Every tax levied by a state withdraws from the reach of federal taxation a portion of the property from which it is taken, and to that extent diminishes the subject upon which federal taxes may be laid. The states are, and they ever must be, co-existent with the national government. Neither may destroy the other. Hence the Federal constitution must receive a practical construction. Its limitations and its implied prohibitions must not be extended so far as to destroy the necessary powers of the states, or prevent their efficient exercise." He then considers the case of Thomson v. Pacific Railroad. "It may therefore be considered as settled, that no constitutional implications prohibit a state tax upon the property of an agent of the government, merely because it is the property of such an agent. A contrary doctrine would greatly embarrass the states in the collection of their necessary revenue, without any corresponding advantage to the United States. A very large proportion of the property within the 18 states is employed *in execution of the powers of government. It belongs to governmental agents, and it is not only used, but it is necessary for their agencies. United States mails, troops and munitions of war are carried upon almost every railroad. Telegraph lines are employed in the national service. So are steamboats, horses, stage coaches, foundries, ship yards, and multitudes of manufacturing establishments. They are the property of natural persons, or of corporations, who are instruments or agents of the general government, and they are the hands by which the objects of the government are attained. Were they exempt from liability to contribute to the revenue of the states, it is manifest that the state governments would be paralyzed." He then refers to the cases relied on by the complainants in the case before him, and by the appellants in the present case, viz: McCulloch v. Maryland, and Osborn v. Bank of U. S. In the former of these cases the tax "was not upon any property of the bank, but upon one of its operations; in fact, upon its right to exist as created. It was a direct impediment in the way of a governmental operation performed through the bank as an agent." "In Osborn v. The Bank, the tax held unconstitutional, was a tax upon the existence of the bank, upon its right to transact business within the State of Ohio. It was, as it was intended to be, a direct impediment in the way of those acts which congress for national purposes had authorized the bank to perform."

This last decision of the Supreme court, to our apprehension, is absolutely conclusive of all controversy upon the questions raised in the case at bar.

If a private corporation, created by the laws of another state, for individual gain, unable to come into our midst and carry on its business, except by permission 19 *of the laws of Virginia, is not subject to the taxing power of the commonwealth and its governmental agencies, because, forsooth, this corporation is a contractor with the Federal government, it would be difficult to say what persons or property are legitimate subjects of taxation. This monstrous proposition is, as we have seen, unsupported by authority, and is plainly repugnant to reason and justice. If maintained, it consummates the overthrow of all that is left of state government.

Staples, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The charter of the city of Richmond authorizes the city council to raise annually, by taxes and assessments, such sums of money as they shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of the same," and in such manner as they shall deem expedient, in accordance with the laws of the state and of the United States.

In the execution of the powers thus confided to them, the city council may grant licenses or refuse them. They may require taxes to be paid on such licenses to agents of insurance companies, and all business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system. Acts of 1869-'70, page 138, secs. 69 and 70. In the case of Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, 23 Gratt. 464, this court construed these provisions as conferring upon the city council the general power of taxation, except only as it may be limited by the laws of the state or of the United States, and including all persons and subjects of taxation. It was also further held, that the mode of assessment adopted by the city council with reference to attorneys at law was sustained by the charter and by the constitution.

The plan adopted by the city council
20 in assessing *telegraph companies is substantially the same as that pursued with reference to attorneys at law. They are divided into four classes, and required to pay a license tax graduated by the character of the business done by the company. The plaintiffs are placed in the third class, and are subjected to a license tax of one hundred and twenty-five dollars. The authority of the city council in the premises, and the validity of the assessment, must therefore be considered as adjudicated and settled by the decision of this court. It is said, however, that the ordinance of the city only applies to "persons or firms," and not to chartered companies. It is very true that the twelfth section speaks of "persons or firms" only, but the eighth section expressly mentions "telegraph companies;" and it is very clear it was the intention to include all telegraph companies, whether incorporated or not. The sections construed together plainly show that, in using the words "persons or firms" in the city ordinance, the council designed to embrace chartered companies as well as individuals. And this is sanctioned by practice and the decisions of the courts. In Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Gallahue's adm'r, 12 Gratt. 655, 663, Judge Allen said: "Corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons, when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in a statute. * * *"

Another ground taken by the plaintiffs is, that the act of March 15, 1872, provides that but one license shall be required of a telegraph company, upon the issuing of which, the company's messages may be transmitted through any county or corporation of the state; and that the city of Richmond has no power, in violation of this exclusive grant, to require another license and impose another tax upon the business of the company.

21 *It is very clear, however, that the act of March 15th, 1872, refers only to state taxation and revenue. The object of that act was, no doubt, to relieve telegraph companies from the payment of a tax for each office and place of business, and to authorize the transmission of messages throughout the state under one license, and upon the payment of a single tax. It was not intended to interfere with municipal corporations in the exercise of powers of taxation conferred by their charters, or to strip them of valuable revenues derived from companies and individuals carrying on business within the corporate limits, and under the protection of the corporate government. This subject was fully considered in the case of Humphreys &c. v. Norfolk City, decided by this court at the spring term 1874; and to that case reference is made. 25 Gratt. 97.

For these reasons the tax in this case must be held to be valid, so far as the constitution and laws of the state are involved.

The only question remaining for consideration is, whether the tax is in violation of any provision of the constitution of the United States, or of any rights and privileges conferred upon plaintiffs by act of congress.

It is insisted that the action of the city council in requiring the license, is repugnant to that clause of the constitution of the United States which gives to congress the power to regulate commerce among the states.

The argument of the learned counsel upon this point briefly stated is, that commerce is not merely traffic; it is something more, it is intercourse; and intercourse includes all the means by which commerce is carried on among the several states: that telegraph communication is an important branch of commercial intercourse; and if Vir-
22 ginia may impose a tax upon *those companies, so may every other state penetrated by their lines; and thus the whole system of telegraph communication may be destroyed by oppressive burdens in the form of taxation.

This proposition applies as well to states as to municipalities; and if the power of taxation is denied in one case it is in the other. The question is therefore a grave one, as well by reason of the principle as the amount involved.

The power of taxation, as universally conceded, is inherent in every sovereignty, and no constitutional government can exist without it. It extends to every person, to every trade and occupation, and every species of property. It is as essential to the states as to the Federal government. If it is important that the agencies of the Federal government shall be excepted from the taxing power of the states, it is equally necessary that those of the latter shall be maintained in undiminished force and vigor. In Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. U. S. R. 479, 481, Chief Justice Chase said: "It is as important to leave the rightful powers of taxation unimpaired in the states as to maintain the powers of the Federal government in their integrity." The difficulty of drawing the line between the commercial power of the Union and the taxing power of the states is universally conceded. Clearly no law of the states, much less the exercise of this taxing power, ought to be declared invalid upon any mere speculative, indirect and contingent ground. The repugnancy to the constitution of the United States ought to be immediate, direct, and beyond all question.

If we assume that commerce means intercourse, as it clearly does, and that intercourse includes all the instrumentalities by which commerce is carried on 23 *between the states, there is scarce an avocation in the state engaged in foreign trade and traffic which may not be brought within the influence of the constitutional inhibition. It will be conceded that a state may tax a ship of one of its citizens engaged in the transportation of foreign merchandise, or passengers to and from the state; although it cannot tax the passengers or the merchandise. The reason is, that the ship is not commerce, but a mere instrument of commerce. Hays v. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co., 17 How. U. S. R. 596.

And so it has been held, that a license tax upon persons engaged in buying and selling foreign bills of exchange is not repugnant to the constitution of the United States. Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. U. S. R. 79. Such persons are not engaged in commerce, but simply in supplying an instrument of commerce. The court say "they are less connected with it than the ship-builder, without whose labor foreign commerce cannot be carried on; and yet the business of ship building may be taxed as the exercise of any other mechanical art. No one can claim an exemption from a general tax on his business within the state on the ground that the products sold may be used in commerce." In Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 168, it was decided that the issuing of a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce within the meaning of the constitution, though the parties be domiciled in different states. The court say these contracts are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market, as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one state to another, and then put up for sale.

24 *The learned counsel for the plaintiffs cites the case of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. U. S. R. 35, in which the Supreme court held a statute of Nevada unconstitutional which imposed a tax upon every passenger leaving the state. This, however, was not upon the ground that such a tax is "a regulation of commerce, or even repugnant to any express provision of the constitution, but upon the broad principle that the Federal government had the right to call to the capital of the Union any and all of its citizens to aid in the military or civil service of the country; and every citizen from the most remote states or territories is entitled to free access to all the great departments of the government, executive, legislative and judicial; and this right cannot be made dependent upon the pleasure of a state over whose territory they must pass in the exercise of such right. And if the principle should be admitted at all, it might be carried to the extent of an entire prohibition." An attempt was made by the counsel, who argued the case, to show that the tax was upon the business of the carrier who transports the passengers, graduated by the amount of the business done. The court say, however, it was plainly a tax upon the passenger, and the officers and agents of the companies were mere collectors of the tax. It was this feature, and this alone, which rendered the tax inconsistent with the rights belonging to citizens of the different states, and with the objects the Union was intended to attain.

The case of "State Freight Tax," 15 Wall. U. S. R. 285, is much relied on by the counsel for the plaintiffs. There the Supreme court held, that a statute imposing a tax upon freight taken up within the state and carried out of it, or taken up without and brought within the state, is repugnant to the clause of the constitution 25 *giving to congress the power to regulate commerce. The reason assigned is, that the tax was not upon the companies nor their franchises, property or business, but upon the freight, or upon the consignor or consignee, and was so intended, and the company required to pay a mere toll-gatherer. And inasmuch as the transportation of freight for the purpose of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce, a tax upon freight is necessarily a regulation of commerce.

In the case of "State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts," reported also in 15 Wall. U. S. R. 284, the Supreme court sustains a Pennsylvania statute imposing a tax upon the gross receipts of railroad companies, although these receipts are made up in part of freights received for transportation of merchandise to and from the state into other states. This case is plainly distinguishable from the one last cited. In the first, as has been seen, the tax was upon transportation, and the railroad company a mere agency for its collection. In the second, the tax was upon the company, measured in amount by the extent of its business, or the degree to which its franchise was exercised. It was conceded that the ultimate effect of the tax would be to increase the cost of transportation, and therefore to affect commerce itself. Nevertheless, it was not a tax upon commerce, any more than a tax upon a railroad or stage coach is a tax upon transportation, or a tax upon attorneys constitutes a tax upon clients.

The court further say, in effect, it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it within the meaning of the constitution. The states have authority to tax the estate, real and personal, of all their corporations, including carrying companies, precisely as they may tax similar property when 26 belonging to natural persons. Such taxation may be *laid on valuation or may be an excise; it may be a graduated contribution, proportioned to the value of the privileges granted, or to the extent of their exercise, or to the results of such exercise. Such a power is essential to the healthy exercise of the state governments; and the Federal constitution ought not to be so construed as to impair, much less to destroy, anything that is necessary to their efficient exercise.

These cases show the great difficulty encountered by the Supreme court of the United States in dealing with this perplexing subject. They further show, I think, the anxiety of that court to preserve unimpaired the taxing powers of the states, so far as it can be done consistently with the paramount obligations of the Federal constitution. And although these decisions cannot perhaps be always harmonized, and the learned judges have been unanimous in but few of them, yet they certainly affirm the proposition that it is competent for a state to impose a tax upon individuals or corporations within its territory; and such tax, if it does not discriminate against non-residents or the products of other states, may be upon the property, or the franchises, or the business, of the individual or corporation; and its validity is not at all affected by the consideration that the party is engaged in foreign as well as domestic trade and traffic. Society for Savings v. Coile, 6 U. S. R. 594; Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 123; Hinson v. Lott, Ibid. 148.

In Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 148, the Supreme court sustained a law of Alabama requiring every dealer in spiritous liquors introducing liquors into the state for sale to pay a tax per gallon before offering the same for sale within the limits of the state. Mr. Justice Miller in delivering the opinion of the 27 court *said: "If this was only tax it would constitute an unjust discrimination against the products of other states in favor of those of Alabama, and might be so laid as to amount to an absolute prohibition; but it appeared there was another tax of like amount upon all spirits manufactured in the state. Inasmuch, therefore, as the law merely subjected foreign articles to the same rate of taxation as applied to domestic, it was not an attempt to regulate commerce, but an appropriate and legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the states."

These decisions of the Supreme court have a direct application to the case under consideration. In the first place, it will be observed that the ordinance of the City of Richmond makes no discrimination in favor of or against any express company. The tax is alike upon all, graduated by the extent of the business. In the next place, the tax is not upon the telegraph message or communication, but upon the company, measured by the business in the corporate limits. The effect of the tax may be to increase to some extent the expense of telegraph communication. It is very probable that the rates of telegraphing are established by general arrangement among all the companies, whether incorporated here or abroad, and it may be that these rates are fixed with reference to state and municipal taxation as to other necessary expenses. But the same thing is true as respects railroad companies engaged in the transportation of passengers and freight and domestic goods. A tax upon them is indirectly a tax upon such transportation. But no one ever questioned the constitutional power of a state to lay a tax upon its railroad companies.

The same principle applies to express companies incorporated under the laws 28 of one state, establishing *its offices in other states, and engaged in the transmission of matter internal and external.

In Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. U. S. R. 479, the Supreme court say, although the ultimate effect of the tax may be to increase the cost of transportation, it is within the general authority of the state to tax persons, property, business or occupations within the state.

The mistake made in all this class of cases is in failing to distinguish between commerce itself and what may be termed a mere instrument of commerce. Telegraphic communication is not commerce; "it is not a subject of trade and barter offered in market as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them." It is not an intercourse—though it may be, and doubtless is, an important and valuable instrument or agency by which intercourse is carried on between the different parts of the country. It cannot be said, however, that this intercourse is purely of a national character, affecting the commercial interests of all the states, and therefore requiring exclusive legislation by Congress. Conceding that Congress may regulate the telegraphic business of the country, it has not done so; and in the absence of any such legislation on the subject, there is no valid objection to a system of state taxation upon these companies in return for the protection they receive. They are incorporated under state laws, controlled by state regulations, and protected by state authority. It is true they are engaged in transmitting government messages at rates fixed by the postmaster general; but the railroads perform duties of a similar character in carrying the mail; so also the stage coaches. They are all subjects of state regulation, and are therefore necessarily liable to state taxation. The contract with the government for the transmission of its messages *is in no just sense a regulation of commerce. These

29 terms, "to regulate commerce," are well understood to mean the power to prescribe the rules by which commerce is to be governed. Hay on Com. § 1061. The very fact that Congress has undertaken neither to exclude state taxation, or to prescribe any regulations for the various telegraph companies, indicates very clearly, that the whole subject was intended to be left to the states under whose laws they are incorporated.

Another ground taken by the plaintiff is, that the company is an important agency of the Federal government in the management of public affairs, and as such no state or municipal corporation is authorized to impose a license tax upon its business, whereby the operations of the government may be impaired or obstructed. This view is based mainly upon the provisions of the act of congress of the 24th July, 1866. This act authorizes any telegraph company, organized under the laws of any state, to construct lines of telegraph over any portion of the public domain, along any of the military or post roads, and across any of the navigable waters of the United States.

Authority is also given them to take from the public lands any material needful in the construction and operation of their lines of telegraph, and also to appropriate any portion of the public lands for their stations, not exceeding forty acres for each station. The act further provides, that communications of the government, its officers and agents, shall have priority over all others in their transmission over the lines, at rates fixed by the postmaster general. The provisions of this act were accepted by the plaintiffs, and the terms of government communication fixed accordingly by the postmaster general, and agreed to by 30 the company. *It is argued, that if the state or any of its municipalities may impose a tax upon, or require a license of this company, they may impose it to any extent, and the effect may be to deprive the company altogether of the power to serve the government, or, at any rate, to impair its efficiency.

It is very clear that the states are prohibited from taxing either the property of the Federal government or the instrumentalities by which its powers are carried into execution. This doctrine is well settled, and no one doubts its application to public corporations or other agencies created by the Federal government for carrying into execution national objects and purposes. But none of the cases have gone so far as to affirm, that because the Federal government enters into a contract with a corporation or a natural person to perform certain services this operates as an exemption from all state taxation. Can it be that a railroad company by entering into an arrangement with the postmaster general to carry the mails can escape the payment of its just public dues upon the pretext that its capacity to serve the Federal government may be thereby impaired. Chief Justice Marshall, in Osborne v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. R. 738-860, has given a complete answer to that question. In that case it was argued, that the tax imposed upon the Bank of the United States by the legislature was constitutional, because the bank was established for private benefit, and was founded upon contract between individuals having private trade and private interest for its great and principal object. The chief justice said if these premises were true, the conclusion would then be inevitable. A private corporation engaged in its own business with its own views would certainly be subject to the taxing power of the state, as any individual *would be, and the casual circumstances of its being employed by the government in the transaction of its fiscal affairs would no more exempt its private business from the operation of that power that it would exempt the private business of any individual employed in the same manner. But the premises are not true. The bank is a public corporation, created for public and national purposes. It is not an instrument which the government found ready made, and has supposed to be adapted to its purposes, but one which was created in the form in which it now appears, for national purposes only.

The very reverse of all this is the status of this company. It was not created by the Federal government. It was not organized under any act of Congress, but under the laws of the state of New York. It is a private corporation, created for individual benefit and for the benefit of the private stockholders, carrying on business here under the authority of Virginia statutes, and protected in its franchises and the enjoyment of its property by state laws and the police power of the city government. The Federal government has granted it certain privileges in consideration of the performance of certain services at certain specified rates of compensation. But the government has no interest in it and no concern with it, any further that the performance of these services. So long as these are not interfered with by the regulations of the states, it is no concern of the Federal government whether a tax is imposed at all, or whether it is upon the property or the franchise, or the business of the company. It is not pretended, there is not even a suggestion, that the tax prevents the transmission of the government messages, or that it impairs in the slightest degree, the capacity of the company 32 for the *fulfillment of its obligations. Exemption from all state or municipal taxation might with the same propriety be claimed by all railroad companies, express companies, and others engaged in the transportation of mail matter, upon the ground that such taxation may tend to prevent the performance of the contract, or at least to impair the efficiency of those agencies in the discharge of their duties.

The decisions of the Supreme court of the United States do not give the least countenance to any such pretension. They establish the contrary doctrine. One of these, the case of National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 353, will show the manifest disinclination of the court to extend this doctrine of exemption from state taxation.

In that case it was conceded that the Legislature of Kentucky might tax the stockholders upon the shares held by them in the national banks; but it was insisted that so much of the act as required the banks to pay such tax was invalid, because the banks, being instrumentalities of the Federal government, are beyond the reach of state legislation. This view, however, did not prevail. The Supreme court declared that the doctrine of exemption of Federal agencies from state taxation had its just limitation, a limitation growing out of the necessity in which it is founded. This limitation is, that these agencies are only exempted from state legislation, so far as that legislation may interfere with or impair their efficiency in performing the functions by which they are designed to serve the Federal government. Any other rule would convert a principle founded alone in the necessity of securing to the government the means of exercising its legitimate powers, into an unauthorized and unjustifiable invasion of the rights of the states. The banks

 33 are subject to *the laws of the states, and are governed in their daily course of business far more by the laws of the state than of the nation. Their contracts are governed and construed by state laws. Their acquisition and transfer of property, their right to collect their debts, and their liability to be sued for debts are all based on state laws. It is only when the state law incapacitates the banks from discharging their duties to the government that it becomes unconstitutional. We do not perceive the remotest probability of this in their being required to pay the tax which their stockholders owe to the state for the shares of the capital stock when the laws of the Federal government authorize the same.

In Thomson v. Pacific Railroad, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 579, the same doctrines are still more strongly stated. In that case the question was as to the validity of a tax imposed by the legislature of Kansas upon the railroad and telegraph property of the Union Pacific Railway Company. Exemption from this taxation was claimed upon the ground, that although the company was incorporated under the laws of Kansas, congress had granted it lands and subsidies to a large amount, in consideration of which the company had executed a mortgage upon its property for the payment of five per cent. of its net gains, and had agreed to render services also in the transmission of messages, in the transportation of mails, troops, munitions, and other property at reasonable rates of compensation: and it was insisted that the effect of the tax would be to impede and embarrass the company in the performance of these services as an agency of the government. Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, dwelt at some length upon the distinction between a corporation created by the Federal government for national purposes, and corpora-

34 tions deriving their existence *and exercising their franchises under authority of state laws, but employed by the national government for certain duties and services. As to the latter, while congress may exempt them from any state taxation, which will really prevent or impede such services, yet in the absence of legislation by congress to indicate that exemption is deemed essential to the performance of the governmental services, it cannot be claimed upon the mere ground that the corporation is employed as an agency of the government. It is true that the tax in this case was upon the property of the railroad company; and the learned counsel seems to suppose there is a material distinction between such a tax and a tax upon the business of a corporation. But the reasoning of the court does not justify any such distinction. It applies equally to both forms of taxation. Indeed, Chief Justice Chase expressly says: "No one questions that the power to tax all property, business and persons within their respective limits, is original in the states, and has never been surrendered. It cannot be so used as to defeat or hinder the operations of the national government; but it will be safe to conclude in general in reference to persons and state corporations employed in government service, that where congress has not interfered to protect their property from state taxation, such taxation is not obnoxious to the objection suggested."

These observations apply as strongly to a tax upon business as a tax upon property. Indeed there is no valid distinction between the two, so far as the principles of this case are concerned. The cases do recognize a distinction between taxation of the property belonging to a private corporation employed by the general government and taxation of the instrumentalities or means 35 of the government in the possession *of such corporation. The state may tax a banking institution, but it cannot tax the currency or the government bonds belonging to such bank. It may tax the railroad, but not the mail or the munitions or other property of the government. It may tax the contractor with the government, though not the contract. Such tax may be upon the property of the corporation, or it may be graduated by the amount of its business. It is no concern of the Federal government, provided the tax is not prohibitory, or, at least, does not impair the efficiency of the corporation in the fulfillment of its contract with the government. Indeed a tax upon business in many instances is the only just and practicable mode of assessment. Chartered companies and individuals may carry on business to the amount of thousands of dollars without owning property, real or personal, of any conceivable value. If, whenever they happen to be employed in the service of the government, they are to be exempt from all those burdens which attach to all other persons, it is obvious that both states and cities will be deprived of most valuable subjects and sources of taxation. It is impossible to foresee the mischiefs that will arise from such a limitation upon the powers of the states. We see nothing in the constitution of the United States, or in the decisions of the Supreme Court, warranting such a conclusion.

Judgment affirmed.

*Bolling v. Lersner.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Appeals — Statutory Limitations — Construction.—

The § 8 of the act March 15, 1867, which amended § 8 of ch. 182 of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of time for presenting a petition for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend § 26 of that chapter, which allows five years for perfecting the appeal, by giving bond &c. And therefore, where a petition for an appeal was presented within two years from the date of the decree it might be perfected in any time within five years from that date. But see now, Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17.

2. Same—Same—Time to Object.—If an appeal has been allowed, and the cause decided by the appellate court, without objection by the appellee that the appeal was not perfected in time, the objection cannot afterwards be made in the court below, or in the appellate court when the cause is brought up a second time.

3. Same—Judge Acting under Military Authority.***—

An appeal allowed by a judge acting under military authority in 1869, was a valid appeal, and was confirmed by the act of March 5, 1870, styled the enabling act.

4. Special Court of Appeals—Validity of Act Creating.—

The act of February 28, 1872, to provide a special Court of Appeals, Acts of 1881-'72, ch. 124, p. 98, which creates a special Court of Appeals to consist of three judges of the Circuit courts, is constitutional, and the decisions of the court are valid and binding on the parties in the causes decided.

5. Same—Proper Cases for.—All cases pending on the docket of the Supreme Court of Appeals, not involving a constitutional question and not decided in the court below by one of the judges of the special Court of Appeals, are proper cases to be sent to said special Court of Appeals for decision; and it is for the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals under the constitution and the statute, to select the cases to be sent to said special court.

6. Same—Reversal by This Court—Effect.—The special Court of Appeals having decided a case regularly sent to that court, and having reversed the

37 decree of the court below, and *sent the cause back for further proceedings, there can afterwards be no complaint of error in the decree of the special court or in the proceedings before that decree.

7. Vendor Refusing to Deliver Possession — Specific Performance—Accounting for Rents and Profits.†—A

*De Facto Officers—Validity of Their Acts.—In McCraw v. Williams, 33 Gratt. 510, the facts were that one E. W. Armistead was elected judge of the county court of Halifax, and commissioned by the governor. Believing that his term commenced immediately, he proceeded to hold the court and transact business. It was held, citing the principal case and Griffin v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 81; Quinn v. Com., 20 Gratt. 188, that he was a judge de facto and his acts, judgments, decrees, etc., while so acting were as valid as if he had been a judge de jure.

†Specific Performance—Accounting for Rents and Profits—Interest.—The principal case is cited and approved in Stearns v. Beckham, 81 Gratt. 432; Cullop v. Leonard, 97 Va. 280; Moreland v. Metz, 24 W. Va. 141; Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 901; Vance v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 381.

vendor of land refuses to deliver possession according to the contract, and the vendee who has paid the purchase money, immediately sues for a specific performance, and the vendee resists it, and asks for a rescission of the contract; but there is a decree for specific performance and for an account of rents and profits. In estimating the rents and profits of the land thus held by the vendor, the annual value of the land in the hands of a prudent and discreet tenant upon a judicious system of husbandry is the proper rule in the case; to be influenced in some measure by the mode of treatment of the land by the occupant.

8. Same—Same—Same—Interest.*—Though in such case the rents are estimated, it is proper to charge interest upon them.

By an agreement under seal, bearing date the 19th of January 1863, R. B. Bolling, in consideration of the sum of seventy-seven thousand dollars, sold to Gustavus Lersner his estate in the county of Fauquier, called Bollingbrook, containing seven hundred and sixty-nine acres, and bound himself, upon payment of the purchase money, to convey the same to Lersner by deed with general warranty. And he also agreed to sell to said Lersner another tract adjoining Bollingbrook, known as Ben Lomond, containing three hundred and forty-one acres, being the same purchased by Bolling at a sale by the commissioner acting under a decree in the case of Armstead v. Armstead, in which a final decree was yet to be rendered; and the said Lersner was to be substituted for the said Bolling, as the purchaser; also all the live stock then on the farm, farming utensils, household and kitchen furniture, silver plate, pictures, &c., the crops, &c. And Lersner agreed to pay to the said Bolling the sum of $17,000 on the 1st of February, a further sum of $30,000 on the 1st of March, and a like sum of $30,000 on the 10th of 38 March, 1863. And it was further agreed that *Bolling might use and occupy the above farms without rent or charge. One month after the termination of the war, Bolling was to deliver possession of the premises to Lersner.

Lersner seems to have paid the first two instalments of the purchase money in February and March 1863. The last, of $30,000, was none of it paid before April; and to enable him to pay it, Bolling endorsed Lersner's three bills of exchange on London for £1,200 sterling, two of which, amounting to £700 sterling, came back protested; and *Damages—Profits or Expected Gains.—In Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 416, the principal case was cited for the following statement of the law. A plaintiff will not ordinarily be allowed to give evidence or to recover profits or expected gains, for it is generally conjectural whether there will be any profits or gains. The prohibition against the recovery of profits or gains, when not excluded as unnatural or remote, is due mainly to the inability to prove with reasonable certainty that the injury prevented the receipt of profits or gains and their amount. But if it be shown that the loss of profits or gains was the natural and proximate result of the wrongful act, and their extent is also satisfactorily proved, they may be recovered.

Bolling was sued upon them, and compelled to pay them.

In November 1865 Lersner filed his bill in the Circuit court of Fauquier against Bolling, for a specific performance of the said contract; and Bolling having answered, resisting the demand, and asking for a rescission of the contract, and a great mass of testimony having been taken, the cause came on to be finally heard on the 13th of September 1867, when the court made a decree that the said contract be annulled and declared void, that Bolling should pay to Lersner $19,780.90, with interest, and his costs.

On the 17th of May 1869, on the petition of Lersner, an appeal from this decree was allowed by W. Willoughby, a judge of the Court of Appeals under military appointment, bond with surety to be given in the penalty of $1,500, conditioned as the law directs. The case was sent to the clerk of the district Court of Appeals at Fredericksburg. The writ of supersedeas to the decree is dated the 13th of September 1869; and the appeal bond is dated the 11th of November 1869.

After the present constitution of the state went into operation and the present Court of Appeals was organized, the cause was sent to this court; and was pending 39 *in this court when a special Court of Appeals, consisting of three judges of the circuit courts, was organized; and the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals sent it, with forty-nine other cases, to be heard and decided by that court.

On the 17th of April 1873, the special Court of Appeals, one judge dissenting, reversed the decision of the Circuit court of Fauquier, for error in rescinding the contract of the 19th of January 1863, and in not decreeing a specific execution thereof. And the cause was remanded to the Circuit court of Fauquier county, with instructions to refer the cause to a master commissioner, to have an account taken crediting Bolling with the amount paid by him on the two bills of exchange, and charging him with the rents and profits of Bollingbrook and Ben Lomond from the 2d of May 1866, when possession should have been delivered under the terms of the contract. And if upon the coming in of this report it should appear that there is a balance due the appellee, the said Circuit court will require the appellee to convey Bollingbrook, and cause a decree to be entered conveying Ben Lomond to the appellant upon his paying such balance, after deducting the costs of the suit below; but if it should appear there was a balance due the appellant upon taking said accounts, then the court will require such conveyance and decree as before stated, and render a personal decree against the appellee for such balance, and for the costs of said suit.

When the decree of the special Court of Appeals was sent down to the Circuit court, Bolling appeared by counsel, and objected to its being entered as the decree of that court, on several grounds; the most material of which are, 1st. That W. Willoughby, who allowed the appeal, never had a valid 40 commission or *appointment as judge: that the reconstruction acts under which he was appointed were unconstitutional, and the authority exercised under the United States by force of said acts was invalid. 2d. That said appeal was not heard by the Supreme Court of Appeals, but by judges sitting as a special Court of Appeals, under color of an act of assembly of Virginia passed on the 28th of February 1872; and that this act was in violation of the present constitution of the state, which it was insisted, required that every special Court of Appeals should be constituted of five judges, of whom not less than three should sit to do business. The other grounds are noticed in the opinion of Judge Moncure.

The Circuit court overruled the objection, and entered the decree, and ordered the accounts as directed by said decree.

In November 1873 the commissioner returned his report, in which he fixed the rent of the land at $1,925 a year, and after giving to Bolling credit for the amount he had paid on the two bills of exchange which had been returned, and for his permanent improvements on the land, he reported a balance against him of $10,954.17, of which $9,160.83 was principal.

To this report Bolling filed eight exceptions; and when the cause came on to be heard upon the report, the court reduced the rents to $1,500 per annum; and recommitted the report to be reformed accordingly. The second report of the commissioner was filed on the 22d of December 1873, reporting a balance against Bolling of $5,262.43, of which $4,684.19 was principal. To this report Bolling filed six exceptions. These reports, and the exceptions thereto, are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court by Moncure, P. The cause came on to 41 be finally heard on the 23d of *December 1873, when the court overruled all the exceptions, confirmed the last report, and decreed that the defendant, Robert B. Bolling, do execute and deliver to the plaintiff a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, with general warranty, conveying to the plaintiff the tract of land known as Bollingbrook; and that the plaintiff recover against him the sum of $5,262.43, with interest on $4,684.19, part thereof, from the 26th of December 1873, and his costs. And liberty was reserved to the plaintiff to apply for further relief upon the footing of this decree. Bolling thereupon applied to this court for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

The cause was argued by Conway Robinson, Jones & Bouldin, and Wm. J. Robertson, for the appellant, and by Jno. R. Tucker and Brooke, for the appellee.

Moncure, P., delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question which this case presents for our decision is, whether the decree of the Circuit court of Fauquier county, made on the 13th day of September 1867, has ever been reversed or annulled by any valid proceeding, and does not therefore still remain in full force?

In the first place, it is contended that after the date of the said final decree, and after the act of March 15th, 1867, reducing the period of limitation of appeals to two years, there elapsed two years before the record was delivered to the clerk of the appellate court, and before process issued upon the appeal, and before such bond was given as was required to be given before the appeal could take effect. The date of the order made by W. Willoughby, as a judge of 42 the *late district Court of Appeals, held at Fredericksburg, allowing an appeal from the said decree to the said district court, was May 17th, 1869, much less than two years after the date of said decree. Process was issued upon the appeal on the 13th day of September 1869, exactly two years after the date of said decree. The appeal bond, however, was not given until the 11th day of November 1869, more than two years after the date of said decree.

To this objection the answer made by the counsel of the appellee is sufficient; that the act of March 15th, 1867, which amended the third section of chapter 182 of the Code of 1680, changing the limitation of time for presenting a petition for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to any final judgment decree or order, from five years to two years after it was rendered or made, did not amend the twenty-sixth section of that chapter, which allowed five years within which to perfect the appeal by giving bond, &c.; and this stood unaltered until it was amended by act of June 23, 1870 (Acts of 1869-'70, p. 224, § 17); so that the petition was presented, and all other acts performed within the time allowed by law. But see Callaway v. Harding, 23 Gratt. 542, which will suffice.

If, however, the appeal had not been perfected within the period limited by law; still, as no objection was made on that ground until after the judgment was affirmed by the appellate court, it was certainly too late to make the objection then for the first time.

In the next place, it is contended that even supposing the appeal which was allowed, to have been perfected in due time, yet the appeal was invalid; and therefore the decree of the appellate court founded thereon, is also invalid, and the said decree of the Circuit court still remains in 43 full force. *It is contended that the appeal was invalid, because W. Willoughby, by whom the same was allowed, as a judge of the late district Court of Appeals, held at Fredericksburg, was not in law or in fact such judge, and therefore had no authority to allow an appeal in the case.

If it be conceded that this would have been a good objection if made in due time, it might well be argued, as indeed was argued by the counsel for the appellee, that the objection came too late. It was not made in the district Court of Appeals, while the case was pending there, nor in this court, while the case was pending here, nor in the special Court of Appeals, while the case was pending there, until after that court had reversed the judgment of the Circuit court, and then it was made for the first time.

But without deciding that question (because unnecessary to do so), we are of opinion that the said appeal was a valid appeal, according to the law of this state, as it has been settled by this court in the cases of Griffin's ex'or v. Cunningham, 20 Gratt. 31, and Quinn &c. v. The Commonwealth, Id. 138. To that extent the judges were unanimous, although they differed upon an important question arising in the first named case. All of the five judges were present when that case was argued and decided, and it was argued with great ability, and very deliberately considered and decided. We all still think that decision was right, to the extent to which the whole court was then agreed, and we are of opinion that it ought not now to be disturbed. We therefore confirm it. In Teel &c. v. Yancey &c., 23 Gratt. 691, it was held that the act of March 5th, 1870, commonly called the enabling act, is a valid act, except the proviso, which authorizes the Court of 44 Court of Appeals *organized under the reconstruction acts; and the district courts of appeal, sitting in December 1869, had jurisdiction to hear and decide the causes then pending therein. Judge Christian in his opinion in that case, after referring to the decision of this court in Griffin's ex'or v. Cunningham, supra, said: "The question raised is therefore res adjudicata, and no longer open for discussion." Two of the other judges, Moncure and Staples, concurred in that opinion; and though the other two, Anderson and Bouldin, dissented, it does not appear that their dissent was to that part of the opinion.

Appeals to review the decisions of the

In the next place, it is contended that even if there was a valid appeal from the said decree of the Circuit court of Fauquier county, that appeal has never been lawfully disposed of, but is yet pending in this court.

If it has been lawfully disposed of at all, it has been so disposed of by the late special Court of Appeals in reviewing the said decree of the Circuit court.

But it is contended that the decree of reversal of the Circuit court is invalid: 1st, because the special court was not organized according to the constitution of the state; and if it was, 2dly, because the case was not legally transferred from this court to the special court, to be disposed of by the latter. And,

1st. Was the special court organized according to the constitution?

It is said that it was not, because it was made by law to consist of not more than three judges; whereas, by the constitution, it is required to consist of not less than three nor more than five judges.

Certainly, if the constitution requires it to consist of not less than three nor more than five judges, the law which made it consist of not more than three was unconstitutional. And certainly also we may say it was 45 competent for the convention in framing the constitution *to authorize the legislature to create a special Court of Appeals, to consist of not more than three judges. The question is, "Does the constitution confer such authority on the legislature? If it does, it is an immaterial question whether a court of five would not have been better than a court of three judges; and whether it would not have been a sounder exercise of discretion in the legislature, in carrying out the provision of the constitution on this subject, to have adopted the former instead of the latter number. We were decidedly of opinion that it would have been. But that is a question not for us but for the legislature to decide, supposing the constitutional authority to exist.

Now the constitution seems to speak a plain language on the subject. "Special courts of appeals, to consist of not less than three nor more than five judges, may be formed of the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals and of the Circuit courts, or any of them, to try any cases on the docket of said court, in respect to which a majority of the judges thereof may be so situated as to make it improper for them to sit on the hearing of the same; and also to try any cases on the said docket which cannot be otherwise disposed of with convenient dispatch." A choice of the number of the judges of a special Court of Appeals was here plainly given by the constitution to the legislature, so that such number should be between the extreme limits of three and five inclusive. If there were any doubt about this upon section 3 of article vi. of the constitution just quoted, taken by itself, there can surely be none when we take it in connection with section two of the same article. "The Supreme Court of Appeals shall consist of five judges, any three of whom may hold a court." If the 46 convention had intended *that special courts of appeals should consist necessarily of the same number of judges, required by section two to constitute the Supreme Court of Appeals, it would, in the immediately succeeding section three have used similar language to that which was used in section two, and have said: "Special courts of appeals, to consist of five judges, any three of whom may hold a court, may be formed," &c. But the convention thought proper to give the legislature a discretion in regard to the number of the judges of which a special court may consist between the limits of five and three, believing no doubt that while five might be a preferable number in some cases, three might be in others. The Supreme Court of Appeals of the state has sometimes consisted of but three judges. It so consisted at one time before the state was divided as it now is. And it so consisted for several years under the Alexandria constitution, after the state was divided. The first term of the court under that constitution was held by only two judges, during the sickness and after the death of Judge Thompson, and before the appointment and qualification of his successor, Judge Rives.

That court of two judges went on to hear and decide the cases as they stood upon the docket, without any objection so far as heard of from any quarter. It decided some very important cases. Among them was that of Brockenbrough's ex'ors v. Spindle's adm'ors, 17 Gratt. 21, which was argued for the appellants by two of the same counsel, who argued this cause for the appellant, and, as the reporter truly says, they argued it "most ably." They gained that cause, the decree of the court below having been reversed. With this example immediately before the eyes of the convention, when it framed the constitution, it may well have been led to suppose that three judges might be a sufficient number 47 *to compose a special Court of Appeals, which would be required only occasionally, and perhaps for short periods. And economy, which was then a very important consideration, strongly recommended that the court should consist of three rather than five judges. At all events, it no doubt seemed to the convention to be reasonable to give to the legislature an election between the numbers three and five in the constitution of the court.

The legislature so construed the constitution, and accordingly passed the act approved February 28th, 1872, entitled "an act to provide a special Court of Appeals." Acts of 1871-'72, p. 98, chap. 124. That act unmistakably creates a court to consist of three judges, and not more, and no person ever doubted, so far as we know, that the act was constitutional, until it was recently doubted by counsel in this case. Nothing is better settled than that, prima facie, every act of the legislature is constitutional, and the burden of clearly showing the contrary devolves on him who asserts it. If the question be doubtful, it will be solved in favor of the validity of the act. If this act be not plainly in accordance with the constitution, it certainly cannot be said that the contrary plainly appears.

We do not see the force of the objection to the constitutionality of the act, arising from the provision in section 2 of article vi. of the constitution, concerning the Supreme Court of Appeals, which declares "that the assent of the majority of the judges elected to the court shall be required in order to declare any law null and void by reason of its repugnance to the Federal constitution or to the "constitution of this state." It was not contemplated nor intended that cases involving a question of constitutionality of a law should be referred for decision to a special Court of Appeals,

48 *which must consist in part at least, and may consist entirely, as in the instance of the special court in question, of Circuit court judges. In certifying cases to the special court for decision, of course the Supreme court would certify none which was known to involve a constitutional question: and if a mistake should happen to be made in that respect, it could easily be corrected by returning the case to the Supreme court, or leaving it for decision by that court. A similar course, it is believed, was pursued whenever it was deemed proper, even before the passage of the act approved January 17, 1873. Acts of 1872-'73, p. 26, chap. 39.

Nor do we see the force of the objection made to the constitutionality of the act, upon the ground that it authorized the Court of Appeals to designate annually three judges of the Circuit courts, to constitute a special Court of Appeals. We do not consider this as a legislative power, which the Court of Appeals had no constitutional power to perform. This was, no doubt, deemed by the legislature to be the best and most convenient mode of mere designation of three of the circuit judges to hold the special Court of Appeals. A similar mode has been authorized by law to be pursued in other like cases, without objection. In the act providing for special Courts of Appeals, passed March 15th, 1832, Sup. to R. C. p. 123, chap. 95, the duty of designating the judges to constitute a special Court of Appeals was devolved on the General court. Certainly the General court had no more capacity to perform such a function than had the Court of Appeals. In the act passed February 25, 1854, Acts of 1853-'4, p. 18, ch. 17, sec. 5, power was given to the Court of Appeals to designate judges of the Circuit courts to hold a special Court of Appeals;

precisely such a power as was conferred by the act of 1872. *Then the special Court of Appeals, created by that act, was organized according to the constitution; and we proceed now to enquire, 2ndly. Was this case legally transferred from this court to the said special court, to be disposed of by that court?

Under this head we understand two objections to be made: first, that this is not such a case as ought to have been transferred to the special court; and, secondly, that no opportunity was afforded the appellant to object to such transfer, or show cause against it. We now proceed to consider these two objections; and,

First, that this is not such a case as ought to have been transferred to the special court.

To determine this question, we must look at the words of the first section of the act, and of the third section of the sixth article of the constitution; and we need only look to a few of those words. By the first section of the act, the special court is constituted for the trial of such causes "as the Court of Appeals cannot dispose of with convenient dispatch, and shall certify to it, as provided in article sixth, section three, of the constitution of the state, not exceeding fifty at a time." And by the third section of the sixth article of the constitution, special courts are authorized to be formed "to try any cases on the docket of the Supreme Court of Appeals, which cannot be otherwise disposed of with convenient dispatch." This is all that is said, either in the constitution or the act, in regard to the nature of the cases to be tried by the special court, in the exercise of the branch of its jurisdiction we are now considering.

The only limitation, if limitation that can be called, upon the cases on the docket which the special court *is authorized to try, is contained in the words, "which cannot be otherwise disposed of with convenient dispatch." Now what cases are they? Are they the first cases, or the last cases on the docket? Or those in the middle? The first have been longest pending, and in reason, it would seem, ought first to be tried. The last will not be tried for the longest time, and for that reason may seem to be those for the more speedy trial of which provision should be made. The cases in the middle of the docket, having been longer pending than the last, and not so long as the first, may, on that account, be considered as entitled to preference in the transfers to be made to the special court. These words, "convenient dispatch," are very indefinite words, and they are relative words. What would be convenient dispatch in regard to one case would not be convenient dispatch in regard to another, although both might be disposed of in the same time. Take a case, for example, that has been pending two years, and another that has been pending two months. To dispose of the latter in one year, might be convenient dispatch; whereas, to dispose of the former in one year, certainly would not be. Who is to decide these questions? To whom did the legislature and the framers of the constitution refer them? To whom else than this court, which was reasonably supposed to have more information on the subject, and to be better able to judge correctly in the matter than any other person? This court did exercise its best judgment in the matter under all the circumstances.

The act provided that it should continue in force for two years, unless this court should enter an order of record that the existence of said special court was no longer necessary. Thus showing that during that period of two years it was expected that all the cases on *the docket which were necessary to be tried by a special court could be tried, and there would then be no longer occasion for such a court. If, however, there should be such occasion, the members of this court, and all other persons concerned, confidently expected that the special court would be continued until all occasion for it ceased. Thus it was confidently expected that this constitutional plan of reducing the overloaded docket of this court, by the assistance of a special court, would be actively and continuously pursued until the end in view was accomplished, which it was expected would be the case in two or three years, when it was hoped that this court would be able to keep down its docket for the future. Under these circumstances, it became our duty to execute the power conferred on us by the first section of the act of February 28th, 1872, aforesaid, to certify for trial by the special court, such causes on the docket of this court as could not be disposed of by this court with convenient dispatch. We had much difficulty in regard to the cases proper to be certified to the special court. We at length concluded that the fairest and best mode was to certify to it, the first fifty unargued causes standing on the docket at the time of our adjournment in Richmond in the spring of 1872. The special court was to sit on or about the first of July thereafter. We were not again to sit in Richmond until some time in November, and would then be for some time occupied in the trial of criminal and other privileged causes, so that it might be sometime in January before we could resume the trial of causes on the regular docket. During all this time the fifty oldest causes on the docket, which had already been delayed more than two years, would have been delayed many months longer but for our transferring them for trial to the special

them, and by pursuing the same course thereafter, it was reasonably hoped that if the special court should be continued so long as might be necessary, as was then expected, all the causes on the docket would be disposed of with as convenient dispatch as would be consistent with the rights of all parties concerned. We may have come to a wrong conclusion, but we acted according to the best of our judgment, and even if we made a mistake, it certainly cannot be such an error as invalidates the judgment of the special court. And now let us consider the objection. Secondly, that no opportunity was afforded the appellant to object to such transfer, or show cause against it.

The act of assembly made no provision for affording such an opportunity. It only provided for the transfer to the special court, of such causes as this court could not dispose of with convenient dispatch, not exceeding fifty at a time. There could be no occasion for such an opportunity in regard to the question of convenient dispatch with which a cause might be disposed of. That was a question which the court could decide without the aid of parties or their counsel. It could not have been contemplated by the framers, either of the constitution or the law, that all or any of the suitors in the court might raise an issue on that question. There might be peculiar reasons for not certifying a particular case to the special court; such as the fact, that a constitutional question existed in the case, or the fact that one of the judges of the special court decided the case as a circuit judge. But such facts, which would be cases of rare exception, might be brought to the notice of either court at any time, and the case, whenever proper, would be restored to the docket of this court. If there was any advantage

53 to be derived from *a trial of a case in one of the two courts, rather than the other, the suitors in this court were all equally entitled to the benefit of that advantage. The importance of a cause afforded no sufficient reason for excluding it from the special court. That court was not instituted for the trial of inferior causes, but all causes on the docket, important or unimportant, which could not otherwise be disposed of with convenient dispatch. To be sure the special court consisted of but three members, while this court consists of five, which may be supposed to give to those, whose causes are tried in this court, an advantage over those whose causes were tried in the special court; but that was an accidental advantage, if any, which all had an equal chance to obtain. In consequence of that supposed advantage, we would have preferred that the special court should also have consisted of five judges; but the legislature, to whom alone the decision of the question belonged, ordained otherwise. But this court is often held by only three judges, two of whom may decide the most important cause; and thus it may happen that the judgment therein may be reversed by two judges against two. That the appeal was taken to a court consisting of five judges, is no sufficient reason for the case not being tried by a court which happens to be held by only three of the five judges. These are accidents to which all suitors are subject. We have seen that by changes in the constitution and laws of the state the number of the judges of this court has been sometimes five and sometimes three. And of whatever number the court happens to consist, it goes on to try the causes as they are called, without regard to the state of the court when the appeal was taken. Thus it has sometimes happened that an appeal 54 taken to a court of three judges has been tried by a court of *five; and so vice versa.

After the close of the war, it happened that there was an overwhelming accumulation of business in this court. The evil was so great, that all concerned were anxious to devise an adequate remedy for its removal. And the act of February 28, 1872, to provide a special Court of Appeals, was passed for that purpose. The preamble of that act gives us some idea of the nature and extent of the evil. "Whereas it appears," says the preamble, "that the business of the Court of Appeals has increased so much by reason of the numerous questions to which the war has given rise, that the causes upon its docket cannot be conveniently tried within a reasonable time," &c. This act is very different from the act of March 31, 1848 (Acts of 1847-'8, p. 51, chap. 68), to which the learned counsel of the appellant seems to suppose it to be analogous. And we therefore think there was no occasion for using the same precautions in the act of 1872, as were used in the act of 1848. That act was passed under a constitution which made no provision for a special Court of Appeals, but which, on the contrary, declared that "the judicial power shall be vested in a Supreme Court of Appeals, in such superior courts as the legislature may from time to time ordain and establish, and the judges thereof, in the County courts, and in justices of the peace." It was argued that under that constitution there could not be two Courts of Appeals. And in the preparation by the learned revisors of the Code, of the act of 1848, they had to use their skill to avoid leaving any room for reasonable objection to the act. And, notwithstanding that, a great controversy arose in regard to the act, which was settled in this court in the case of Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518-644.

In the constitution adopted since that decision was made, the precaution has been 55 *used of avoiding a like difficulty, by expressly providing for the creation of a special Court of Appeals: as in the constitution of 1851, the Alexandria constitution, and the present constitution. In the constitution of 1851, provision was made for the trial of all the causes on the docket of this court when that constitution took effect. So that it was plain what causes were to be tried by a special court under that constitution, and easy provision was made therefor by the act passed February 25th, 1854 (Acts of 1853-4, p. 18, chap. 17), leaving this court to try the new causes afterwards brought to it. In the Alexandria constitution provision was made similar to, but not the same with that contained in the present constitution. We have seen what that is. The act which was passed to carry that provision into effect was not like the act of 1848, because the constitution under which it was enacted was very unlike the constitution under which the act of 1848 was passed. And if the act of '1872 was constitutional, as we think it was, of course the legislature had a right to pass it, and it is valid, although it does not contain the provisions of the act of 1848, however wise those provisions may be.

It follows, from what we have said, that the decree of the 27th of January 1873 is a valid and conclusive decree; that there can be no complaint of any error either in it or behind it; and that if there be any error in this case, for which relief can be afforded, it must be in the proceedings which occurred in the case after it was remanded by the special Court of Appeals to the Circuit court. The appellant complains of such errors, and we now proceed to consider that complaint.

Among the errors complained of in these subsequent proceedings, are several which involve the same questions we have already considered and decided, and it

56 *will therefore be unnecessary to do more than to state them. That the decree of the special Court of Appeals is a valid and conclusive decree, as far as it goes in the case, is an answer to them all. The first of them is, that the Circuit court on the 17th day of April 1873 ordered the decree of the special Court of Appeals of the 27th day of January 1873 in the case, to be entered as the decree of the said Circuit court, notwithstanding the resistance of such entry by appellant, who insisted that the said decree of the special court was null and void for the reasons and upon the grounds set forth in his written objections filed, and ordered to be made a part of the record in the cause. The second of them is, that the circuit court on the 17th day of December 1873 rejected the prayer of the appellant's petition for a rehearing of the decree of said court of the 17th of April 1873, directing the decree of the special Court of Appeals of the 27th of January 1873 to be entered as the decree of the said Circuit court as aforesaid.

When the decree of the special court was entered as the decree of the Circuit court as aforesaid, to wit: on the 17th of April 1873 the latter court, in conformity with the requirements of the said decree of the former court, decreed that one of the master commissioners of the court should take an account, crediting the said Robert B. Bolling with the amount paid by him on the bills held by Caldwell, Shannon & Co., and charging him with the rents and profits of Bollingbrook, and Ben Lomond from the 2d day of May 1866, when possession thereof ought to have been delivered under the terms of the contract of sale in the bill and proceedings mentioned; and also with the value of the personal property which then ought to have 57 been delivered under the terms of the said contract; in *taking which said account, said commissioner was directed to make all necessary enquiries, and to report his proceedings to the court.

On the 28th of November 1873, the report of the commissioner and papers accompanying the same were filed in the cause. It contained a statement of the account between Bolling and Lersner, as directed in said decree. "The only fact in the account," said the commissioner, "about which there was any difficulty was the question of the proper rent to be charged for said two tracts of land. There were seven depositions taken by each of the parties relative to this question; of course these fourteen witnesses differ as to the proper amount that should be charged, or as to what said farms should have rented for; the difference between the estimates of the highest and lowest being as much as that of $1,300. With this conflicting evidence, your commissioner took the mean rent of all these estimates, to-wit, $1,925 per annum for both farms; and what is a little remarkable, the average rent of the two lowest and the two highest is within a few dollars of this sum fixed upon by your commissioner. The said Bolling was credited with all sums paid for taxes, and for ditching and stone fencing; these items were given in the exhibit filed with Townshend S. Bolling's deposition." Then follows the account, showing the total amount due by Bolling to Lersner, on rent account, up to 2d May 1873, with interest to 2d December 1873, to be $10,954.17, of which the sum of $9,160.83 is principal.

To this report eight exceptions were taken by Bolling and none by Lersner; and on the 20th of December 1873 the cause came on again to be heard on the papers formerly read, the said report of the commissioner, and exhibits returned therewith, and

58 exceptions *taken thereto, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof the court overruled the first, third, sixth and seventh of said exceptions; and being of opinion, upon the matters contained in the fourth and fifth of said exceptions, that there is no error in said report, in failing to give the defendant credit directly for any increase in the intrinsic value of the lands, and that the true standard by which the rents and profits of the land should be determined is the annual value of said lands in the hands of a prudent and discreet tenant, upon a judicious system of husbandry; but being further of opinion that the mode of treatment by the occupant should have some influence in determining this value, and that the amount allowed by said commissioner is more than a fair rent under the circumstances, which the court ascertains, upon a fair view of the testimony, to be the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, did overrule said fourth and fifth exceptions, in so far as they are inconsistent with the principles above declared, and did not sustain them, in so far as they are consistent therewith. And the court sustained the eighth exception, and recommended the report to the commissioner with instructions to reform the same according to the principles of the said decree, and report the same forthwith to the court.

On the 23d of December 1873, a report of the commissioner, made in pursuance of the said decree, was filed in the cause, showing the balance due by Bolling to Lersner, as of the 20th of December, 1873, to be $5,262.43, of which the sum of $4,684.19 is principal.

To this report six exceptions were taken by Bolling and none by Lersner. The said exceptions are as follows:

1. Because the commissioner charges the defendant with estimated and conjectural rent, &c., instead of the actual profits realized by defendant.

59 *2. Because the commissioner has failed to give Bolling credit for the increased value of the land, arising from the mode in which he managed it.

3. Because the rent fixed is in excess of any fair estimate of value of the estate, based upon a proper management of it.

4. Because interest has been allowed upon estimated rents.

5 (called 7). Because the commissioner has not reduced the charge for the rent of 1866-'7 below that of other years, although that was the year when the fencing had to be repaired, and there was no capital to buy stock, and the tenancy began and ended at an unseasonable period for farming operations, to wit, the 2d of May 1866 to 2d May 1867.

6 (called 8). Because the commissioner failed to allow Bolling sufficient credit for his improvements and repairs, over and above the general improvement of the land. See exception 8, of 17th December 1873.

And on the same day, to wit, the 23d day of December 1873, the cause coming on to be further heard on the papers formerly read, the commissioner's report last mentioned, and the defendant's exceptions thereto, was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court, overruling the said exceptions and confirming the said report, decreed that the defendant, Bolling, should execute and deliver to the plaintiff, Lersner, a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, with general warranty, conveying to said plaintiff that tract or parcel of land known as Bollingbrook, in the bill and proceedings mentioned; and further decreed that the plaintiff should recover against the defendant the sum of $5,262.43, with interest on $4,684.19, part thereof, from the 20th of December 1873, and the costs by 60 *him expended in the prosecution of this suit. And leave was reserved to the plaintiff to apply for further relief on the footing of the said decree.

From that decree an appeal to this court was applied for; which was accordingly allowed.

We have disposed of all the questions arising on this appeal except those which relate to the account taken of rents and profits, and they are presented by the six exceptions of the appellant to the last report of the commissioner, all of which were overruled by the decree appealed from. We will now proceed to consider them, though not, perhaps, in the precise order of the exceptions.

It is well settled, and not denied in this case, that when a contract is made for the sale of real estate, which a court of equity will specifically execute, from the moment of the contract the estate is to be considered as the property of the purchaser, and the purchase money as the property of the vendor; possession of the former to be delivered, and payment of the latter to be made, according to the terms of the contract. If, wrongfully, such possession be retained by the vendor, or such payment be withheld by the vendee, contrary to the terms of the contract, the obligation hence arises to pay rents and profits in the one case, or interest in the other, as the case may be. In this case no question arises in regard to the obligation to pay interest, the purchase money and interest having been all paid. But there is a question, which is the main, and, in substance and effect, almost the only remaining question in the case, in regard to the obligation to pay rents and profits. The vendor has continually retained possession of the estate, "from the 2d May 1866, when possession thereof ought to have been de-61 tract," *as adjudged by the decree of the special Court of Appeals, and yet retains such possession. His obligation to account for and pay rents and profits to some extent, supposing the contract to be valid and binding, as it has been adjudged to be, is not denied. The only question is as to the extent of such liability and the rule by which it is to be ascertained. The appellant contends that he is bound to account for and pay only the amount of actual profits realized by him; while the appellee contends that the obligation is to pay "the annual value of said lands in the hands of a prudent and discreet tenant, upon a judicious system of husbandry," "the mode of treatment by the occupant" having "some influence in determining this value," ac-according to the decree of the Circuit court of the 20th of December 1873.

We are of opinion that the latter is the just and true measure of the appellant's liability and the mode of ascertaining it, and therefore that the Circuit court did not err in applying such measure and mode to this case, and in decreeing "that the amount allowed by said commissioner (to wit: nineteen hundred and twenty-five dollars per annum) is more than a fair rent under the circumstances, "and in ascertaining such rent, upon a fair view of the testimony, to be the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum." At all events, we think the appellant has no just cause to complain of the amount of this assessment. There may be, and no doubt are, cases in which the amount of profits actually received, without regard to the actual yearly value of the property, is the just and true measure of liability. If a person were in possession of land which he bona fide believed to be his, and did not know was claimed by another, who might be adjudged to be entitled to it, there would seem to be reason in charging *such person only with such profits as he actually received. But here the case is altogether different. A controversy arose between the parties very soon after the war about their contract, and as early as October 1865 this suit was brought by Lersner for its specific execution. He claimed in his bill to have fully paid the purchase money, and to be entitled to the possession of the land, which he said was wrongfully withheld from him. Bolling in his answer denied that Lersner was entitled to a specific execution of the contract, and claimed a rescission thereof for reasons set forth by him. The litigation between the parties thus commenced in 1865, was actually prosecuted by them until the 13th of September 1867, when a decree was rendered by the Circuit court annulling the contract, and for the payment by Bolling to Lersner of the sum of $19,708.90, with interest as therein mentioned, subject, however, to the provisions of the act of assembly staying the collection of debts, and also for the payment of the costs of suit by Lersner to Bolling. From the said decree an appeal was applied for on the 16th of April 1869, allowed May 17th 1869, and perfected by the execution of an appeal bond on the 11th of November 1869. This appeal was prosecuted without intermission until the 27th of January 1873, when the special Court of Appeals being of opinion that there was error in the said decree of the Circuit court in rescinding the contract of the 19th of January 1863, and in not decreeing the specific execution thereof, therefore reversed the said decree with costs, and remanded the cause to the Circuit court, with instructions to refer it to a commissioner to take certain accounts, and among them an account charging Bolling "with the rents and profits of Bollingbrook, and Ben Lomond from the 2d day of May 1866, when possession thereof *ought to have been delivered under the terms of the contract."

Now how can it be said, under all these circumstances, that Bolling is not chargeable with a fair and reasonable rent for the property from and after the 2d day of May 1866, when, according to the decree of the special Court of Appeals, he ought to have delivered possession to Lersner under the terms of the contract? The fact is, that when we say that the decree of the special Court of Appeals is valid and conclusive, we decide every question of controversy in this case, even that which relates to rents and profits. In that view of the case it stands thus: On the 2d day of May 1866 Bolling was in possession of the land in controversy, and was bound by his contract to deliver it to Lersner, who had paid the whole amount of the purchase money, and was then demanding such possession, and actively prosecuting this suit for its recovery. Bolling has ever since remained, and yet remains, in the full possession and enjoyment of the land, while Lersner has ever since been demanding, and actively prosecuting this suit to recover such possession, with the exception only of about two years, during which his application for an appeal from the decree of the Circuit court of the 13th day of September 1867 was suspended; and even during that period it must have been confidently expected by Bolling that Lersner intended to apply for an appeal, and that if he so applied he would obtain it.

Under these circumstances ought not Bolling to have expected and prepared to pay a reasonable rent for the land in case of its recovery from him? And now that a decree has been rendered against him for it by the court of last resort, is there any principle of law or equity which can exempt him from liability for *such a rent?

We think not. And then the question is, what is a reasonable rent in such a case? The commissioner ascertained that an average of the estimates of all the witnesses on both sides, of which there was an equal number, made the sum of nineteen hundred and twenty-five dollars, and reported that as a reasonable annual rent. But Bolling excepted, and the Circuit court sustained his exception, and reduced the sum to fifteen hundred dollars per annum, which it considered to be a reasonable rent under all the circumstances of the case, and especially looking to the care which had been taken of the land, and of the prudent manner in which it had been managed and cultivated. And from that amount of fifteen hundred dollars was deducted every cent which had been paid by Bolling for taxes on the land, for ditching, fencing, and other improvements, with the single exception of clover seed and plaster used upon the land, which was considered to be properly chargeable to the tenant, and not to the owner of the land. Is this more than a reasonable rent? and has Bolling any just cause to complain of it? We think not.

And this disposes of all the questions arising upon the exceptions to the commissioner's last report, except the fourth, "because interest has been allowed upon estimated rents," which presents the only remaining question to be decided in the case.

In actions for the recovery of rent in arrear, it was a general rule formerly, that interest was not recoverable on the sum due, because the landlord had a summary remedy by distress. 1 Rob. Pr., old ed. 362-3, and cases cited. But although interest was not given, of course it might, nevertheless, be given under circumstances to be judged of by the jury; and in case of a general verdict allowing interest, it was intended

65 that sufficient circumstances existed to justify an allowance thereof. Id. But this rule has been changed by an act passed March 2d, 1827, which provides "that interest shall hereafter be allowed on rent in arrear from the period or periods at which the whole or any portion thereof shall become due." Id. Acts of 1826-'7, p. 26, ch. 27, § 3. Since the passage of this act, there seems to be no difference between debts due for rent, and debts due for any other valuable consideration as there certainly should not be. In the Code, p. 969, ch. 134, § 7, the words of the law are: "In any action for rent, or for such use and occupation, interest shall be allowed as on other contracts." We know that in the United States the law favors the recovery of interest more than in England; and as a general rule here, where a debt is due, it will bear interest, which is an incident of the debt, and follows it as shadow does the substance. That rent is what is called "estimated," can make no reasonable difference. Rent must be estimated where the precise amount has not been fixed by agreement. But why may it not be estimated as the value of any other consideration may? See Eppe's ex'or v. Cole & wife, 4 Hen. and Mun. 161, and Sutton v. Mandeville, 1 Munf. 407. The statute expressly provides, that a landlord may by action recover "a reasonable satisfaction for the use and occupation of lands;" and the same section of the statute provides, as above mentioned, that in any such action "interest shall be allowed as on other contracts." In this case, a large portion of the rents was applied as they accrued to the payment of what was due to Bolling on account of the bills endorsed by him, and thus stopped interest. Of course there can be no objection to that, nor can there be any objection, in reason or 66 justice, to an allowance of interest on the rents which afterwards accrued and remained in arrear.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and that it ought to be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

67 *Wallace v. Richmond, Assignee.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

Judgment by Default—Negligence of Defendant—Relief in Equity.*—W is sued by R in debt on the note of *Equitable Relief—Negligence.—In Ayers v. Morehead, 77 Va. 586, the rule is laid down in accordance

B & Co. He employs counsel to defend the suit, and states to him that he never was a partner of B & Co., or in any way liable for the debt. He lives in the county, but pays no further attention to the case. At the next term of the court the counsel examines the docket, and though he sees a case of R against B & Co., he does not suspect that that is the case against W, and therefore does not examine the papers; and no plea being entered, the office judgment is confirmed. Equity will not relieve W.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Norfolk county by George T. Wallace, to join a judgment which had been recovered against him by L. V. Richmond, as assigned of E. Richmond. It appears that in September 1868 L. V. Richmond, assignee of E. Richmond, instituted an action of debt in the County court of Norfolk county against George T. Wallace, John Black and William Shannon, as late partners under the name and style of Black & Co., upon a note for $2,133.22, bearing date April 12th, 1865, and signed Black & Co. The process was served on Wallace, but Black and Shannon living in North Carolina, the process was returned as to them "not found." No appearance or plea having been entered or filed for Wallace at the December term of the court, the office judgment against him was confirmed.

The ground of equity relied on by Wallace is, that he was never a member of 68 the firm of Black & Co., *and was not on any ground liable either on the note or for the debt for which the note was given. That when served with the process he spoke to James Murdaugh, a lawyer practicing in the court, and who had been for years, and was then, his standing counsel, telling him of the suit, and the ground of his defense, and directing him to defend the suit. That at the December term of the court Murdaugh examined the docket of the court, and though he saw a case on the docket in the name of Richmond, assignee v. Black & Co., it did not occur to him that this was the case against Wallace, and therefore did not examine the papers; and thus the case was not defended, and the office judgment was confirmed. Wallace states in his evidence that he showed the process to Murdaugh when he spoke to him to defend the case; but this Murdaugh did not remember. It does not appear that Wallace paid any attention to the case after with the decision in the principal case that where a party, through his own or his agent's or attorney's negligence fails to avail himself of a defence which he might have made at law, he will not be relieved in equity, citing the principal case and Haseltine v. Walton & Buckey, 16 Gratt. 120; Green & Suttle v. Massie, 21 Gratt. 358; The Marine Insurance Co. v. Hodgson, 7 Cranch 338; Richmond Enquires Co. v. Robinson, 24 Gratt. 552; Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 408. See also, Dey v. Martin, 78 Va. 1; Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 26; Holland v. Trotter, 22 Gratt. 141; Canada v. Barksdale, 84 Va. 746; 4 Min. Inst. he spoke to Murdaugh, but he lived in the county, and might have been reached in time to make the defense by plea, if Mr. Murdaugh had found the case on the docket.

The cause came to be heard on the 4th of April 1872, when the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill, with costs. And thereupon Wallace applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Scarburgh & Duffield, for the appellant.

Goodwin & Crocker, for the appellee.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in chancery to injoin a judgment at law. In general, any facts 69 which prove it to be against *conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or agents, will authorize a court of equity to interfere by injunction to restrain the adverse party from availing himself of such judgment. (2 Stor. Eq. Jur., § 887, and cases cited.) The author here declares the rule affirmatively, that the injured party may be relieved in equity in the cases described.

In Tapps' adm'or v. Rankin, 9 Leigh 478, the rule is negatively declared, setting forth under what circumstances the party injured will not be entitled to relief in equity by Parker, J., who delivered the opinion in which a majority of the court concurred. The rule, he says, is well settled, "that after a trial at law, if there appear to be no fraud or surprise on the part of the plaintiff, equity cannot relieve the defendant from the consequences of mere negligence, notwithstanding it may be manifest that great injustice has been done him at law. If it appears that by proper diligence he could have defended himself successfully, however hard his case, equity must not interfere; and this upon sound principles of policy, which no court is at liberty to disregard.

In the recent case of Holland & wife v. Trotter, 22 Gratt. 136, relief was given upon the ground of surprise, but upon principles, which are stated by Judge Christian who delivered the opinion of the court, entirely consistent with Tapp's adm'or v. Rankin, supra.

In this case the court is of opinion that the facts upon which the plaintiff relies to show that it would be against conscience to execute the judgment at law, might have

70 been relied on in his defense at law; and *that he does not show that he was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with fault or negligence in himself or his agent, from availing himself of them in his defense at law. It is true, that after the writ was served on him he retained counsel to defend the suit, and informed him of the grounds of his defense, to wit: that he was sued as a partner of Black & Co., and was not, and never was, a partner or member of said firm, or in any way liable for said debt. But he gave no further attention to the suit. It does not appear that he ever spoke to his counsel again on the subject, or made any preparation for his defense, though he was probably at the place where the court was held during the term. His counsel entered no plea to set aside the office judgment, and made no defense whatever, and judgment went against him by default.

His counsel says he examined the docket, and saw no case upon it of Richmond, assignee v. Wallace. He saw the case of Richmond, assignee against Black & Co., but it never occurred to him that the appellant was sued in that case, and he did not look into the papers to see. Yet he had been informed by the appellant that he was sued as a member of that firm, and that his ground of defense was, that he was not, and never had been, a member of it; and he thinks he showed him a copy of the summons which had been served on him. His counsel says he did not remember to have been shown a copy of the summons, and was not aware that the appellee was interested in that suit, else he would have looked into the papers and entered a plea. But a plea denying the partnership could not have availed for his defense unless verified by affidavit; and the defendant was not there to make affidavit.

But being informed as to the character of the appellant's defense, and knowing 71 from the date of the summons *and its service, that in the regular course of procedure the case would be on the office judgment docket at that term of the court, it does appear extraordinary that he made no inquiry about the case. If he had inquired of the clerk, he, doubtless, would have been informed. It seems to the court a plain case of negligence on the part of the appellant's attorney, not unmixed with fault or negligence on his part. And without deciding that mere inadvertence or forgetfulness on the part of the attorney would deprive a party of his right to relief in equity, where the defendant himself had used proper diligence, and was chargeable with no laches, the court is of opinion that a court of equity could not interfere by injunction in this case to restrain the execution of the judgment, and to give the appellant another trial, who has already had his day in court, without overturning the well established rule in such cases. The decree of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

72 *Hill & als. v. Rixey & Starke & als.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

I. Statute—Construction.—The act of March 2, 1866, Sess. Acts 1865-'66, p. 191, ch. 77, § 1, "to preserve and extend the time for the exercise of certain civil rights and remedies," is retrospective in its operation, and applies in favor of a judgment creditor as to the docketing of his judgment.

II. Stay Law—Application.—The act of March 2, 1866, Sess. Acts 1865-'66, ch. 69, p. 180, called the stay law, does not apply to a judgment creditor to relieve him from the necessity of docketing his judgment.

III. R recovers a judgment against G in 1860, but it is not docketed until December 1868. W and others recover judgments against G in 1861 and 1865, which were docketed in November and December 1865 and in 1866. In November 1865 G conveys land in trust to secure other creditors, and in the same month it is left with the clerk to be recorded, but not being stamped, and the tax on the deed and fee for recording not being paid until November 1867, it is not admitted to record until that time—Held:

1. Registry Laws—Failure to Docket Judgments—

Priorities.*—The deed having been recorded before the judgment of R was docketed, the lien of the deed has priority over the judgment of R.

2. Same—Same—Same.—The deed was not of record until November 1867, though left with the clerk in November 1865; and the judgments of W and others having been docketed before the deed was recorded, they have priority over the deed.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Culpeper county, instituted in October 1869 by Rixey & Starke, merchants and partners, and as such judgment creditors of Williamson C. George, to subject certain real estate of George to satisfy their judgments. The defendants, beside George, were creditors claiming under a deed of trust from 73 him to secure their *debts, and other judgment creditors of said George; and as the property was not sufficient to pay all the debts, the question in the cause was as to the respective priorities of the creditors.

It appears that Rixey & Starke recovered their judgments against George in November 1860, and that they were docketed on the 11th of December 1868. Wm. B. Wayland and three others recovered judgments in March 1861; and they were docketed on the 11th of December 1865. A number of judgments were recovered by other parties in May, June and November of the same year, and they were docketed on the 3d and 9th of November 1865. And still other judgments were recovered subsequent to these last, and were docketed in December 1865 and in 1866.

The deed of trust from George to John C. Turner bears date the 21st of November 1865, and was acknowledged before a justice of the peace of Albemarle county, where the trustee lived, on the 23d of the same month; and it was delivered to the clerk of Culpeper to be recorded, but not being stamped, and the tax upon it and the fees for recording not having been paid, the clerk did not consider it as an office paper on record until the 6th of November 1867, when being made perfect in these respects it was recorded.

When the cause came on to be heard, the court held that the creditors by judgments were to be paid in the order of the date of their judgments, and that the creditors claiming under the deed of trust were to be postponed to all the judgment creditors. And at a subsequent day a decree was made appointing commissioners to sell the land. And thereupon E. B. Hill, one of the creditors claiming under the deed, applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Field & Gray, for the appellees.

Staples, J. The appellees, Rixey & Starke, recovered judgments to a considerable amount against Williamson C. George, at the November term 1860, of the County court of Culpeper. These judgments were docketed on the 11th December 1868. Other creditors obtained judgments against the same debtor, some of which were recovered during the war, and others after its termination. These latter were, however, not docketed until 1865 and 1866.

On the 21st November 1865 the same Williamson C. George executed a deed of trust upon his real estate to secure the payment of certain debts therein enumerated. This deed was delivered to the clerk of the county on the 8th December 1865, but the stamp tax and registration fees not being paid, it was not recorded until the 6th November 1867.

The controversy in this case is between these judgment creditors on the one hand, and the trust creditors on the other, the latter claiming as purchasers under the deed of trust just referred to. The question is one of priority of lien, to be decided almost exclusively by the provisions of our own statutes.

It is conceded that as against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, no judgment operates as a lien upon real estate unless it is docketed within a year from its date, or ninety days before a conveyance to such purchaser. Code of 1860, § 8, chap. 186.

It is insisted, however, that the acts of March 2d, 1866, and the several acts amendatory thereof, save to creditors the benefit of their liens during the period

75 *these acts were in force, although the judgments were not docketed in *Registry Laws—Failure to Docket Judgments—Priorities.—In Rhea v. Preston, 75 Va. 758, the court, citing the principal case, states the law as follows: "Judgments for money, whether docketed or not, bind the unalliened lands of the debtors, certainly those owned by him at the date of the judgments, and, it may be those subsequently acquired, in the order in which the judgments are recovered, and the same is true of decrees for money; and so though not docketed, they bind the debtor's land subsequently aliened to a purchaser with notice, even though he be a purchaser for value, but unless docketed, they are not liens on lands subsequently aliened to bona fide purchasers for value without notice—and a trustee in a deed of trust given to secure a debt and the creditors secured are purchasers for value within the meaning of our registry laws." See also, Borst v. Nalle, 28 Gratt. 427, citing the principal case. The principal case is distinguished in Eldson v. Huff, 29 Gratt. 338, and Lucas v. Claffin, 76 Va. 282.

conformity with the provisions of the statute. One of these acts is entitled "an act to preserve and extend the time for the exercise of certain civil rights and remedies." Acts of 1865-'6, page 191. The first section of this act is very comprehensive in its terms. It declares that the period between the 17th April 1861, and the 2d March 1866, shall be excluded from the computation of the time within which by the terms of any statute or rule of law it may be necessary to commence any action or other proceeding, or to do any other act to preserve or prevent the loss of any civil right or remedy, or to avoid any fine, penalty or forfeiture."

Now it is very clear that "docketing a judgment" is "an act to be done." By the provisions of the 8th section, chapter 186, Code of 1860, already cited, it is to be done within twelve months from the date of the judgment, or ninety days before a conveyance. That it is directly within the saving of the first section of the act of March 2d, 1866, above quoted, does not, I think, admit of a question. The proposition is too plain for argument. My opinion therefore is, that the period between the 17th April 1861, and the 2d March 1866, is to be excluded wholly from the computation in determining whether the judgment was docketed in sufficient time to preserve the lien. It was so decided by the special Court of Appeals in the case of Hart et als. v. Haynes.

The learned counsel for the appellees, as I understand, does not deny that this is the effect of the first section of the act of March 2d, 1866; but he insists that as the judgment liens were lost under existing laws by the failure of the creditors to docket their judgments, the liens could not 76 be restored by subsequent *legislation as against bona fide purchasers. In other words, the legislature could not by a retrospective statute divest rights acquired under previous laws.

The act of March 2d, 1866, is, however, a mere repetition or re-enactment of the provisions contained in the acts of March 14th, 1862, and of February 23d, 1864. All these acts embrace a period either of actual war, or the subsequent disorganization of the courts consequent thereon. That it is competent for the legislature to pass remedial statutes of a retrospective character, applicable to such a state of society, can be maintained both upon reason and upon authority. The necessity and validity of such legislation have been recognized by all governments and in all countries which have been the theatre of great civil conflicts. Statutes of this sort merely afford remedies for evils originating in the disorganization of society, when the laws are supposed to be silent, and the courts are closed against the assertion of civil rights.

It is however unnecessary now to discuss the constitutionality of the act of March 2d, 1866, and other acts of a kindred character. Their validity has been fully sustained by this court in Strother et als. v. Hull, 23 Gratt. 652; Sexton v. Crocket & als., Id.

857. The question must be considered as settled in this state.

As already stated, the judgments recovered by Rixey & Starke were not docketed until the 11th December 1868. It is very clear that the act just adverted to is not sufficient to preserve the lien of these judgments. That act was wholly retrospective in its operation, and did not extend beyond the 2d March 1866. The question is, whether the lien is preserved by any other statute. It is insisted that they are within the spirit, if not the letter, of the act of March 2d, 1866, known as the stay law. This act is entitled "an act to 77 stay the *collection of debts for a limited period." Although the title cannot be relied on to restrain or control the positive provisions of a statute, yet when the meaning is at all doubtful the title may be looked to to aid in the interpretation. Here the title plainly indicates that the object of the statute was merely to restrain the collection of debts during the period of its operation. The preamble plainly indicates the same restricted purpose. It states with some minuteness of detail, the great pecuniary distress inflicted upon the state by the disastrous results of the war, in the destruction of property and currency, in the want of means, efficient labor, and implements for agricultural purposes, and the strong appeal made by this condition of things to the legislature to interpose and prevent the ruinous results that would inevitably follow from forced sales of property. It was therefore enacted that no executions should issue, and no sales be made under judgments, deeds of trust or mortgages, whilst the act was in operation. This language plainly shows, what indeed is manifest throughout the act, that the intention was a mere suspension of the legal rights and remedies of creditors for a limited period. The legislation was not curative, but preventive in its character. Inasmuch, however, as the creditor was thus deprived of the ordinary legal remedies for the collection of his debt, it was but just and reasonable that he should be also relieved of the duty of instituting any proceeding to prevent the operation of the statute of limitation. As he could issue no execution, he ought not to be required to bring any suit. The seventh section was therefore inserted, which declares: "The period during which this act shall remain in force shall be excluded from the computation of the time within which, by the operation of any statute or rule of law, it may be necessary to commence any 78 proceeding *to preserve or prevent the loss of any right or remedy."

It will be borne in mind that the other act of March 2d, 1866, first mentioned, known as "the act to extend the time for the exercise of certain civil rights and remedies," excludes from the computation the time "for doing any act" required by any statute or rule of law. Those words, "the doing any act," it will be observed, are omitted in the seventh section of the stay law, just cited, and the words "to commence any proceeding" are alone retained. This change or difference of phraseology in the two acts passed on the same day, and relating somewhat to the same subject matter, very plainly indicates a difference of legislature purpose, a clear design that the one statute should not be as broad and comprehensive as the other.

The docketing a judgment is in no just sense of the term "the commencement of a proceeding." The recordation of a deed might, with equal propriety, be so considered. If the creditor was to be excused from docketing his judgment, merely because he could take no steps to enforce it, the same indulgence was due to the mortgagee or trust creditor, who was similarly situated. Every reason or consideration of public policy which applies to one equally applies to the other.

A few moments reflection will satisfy us that the legislature could not have committed so grave an error as to dispense with the docketing of judgments during the long period the stay law might continue in force. The existence of that law was of uncertain duration. It was impossible to say how long the necessities or the temper of the people might require its continuance. While indulgence was necessary to the debtor, it was equally important to him to provide for the 79 discharge of his constantly accruing liabilities. The personal *property being to a great extent destroyed, this could only be done by an advantageous sale of his real estate. But who would buy property encumbered with secret liens of unknown amount and number, which might be enforced after the lapse of years to the utter ruin of the purchaser.

The law requiring judgments to be docketed is an enactment of great public utility, founded upon the same considerations of public policy as the laws requiring the recordation of deeds, title bonds and marriage contracts. By discountenancing secret trusts and liens they encourage the sale of property, and protect the rights of innocent purchasers. The very fact that the judgment could not be enforced was an additional reason for requiring it to be docketed. The creditor might justly claim that the indulgence granted the debtor should not impair his legal rights and remedies; but he could not justly claim that this indulgence should also release him (the creditor) from a compliance with the laws intended for the protection of third persons. The object of the seventh section was to prevent the bar of the statute in favor of the debtor, but not to relieve the creditor of the duty he owed to innocent purchasers. In this view I am sustained by the opinion of Judge Bouldin in Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 862.

In reference to the stay law he says: "Its purpose was to prevent the sacrifice of property of the citizen by sales under execution in the impoverished condition of our people, and to save them from the expense of law suits as far as practicable by discouraging litigation. But as indulgence to the debtor might become hazardous to the interests of the creditor by exposing his claim to the bar of limitation, it became necessary to make some provision by which indulgence 80 might be *extended with safety to the creditor, and, to effect this, the seventh section was enacted." Judge Anderson concurred in Judge Bouldin's opinion throughout. Judges Moncure and Christian dissented from so much of it as held that the seventh section of the stay law applied to appeals; but they did not dissent from the observations which I have quoted. They may therefore be regarded as the views of the four judges who sat in that case.

For these reasons I think the judgments recovered by Rixey & Starke do not constitute valid liens as against the creditors claiming under the deed of trust. Under the decisions of this court these creditors must be held to be purchasers, entitled to all the rights and remedies accorded to persons of that class. Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739.

It is true that the deed of trust was not recorded until 6th November 1867; but in the interval between its date and recordation no new rights attached, no additional liens were created upon the property in controversy. It was certainly a valid deed, from the date of its registration. The lien acquired under it must have precedence of the judgments of Rixey & Starke, which were not docketed until more than a year thereafter.

The other judgments were rendered and docketed before the deed of trust was admitted to record on the 6th November 1867. It is said, however, that the deed must be considered as recorded from the day of its delivery to the clerk. This was the 8th December 1865. But as the proper revenue stamps were not then affixed, nor the tax and registration fees then paid, the clerk was under no obligation to record the deed. All the cases which hold that the instrument is 81 to be regarded as actually recorded from the time of delivery to the *clerk, proceed upon the idea, that the party has done all that is incumbent upon him to do, and nothing remains to be done as a prerequisite to the recordation. This, of course, cannot be predicated of a conveyance which is deposited in the office without pre-payment of the necessary fees and charges imposed by authority of the government.

It is further insisted that the recordation of the trust deed was entirely unnecessary, because the judgment creditors do not occupy the position of purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. The language of the statute is however very emphatic, that a deed of trust or mortgage is utterly void as to creditors unless recorded, whether they have or have not notice. The purchaser, or rather the creditor, claiming as a purchaser, under the trust deed, can only acquire title against the lien of the judgment by the recordation of the conveyance. According to this view, all the judgments, except those of Rixey & Starke, have priority over the deed of trust. They were either docketed within the twelve months after their rendition, or they are within the influence of the act of March 2d, 1866, first mentioned, "to preserve and extend the time for the exercise of certain civil rights and remedies."

It is objected to this view, that it in effect gives to subsequent judgments precedence of those prior in date; whereas as between creditors the judgments take effect in the order of time, whether docketed or not. This is true, but it is because the registration laws so provided. A judgment creditor may lose his lien as against a purchaser by a failure to docket, and a subsequent creditor to him may preserve his judgment lien against the same purchaser by a prompt compliance with the statute. In such case the purchaser takes precedence of the prior though not of the subsequent 82 *judgment. This is the necessary result of the preference given to him who is most vigilant in the exercise of his rights. The books are full of familiar illustrations of the rule.

For these reasons I am of opinion the decree of the Circuit court should be reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded with in conformity with the views herein expressed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Staples, J.

Decree reversed.

Absent, MONCUBE, P.

1. Railroad Co. Charter—Right to Use Steam in City Streets.—The charter of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company does not in express terms, or by necessary implication, vest in the company the right to propel her engines by steam through the streets of a city without the consent of the corporate authorities of the city; and the charter of the city of Richmond giving to the council of the city the authority to prevent the propelling of the cars of a railroad company by steam through the streets of the city, provided no contract is thereby violated, the council may prohibit said railroad company from the use of steam in propelling their cars in the streets of the city.

2. Corporations—Municipal Control—Police Power.—A corporation, except where it is otherwise provided in its charter, expressly or by clear implication, in the use of its property, the exercise of its powers and the transaction of its business, stands upon the same footing as individuals, and is subject to the same control under the police powers of the state or a municipal corporation.

By an ordinance of the council of the city of Richmond, it was ordained that on and after the first day of January 1874, no car, engine, carriage, or other vehicle of any kind, belonging to or used by the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, shall be drawn or propelled by steam upon that part of their railroad or railway track on Broad street east of Belvidere street in said city, under a penalty of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, to be recovered before the police justice of the city of Richmond.

84 *The railroad company being of opinion that under their charter, and the action of the council of the city in 1834, they had the right to use engines to propel their cars from their depot and warehouse, at the corner of Broad and Eighth streets along Broad street, continued their use on their road in that street; and the company was summoned before the police justice to answer the charge of violating said ordinance. The case came on to be heard on the 17th of January 1874, when the justice held that the ordinance was valid, and imposed upon the company a fine of five hundred dollars.

The company thereupon took an appeal to the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, where the judgment was affirmed; and they then applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas; which was awarded. The case is sufficiently stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

The case was argued by Steger, P. V. Daniel, and Ould & Carrington, for the appellants, and L. Page, Lyons and Burwell, for the appellee.

Christian, J. This case is before us upon a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, affirming a judgment of the police justice of said city, imposing a fine upon the plaintiff in error for running its cars propelled by steam upon Broad street east of Belvidere street, in violation of a city ordinance passed September 8th, 1873.

This ordinance is entitled "an ordinance to amend the third section of an ordinance to regulate the use of Broad street by the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company;" and is in the following words:

85 "Be it ordained by the council of the city of Richmond, *that section three of an ordinance passed May 13th, 1872, entitled an ordinance to regulate the use of Broad street by the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, be amended and reordained so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 3. That on and after the 1st day of January 1874, no car, engine, carriage, or other vehicle of any kind, belonging to or used by the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, shall be drawn or propelled by steam upon that part of their railroad or railway track on Broad street east of Belvidere street in said city. The penalty for failing to comply with this section shall be not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars for each and every offence, to be recovered before the police justice of the city of Richmond."

See Davenport & Morris v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 438.

The plaintiff in error (the railroad company) admits the violation of this ordinance, but contends that the ordinance is invalid, because it is in violation of its chartered rights.

On the other hand, the city of Richmond claims that it has the right, not only under the general police power vested in it as a municipal corporation, which antedates and overrides the charter of the railroad company, but under authority conferred upon the city council, by act of the legislature amending the city charter, to the exercise of the complete and absolute authority to regulate the use of Broad street by the said railroad company.

The legislature, by an act providing a charter for the city of Richmond, approved May 24th, 1870, vested in the council of said city the power "to prevent the cumbering of streets, avenues, walks, public squares, lanes, alleys or bridges, in any manner whatsoever," and the power "to deter-

86 mine and designate the route *and grade of any railroad to be laid in said city, and to restrain and regulate the rate of speed of locomotives, engines and cars upon the railroads within said city, and may wholly exclude said engines or cars if they please; provided no contract may be thereby violated."

It is insisted by the counsel for the railroad company, that this provision of the charter of the city of Richmond cannot be executed against it, because it is excluded from its operation by the proviso; inasmuch as by its charter it has the right by contract forever, and under all circumstances, to run its cars by steam through the whole length of Broad street to its depot and terminus at the corner of Eighth and Broad streets.

The question therefore we have to determine is, whether the ordinance of the city council is void and invalid because it is in violation of the chartered rights of the said railroad company and therefore violates the obligation of the contract between the state and the said railroad company, as evidenced and declared by said charter of incorporation.

We are therefore called upon to examine carefully the provisions of that act, and to determine whether the state has by an ever-continuing contract committed itself for all time to this railroad company to run its cars propelled by steam through the heart of the capital city of the commonwealth, and through the most important and populous street of that city, without regard to the safety, comfort and convenience of its citizens, and without regard to the general prosperity and welfare of the whole city.

The Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of the legislature of the state passed February 25th, 1834.

This act provided, that under the 87 direction of certain *persons therein named, books should be opened at Richmond, Fredericksburg and other places, "for the purpose of receiving subscriptions to the amount of seven hundred thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each, to constitute a joint capital stock, for the purpose of making a railroad from some point within the corporation of Richmond, to be approved by the common council, to some point within the corporation of Fredericksburg; and for the purpose of extending the same, should the company hereby incorporated, at the commencement of the work or at any time afterwards, deem it advisable to do so, from its termination within the town of Fredericksburg to the Potomac river or some creek thereof, and for providing everything convenient and necessary for the purpose of transportation on the same." Sess. Acts 1834.

The only other section of the act (which comprises thirty-eight sections), necessary to be referred to, is the twenty-fourth section, which is as follows:

"Sec. 24. The president and directors, or a majority of them, shall have power to purchase with the funds of the said company, and place on the railroad constructed by them under this act, all machines, wagons, vehicles, carriages and teams of any description whatsoever, which they may deem necessary and proper for the purpose of transportation."

These are the two sections of the act upon which the railroad company relies, to show that the ordinance of the city council is void and invalid as to it, because they create a contract which is perpetual with the state, permitting them to run their engines for all time on Broad street. These two sections will be considered more particularly presently.

The record further shows, that on the 22d December 1834, at a meeting of the 88 president and directors of the *Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad Company, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas, by the act incorporating this company, it is requisite that the point at which the railroad terminates, within the corporation of Richmond, should be approved by the common council, and it appears to the board most expedient to conduct the same from the Richmond turnpike along H street (now Broad street) to a point at or near the intersection of the said street and Eighth street, and for the present to terminate the same by suitable connections with the contemplated warehouses and workshops of the company on lots Nos. 477, 478, purchased by them from John Heth: Therefore,

"Be it Resolved, That the approbation of the city council be requested to the above plan.

"Resolved, That the president cause a copy of the foregoing resolutions to be transmitted to the city council," &c.

In response to these resolutions of the president and directors of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, the city council on the 23d December 1834 adopted the following preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas, by a resolution of the president and directors of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, submitted to the common council, it appears that it is deemed most expedient by the president and directors to conduct the said railroad from the Richmond turnpike along H street, to a point at or near the intersection of said street and Eighth street, and for the present to terminate the same by suitable connections with the contemplated warehouses and workshops of the company on lots Nos. 477, 478, purchased by them from John Heth:

89 *Resolved, That the common council do approve the proposed location of the said railroad, and the present termination of the same as described in the foregoing resolution, and authorize the prosecution of the said work within the limits of the city on the above locations: provided, that in locating the said railroad no injury shall be done to the water pipes now laid in and along said street: provided further, that the corporation of Richmond shall not be considered as hereby parting with any power or chartered privilege not necessary to the said railroad company for constructing said railroad and connecting the same with the depot of said company within the limits of the city."

These proceedings of the city council, and the two sections of the act of incorporation above quoted, constitute the foundation of the claim on the part of the railroad company, of a perpetual and irrevocable contract between the state and that company, by which for all time, and under all circumstances, they may run their cars propelled by steam through one of the principal and most populous streets of the capital city of the commonwealth.

It will be conceded, that if such contract exists at all, it originated in the two sections of the act of incorporation and proceedings thereunder above quoted. These, therefore, require a careful and candid consideration.

It is apparent that by the first section of the act incorporating the railroad company, the legislature delegated to the city council of Richmond the powers to select the terminal point within the corporate limits of the city, and under this act the railroad company could only locate its terminus at such point within the city of Richmond as should be approved by the city council. This plain

90 construction of the first section is recognized *and acted upon by the president and directors of the railroad company when they declare, in the resolutions adopted by them and sent to the city council, that "it is requisite that the point at which the railroad terminates within the corporation of Richmond should be approved by the city council."

And the city council in approving the terminal point, suggested by the president and directors of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, adopted it (the intersection of Eighth and Broad streets) as the then "present termination of the same," and upon the express condition "that the corporation of Richmond shall not be considered as hereby parting with any power or chartered privilege not necessary to the railroad company for constructing said railroad, and connecting the same with the depot of said company within the limits of the city."

Upon this construction of the first section, and with these plainly expressed conditions, asserting in emphatic terms the chartered powers and privileges of the corporation of the city of Richmond, the railroad company adopted the corner of Eighth and Broad streets as the terminal point within the city of Richmond from which they should build their road, and on which they built their depot and warehouses, &c.

In the resolutions approving the terminal point (without which approval the railroad company could not have commenced their work beginning within the corporation of Richmond,) we find the express and positive reservation of all the chartered rights and powers of the municipality. These included an absolute and entire control over the streets of the city, excepting only the privilege to the railroad company of constructing and connecting their road with the depot on Broad street. Not a syllable is re-

91 corded about the mode or *manner of transportation, whether by horse-power or steam, the entire regulation of that subject being reserved to the corporation with the rest of its chartered powers.

It is argued, however, that the twenty-fourth section of the act of incorporation above quoted, giving to the company the power "to purchase and place upon their road all machines, vehicles, &c., of any description whatsoever, which they may deem necessary and proper for the purposes of transportation," confer upon the company the authority to run locomotives within the city limits. This reasoning is altogether inconclusive and illogical. If the assent of the city council had been absolute and unconditional, this view would not have been sound. It is manifest that this twenty-fourth section is a general provision extending to the whole road. The road passes through the counties of Henrico, Hanover, Caroline and Spotsylvania. The legislature did not require these counties to give their assent to the construction of the road, because these counties have no chartered rights and privileges; and in these counties the railroad company acquired not only a right of way, but an absolute right of property in their road, and necessary property acquired in those counties, because, as empowered by their charter, they condemned the lands of individuals for these purposes, and paid them an equivalent in money. But the legislature did require the assent of the city authorities before the company could lawfully pass its boundaries. Within the limits of the city of Richmond all the right which the company acquired was the right of way over the street for transportation of passengers and freight. This right was subject to the right inherent in the municipal authorities to control the use of the streets, and to protect the safety, comfort and

It is worthy of remark, that the city council have, ever since its approval of the terminal point in 1834, constantly asserted their right to prohibit the introduction of steam engines into the city. In 1845, after much contention for years on the subject between the railroad company and the city authorities, on motion of Mr. Wickham, one of the most distinguished citizens, as well as one of the most learned lawyers of the city, the following resolution prepared by him was adopted by the city council.

“Resolved, That the council of the city of Richmond not only maintains its right to prohibit the use of locomotives within the city whensoever it shall appear expedient to do so, but in contradiction to all allegation to the contrary they do most positively deny all responsibility to indemnify the railroad company for any such exercise of its legitimate powers. They admit no other right in this respect on the part of that company but to a favorable and indulgent consideration—a claim which, from its nature, becomes less and less the longer it is favored.”

Up to the present time the city council have repeatedly and constantly asserted their right to prohibit the use of locomotives within the city limits, which they might or might not exercise in their own discretion, according as the safety and welfare of the citizens should require.

This right was as firmly maintained and confidently asserted under the general 93 chartered powers, and the *rights inherent in every municipal corporation to guard and protect the safety of the citizens, and to regulate the use of the streets of the city, from the very inception of the construction of the railroad, as it is now, when, by the amended charter above referred to of the city, special power is conferred upon the city council to regulate the rate of speed of locomotives, engines and cars upon the railroads within the city, and to wholly exclude said engines and cars if they please; provided no contract will be thereby violated.” But the railroad company confidently rely upon this proviso; and it is earnestly argued, that the adoption by the legislature of this proviso was a recognition of the claim of the railroad company to run their locomotives on Broad street for all time. This pretension is unreasonable and illogical. The only fair and legitimate inference to be drawn from the adoption of this proviso is, that the legislature, aware of the controversy between the city authorities and the railroad company on this subject, left it as an open question for the courts to decide, whether the chartered powers and privileges of the corporation of Richmond had been so modified and restricted by the act of incorporating the Richmond, Fredericksburg and

Potomac Railroad Company, as to deprive the corporate authorities of the right to prohibit the company from running steam engines on the streets of the city. This question was not intended to be decided by the legislature, but was reserved as a judicial question. The legislative declaration by the amended charter was simply that the city council should have power to regulate the speed of locomotives and remove them altogether, if in so doing no contract was violated. And the question as to the violation of the contract rights of the com-

94 pany is by that proviso submitted *to judicial determination; and that is the main question now submitted to this court.

Now it must be borne in mind that when the act incorporating the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company was passed by the legislature in 1834, the charter of the city of Richmond was then in existence; and certainly none of the provisions of that charter were repealed by the adoption of the act incorporating the Richmond company; but remained in full force and effect. By the charter of the city, the corporate authorities are invested with the power to make and establish such by-law, rules and ordinances, not contrary to the constitution or laws of the commonwealth, as shall by them be thought necessary for the good ordering and government of such persons as shall from time to time reside within the limits of said city and corporation, or shall be concerned in interest therein.” Not only were they invested with these chartered rights, specifically conferred by the terms of the charter, but with all those powers and privileges which by law are inherent in every municipal corporation, to guard the safety and promote the comfort and welfare of the citizens of the corporation.

The railroad company accepted the charter not only subject to existing laws and chartered corporate powers vested in the corporation of Richmond, but they adopted the terminal point of their road within the corporate limits approved by the city council, with the express reservation “that the corporation of Richmond shall not be considered as parting with any power or chartered privilege not necessary to the railroad company for constructing the said road,” &c.

It is conceded that a charter granted to a corporation by the state may be, according to its terms, a contract between the state and corporation, the obligation of

95 *which cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation; but at the same time while this is conceded, it is also certainly true that corporations, like natural persons, are subject to remedial legislation, and amenable to general laws. Private corporations, even without any express reservation of the powers over them by the legislature in their charters, are subject, like individuals, to be restrained, limited and controlled in the exercise of their powers by such laws as the legislature may pass, based upon the principles of safety to the public.

It is well settled, and cannot now be disputed, that the legislature may control the actions, prescribe the functions and duties of corporations, and impose restraints upon them to the same extent as upon natural persons, subject, of course, to the limitation of not impairing the obligation of contracts made between the corporation and the state. See Redford on Railways 428, and note and cases there cited.

"A corporation is," in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. R. 518, "the mere creature of the law; it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence." And as was expressed by the same great judge in Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Peters' R. 514: "Any privileges which may exempt a corporation from the burdens common to individuals do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist."

A cardinal rule, in the interpretation of charters of incorporation, is thus laid down by Mr. Justice Grier in Richmond Railway Co. v. The Louisa Railway Co., 13 How. U. S. R. 71. "Public grants are to be construed strictly, and any ambiguity in 96 the terms of the grant *must operate against the corporation and in favor of the public; and the corporation can claim nothing but what is clearly given by the act."

In Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Peters' R. 420, 548, Chief Justice Taney enforcing the same rule said: "The continued existence of a government would be of no great value, if by implications and presumptions it was disarmed of the powers necessary to accomplish the ends of its creation, and the functions it was designed to perform transferred to privileged corporations." And this eminent jurist concludes his discussion of the subject by the declaration, "that no claim in any way abridging the most unlimited exercise of the legislative power over persons natural or artificial can be successfully asserted except upon the basis of an express grant in terms or by necessary implication."

Applying these rules of law and canons of interpretation to the charter of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company, it is clear that there is nothing in the privileges and franchises conferred by that charter which prevents the legislature either of itself (or through a municipal corporation to which it has delegated its authority), from prescribing rules and regulations for the exercise of those privileges and franchises. And it is equally clear that the authority granted in the charter of incorporation, to construct a road "from a point within the corporation of Richmond, to be approved by the city council to a point within the corporation of Fredericksburg," and the authority "to place upon said road machines and other vehicles necessary for the purposes of transportation," do not constitute a contract by which the said company may for all time run their engines upon 97 Richmond, and which perpetually *prohibits legislative interference and control. Nor upon the most liberal rules of interpretation can it be said that the charter has conferred such extraordinary and unlimited powers upon this corporation, either "by express grant in terms or by necessary implication." Certainly there is no such express grant in the charter of incorporation. It cannot be implied from the fact that one of its terminal points was to be within the corporate limits of Richmond. The power to lay its track and move its cars through one of the streets of the city does not necessarily imply the power to move them by steam, nor does the authority to use steam engines on their road necessarily imply a perpetual grant for all time to run steam engines through the most populous streets of the city.

To give to the charter such an interpretation, would be to hold not only that the legislature had deliberately violated the chartered rights of the principal and capital city of the commonwealth by depriving it of the power to protect the public safety and promote the public welfare, but that the legislature had tied its own hands, and placed this corporation above and beyond the reach of the law. Before we can reach such a conclusion, we must see in the charter itself either an express grant in terms, or one which arises from the most patent and necessary implication. Seeing neither, I am forced to the conclusion that it was competent for the legislature to confer upon the city council the power "to regulate the rate of speed of locomotives, engines and cars upon the railroads within the city of Richmond, and to wholly exclude said engines if they please;" and that the ordinance passed in conformity with this act is valid.

Nor do I perceive that this ordinance is unreasonable and oppressive, and for 98 that reason, as was argued by *the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, ought to be set aside.

This company was chartered more than fifty years ago. At that time much of what is now known as Broad street was a mere turnpike, neither graded nor paved, with, scattered here and there, houses on each side. It is now one of the most attractive and populous streets in the city. It being the most level and the widest street, and one most convenient to that part which contains the largest number of private residences, Broad street has now become the principal street, for the shop and retail business of this growing city. There is not only on this street a large and constantly growing resident population, but crowds are attracted to it, every day, and all hours of the day, from all parts of the city, especially ladies and children, from the fact that this street has now become the great mart for supplying the wants of families, in the varied and multiform retail business, necessary to meet the wants of a populous and growing city.

It is not therefore "unreasonable" that the city council, should, under this change of circumstances, prohibit the use of steam engines on this street.

The voluminous evidence taken in this case not only shows, that these locomotives had the effect to injure the business and general prosperity of this principal street, and consequently of the whole city, but it is also proved that notwithstanding the great care and watchfulness with which this railroad has been managed, the use of steam power has been the occasion of many fearful accidents.

And under the general police power inherent in every municipal corporation (independent of the special powers conferred by the legislature "to regulate the rates of speed" of these engines "or to remove *them if they please") the city council might well exercise this authority. The general police power existing in the legislature, is transferred to every municipal corporation to be exercised by it, for the protection of the safety and general welfare of the citizens of such corporation, and in the exercise of such authority the municipal legislature (the city council) must of necessity be invested with a large discretion. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. R. 213; Fisher v. Harrisburg, 2 Grant's (Pa.) cases 291; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. R. 547; Commonwealth v. Robertson, 5 Cush. R. 431. As was said by Mr. Justice Barbour, in City of New York v. Miles, 11 Peters R. 102, 139, in speaking of the general police power of a State—"By virtue of this it is not only the right but the bounden and solemn duty of a state to advance the safety, happiness and prosperity of its people and provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation which it may deem to be conducive to these ends, where the power over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise is not surrendered or restrained." All those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what may perhaps, more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered or restrained; and consequently in relation to these the authority of the state is complete unqualified and exclusive.

This police power, says Chief Justice Redfield, in Thope v. R. & B. R. Co., 27 Verm. R. 140, 149, "extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the state. It must of course be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not to injure others." The same eminent judge and 100 author says in his valuable *work on the Law of Railways: "There are confessedly certain essential franchises of such corporations (railroad companies) which are not subject to legislative control; and at the same time it cannot be doubted that these artificial beings or persons, the creations of the law, are equally subject to legislative control and in the same particulars precisely as natural persons. Railroads—so far as the regulations of their own police affecting the public safety, both as to life and property, and also the general police power of the state as to their unreasonable disturbance of, and interference with, other rights, either by noise of their engines in places of public concourse, as in the streets of a city, or damage to property, either in public streets or highways—there can be no question whatever, are subject to the right of legislative control." 2 Redf. on Rail. § 232. And again, referring to the case of Buffalo & Niagara Falls Railroad v. City of Buffalo, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 209, the author says: "It has been held that a statute giving power to a common council of a city to regulate the running of cars within the corporate limits, authorizes the adoption of an ordinance entirely prohibiting the propelling of cars by steam through any part of the city. We should entertain no doubt of the right of the municipal authorities of a city or large town to adopt such an ordinance without any special legislative sanction, by virtue of the general supervision which they have over the police of their respective jurisdictions. Such must have been the opinion of the court in the case last referred to. Nelson, C. J., says: "A train of cars impelled by the force of steam through a populous city may expose the inhabitants and all who resort thither for business or pleasure, to unreasonable perils; so much so that unless conducted with more than 101 human *watchfulness the running of the cars (in that mode) may well be regarded as a public nuisance." Ib. § 250, p. 646.

In "Pierce on American Railroad Law" the doctrine on this subject is thus succinctly and clearly laid down under the head of "Police Laws:" "A railroad company, although no power is reserved to amend or repeal its charter, is nevertheless subject, like individuals, to such police laws as the legislature may from time to time enact for the protection and safety of citizens, and the general convenience and good order. These laws although imposing liabilities and duties on the company other than those contained in its charter or existing when it was granted, do not impair the obligations of the contract implied therein.

Its property and essential franchises are indeed protected by the constitution, but the company itself is not thereby placed above the laws. It seems not to have been the design of that instrument to disarm the states of the power to pass laws to protect the lives, limbs, health and morals of citizens, and to regulate their conduct toward each other. Such laws may incidentally impair the value of franchises or of rights held under contracts, but they are passed diverso intuitu and are not within the constitutional inhibition."

Without multiplying authorities on this point I will simply refer to the following cases. Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cowen R. 349; Coates v. Mayor N. Y. Id. 585; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. R. 184; 10 Barb. R. 245; 45 Maine R. 560; 5 Hill R. 209.

But it is insisted by the learned and able counsel for the appellants, that the ordinance of the city council complained of, takes from the company one of its essential franchises, and seriously affects their rights of 102 *property without compensation, and is therefore void and invalid.

It has already been shown that upon a fair construction of the charter of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, there was no contract either express or implied, by which the state bound itself for all time and under all circumstances, to permit this company to run its locomotives through the streets of the city; and that the ordinance violated no contract rights of the company.

Does it violate any essential franchise? and does it appropriate any property of the company? Clearly not. The ordinance does not prevent the company from making its connections with the depot on Broad street, but only regulates the mode by which these connections are to be made. It only declares that these connections shall not be made by steam. It only says to the company that the public safety and the general welfare of the city, in the opinion of the city council, (who are competent to judge of this matter, as the municipal legislature), requires now that the locomotives shall no longer traverse this most important street, because it exposes the inhabitants to unreasonable and constant perils and seriously affects the prosperity of the whole city. In doing this the city council are acting within their legitimate powers. They have violated no chartered rights; they have interfered with no essential franchise; nor can the railroad company claim any compensation; for in so doing the city council have not appropriated for the public use one dollar of the property of the company. It may be the company may in a certain sense, and to some extent be the loser by this ordinance; but upon well established principles they have 103 no claim to compensation, *because there is here no appropriation of the company's property, or violation of its essential franchises, but only a regulation of the mode in which their chartered rights and franchises may be exercised; and the company, like natural persons, must be subject always (unless protected by chartered rights or constitutional inhibition), to the salutary and all-pervading maxim of the law sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. The law is well established, by indisputable authority, and the universal assent of an enlightened jurisprudence, that every person (artificial as well as natural) holds his property subject to the limitation expressed by this maxim, exercised either by the legislature directly, or by public corporations to which the legislature may delegate it. Laws and ordinances relating to the safety, comfort, health, convenience, good order and general welfare of the inhabitants are comprehensively styled "Police Laws and Regulations." And it is well settled, that laws and regulations of this character though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights are not unconstitutional, though no provision is made for compensation for such disturbances. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. If he suffers injury it is either damnum absque injuria or in the theory of the law he is compensated for it by sharing in the general benefits which the regulations are intended and calculated to secure. The citizen owns his property absolutely it is true; it cannot be taken from him for any private use whatever, without his consent, nor for any public use without compensation; still he owns it subject to this restriction; namely, that it must be so used as not to injure others, and that the sovereign authority may by police reg-

 104 ulations, *so direct the use of it, that it shall not prove pernicious to his neighbors or to the citizens generally.

These regulations rest on another maxim salus populi suprema est lex. This power to restrain a private injurious use of property is very different from the eminent domain. Under the latter, compensation must always be made. But under the former, it is not a taking of private property for public use, but a salutary restraint of a noxious use by the owner contrary to the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." See Dillon on Corporations, p. 209, 210; and cases there cited.

In Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. R. 53, Chief Justice Shaw, in an able and exhaustive opinion, in which the police power as contradistinguished from the right of eminent domain, is discussed and is peculiarly applicable to this case, says: "We think it is a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well ordered civil society, that every holder of property however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. * * * Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment, as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the constitution, may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and ap-105 propriate private *property to public use, whenever the public exigency requires it, which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power, the power vested in the legislature by the constitution to make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes and ordinances either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth and of the subjects of the same."

There are many cases in which such a power is exercised by all well ordered governments, and where its fitness is so obvious as to be recognized by all as reasonable and proper. Such are the laws to prohibit the use of warehouses for the storage of gunpowder near habitations or highways, to restrain the height to which wooden buildings may be erected in populous neighborhoods, and require them to be covered with slate or with incombustible material; to prohibit buildings being used for hospitals for contagious diseases, or for the carrying on noxious or offensive trades; to prohibit the raising of a dam, and causing stagnant water to spread over meadows near inhabited villages, thereby raising noxious exhalations injurious to health and dangerous to life. And so, upon precisely the same principle a railroad company may be prohibited from running their cars propelled by steam through the crowded streets of a populous city, thereby subjecting property to serious injury and human life to constant and unreasonable perils.

Nor does the prohibition of the noxious use of property, although it may diminish the profits of the owner, make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle the owner to compensation. If the owner of a warehouses in the midst of a city could store in it quantities of gunpowder he might save the expense of transportation and storage at a distant point. If a landlord could let his building for a smallpox hospital, or a slaughter-house he might obtain an increased rent. If a railroad company is permitted to run their cars through the streets of a city propelled by steam, it might be less expensive and more convenient than if the same were drawn by horses. But all these are restrained, not because the public have occasion to make the like use, or make any use of the property, or to take any benefit or profit to themselves for it, but because it would be a noxious use contrary to the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas.

It is not an appropriation of the property to a public use but the restraint of an injurious private use by the owner, and is therefore not within the principle of property taken under the right of eminent domain. This distinction is manifest in principle and is recognized by unquestioned authority. Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. R. 53; Commonwealth v. Teuksbery, 11 Metc. R. 55; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. R. 184; Wadleigh v. Gillman, 12 Maine R. 403; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. R. 349; Coates v. Mayor &c., New York, 7 Cow. R. 585; 1 Dillon on Corporations § 93, pp. 209-210; 2 Ib. § 565, and cases there cited.

I am of opinion for the reasons given, that the ordinance complained of is within the scope and power of municipal authority—that this power has not been unreasonably or oppressively exercised—that the ordinance merely preventing the use of locomotives on the streets does not impair the obligation of any contract, nor violate the charof the railroad company and that it is therefore valid and of full force and effect.

The judgment of the Circuit court should be affirmed.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Decree for Sale of Land—Appeal—Appointment of Receiver.*—After a decree for the sale of real estate to satisfy creditors having liens thereon, and an appeal from that decree by the debtor, the court below in which the suit was pending, may appoint a receiver to take possession of the property and rent it out, and collect the rents, until the further order of the court &c.
2. Sergeant as Receiver—Official Bond as Security.—If the sergeant of the city in which the property is located, is appointed the receiver, it is not necessary to require him to give security for the faithful performance of his duty, as it is covered by his official bond. Code of 1873, p. 1124, ch. 174, § 5.

This is a supplement to the case of Moran v. Brent & als. reported in 25 Grattan 104. After the decree had been made in that case for the sale of the property, and Moran had obtained an appeal from that decree, the Corporation court of Alexandria, in which the first decree was made, upon the petition of creditors of Moran who were parties in the suit, made a decree appointing the sergeant of the city the receiver of the court, and directing him to take possession of the real estate in the proceedings mentioned, and to rent it out and collect the rents, until the further order of the court &c. From this decree Moran applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Smoot, for the appellant.

*Decree for Sale of Land—Appeal—Power of Receiver.—The principal case is expressly reaffirmed in Adkins v. Edwards, 88 Va. 316, in respect to the rule that after a decree to sell real estate to satisfy liens and appeal from that decree, the court below may appoint a receiver to rent out the real estate. See also, Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 781; Bristow v. Home Building Co., 91 Va. 29. In Cralle v. Cralle, 81 Va. 775, the principle case and Littlejohn v. Ferguson, 18 Gratt. 58, are cited for the following statement of the law: "Although, perhaps, an appeal in a chancery cause does not here, any more than in England, stop the proceedings under the decree from which the appeal is taken, yet there can be no manner of doubt but that the effect of an appeal, when fully perfected by execution of the proper supersedeas bond, is to deprive the subordinate court of all power over the parties and subject matter of the controversy, until the cause is remanded back for its further action; and the only orders, therefore, which that court can rightfully make are such as are needful for the preservation of the res and rights of the parties pending the appeal."

This is a branch of the case of Moran v. Brent & als., decided at the March term 1874 of this court. It is an appeal from an order made in that cause, after the decree was pronounced from which the appeal is taken, and pending the appeal, to put the real estate, which was sought to be subjected to the payment of the appellant's debts, into the hands of a receiver, to be by him rented out, until the rights of the parties in respect to that subject were determined.

A receiver may be appointed, though not prayed by the bill, if the circumstances of the case require it; and the application may be granted after decree, if a state of facts entitling the party to a receiver appears upon the proceedings in the cause. 2 Danl. Ch. Plead. & Prac. 1734. And it being grantable after decree, the pendency of an appeal from the decree is no reason why the application should not be granted, when it does not conflict, but is entirely compatible, with the grounds on which the appeal was allowed. In this case, the appeal was allowed upon the ground that the sale of the property, upon which there were various creditor liens, was decreed before the amounts and priority of those various liens were ascertained; and upon that ground the decree was reversed by this court. If the execution of the decree for the sale had not been prevented by the appeal, there would have been no necessity for a receiver. So far from the application, after the appeal was allowed, to put the property into the hands of a receiver to be rented out, being repugnant to the appeal, it was made necessary by the appeal, and could only be granted by the court of original jurisdiction.

110 "The original papers remain in the Circuit court after an appeal, and there is *no difficulty in reinstating the case on the docket when a petition for rehearing is filed;" which may be done while the appeal is pending, and does not involve the dismissal of the appeal. Both may proceed contemporaneously. And if there should be an appeal from the decree upon the rehearing, both appeals may be depending at the same time. James Riv. & Kan. Co. v. Littlejohn & c., 18 Gratt. 53, 71, Joynes, J. Though after a final decree, and appeal therefrom to the appellate tribunal, the cause may be no longer pending in the court of original jurisdiction, it may in certain cases be brought up and restored to the docket, upon a petition for rehearing, pending an appeal; a fortiori it may, upon a petition for the appointment of a receiver, to preserve the fund, pending the litigation, which does not involve any matters litigated by the appeal. In Spring & als. v. The South Carolina Insurance Company, 6 Wheat. R. 519, it was held, as stated by the reporter, that in an equity case, the res in litigation may be sold by order of the Circuit court, and the proceeds invested in stocks, notwithstanding the pending of an appeal.

But it is assigned as error in this case, that the receiver was not required to give security. Mr. Daniel in his work on Pleading and Practice says: "A person to be appointed receiver must, unless otherwise ordered, first give security, to be allowed by the judge to whose court the cause is attached, duly to account for what he shall receive, on account of the rents and profits for the receipt of which he is appointed, at such periods as the judge shall appoint, and to account for and pay the same as the court shall direct." By the decree or order in this case James M. Stewart, the city sergeant of Alexandria, is appointed receiver, with power to rent out the said premises, and to collect the *rents and profits thereof, until the further order of the court, and he is required to account for, and to report to the court the money he may receive, and how he has disposed of the same, &c. The sergeant of the city being appointed the receiver in this case, that requirement may be regarded as having been complied with, as it is provided by § 5, ch. 174, of the Code of 1873, p. 1124, that "any sheriff, sergeant, or other officer, receiving money under any order or decree, shall pay the same as the court may order; and if he fail so to do, he and the sureties in his official bond shall be liable therefor." The court is of opinion that it was a proper case for the appointment of a receiver, 2 Rob. (old) Prac. p. 385, citing Coles' adm'r v. McRae, 6 Rand. 644; and that the decree ought to be affirmed, with costs.

Decree affirmed.

*Eacho v. Cosby.

March Term, 1876, Richmond.

1. Court of Appeals—Jurisdiction—Amount in Controversy.—E files his bill against the administratrix of C, to obtain possession and sale of property conveyed by C in trust to secure a debt to E of $1000. E charges that there is still due to him $640. The answer denies that there is any debt due from C to E. The property was not worth $500. As the existence of the debt is involved in the decision of the case, the Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of the case upon appeal by E.
2. Equity Jurisdiction.—In the progress of the suit in the court below a part of the property is sold under a decree by consent, and the proceeds deposited in bank to the credit of the cause, and the rest of the property is by like consent, decreed to the defendant upon her giving bond with security to pay $300.

*Court of Appeals—Jurisdiction—Amount in Controversy.—See Campbell v. Smith, 32 Gratt. 288, and note, citing the principal case; 4 Min. Inst. (3rd Ed.) 1068, and cases cited.

Trust Deeds—Insufficiency of Trust Property to Pay the Debt—Personal Liability of Grantor.—In Watkins v. Dupuy, 87 Va. 87, the principal case is cited, for the proposition that where property upon which a deed of trust is given to secure a debt is insufficient to pay it, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, the beneficiary is a creditor of the grantor for the deficiency.

upon a decision in favor of the plaintiff. If the case was not one of which equity had jurisdiction originally, yet the court having taken jurisdiction and taken possession of the property and disposed of it, must proceed to decide the case.

3. Deeds of Trust—Validity as Security.—The deed of trust purports to be given to secure a note for $1000 given for the loan of that sum by E to C. Though the note may not have been delivered by C to E, yet if he owed E a debt for which the note was to be given the deed is a valid security for it.

4. Same—Same—Appeal—Reversal.—The enquiry before the commissioner being as to the execution and delivery of the note spoken of in the deed, and the commissioner reporting that there was no satisfactory evidence of the delivery, and the court having dismissed the bill, the decree will be reversed and the cause sent back for an enquiry whether C was indebted to E in a debt intended to be secured by the deed.

5. Witnesses—Competency.—The trustee in the deed is made a party plaintiff with E, in the original bill, but his name is omitted in the amended and supplemental bill. He is under the statute a competent witness to prove what passed between C and E and himself as to the preparation of the deed and note; he under the circumstances not being liable for the costs.

6. Same—Same.—The deed provides that upon a sale of the property by the trustee he shall receive five per cent. upon the amount of the sales. As all the property has been disposed of by the court, and the trustee therefore can never sell it, even if his right to commissions on a sale by him would render him an incompetent witness, it cannot affect his competency under the circumstances of this case.

In November 1870 Andrew Jenkins and Edward D. Eacho filed their bill in the Chancery court of the city of Richmond against Eliza Cosby in her own right and as administratrix of A. J. Cosby, in which they set out that on the 29th of March 1869 one Andrew J. Cosby, of the city of Richmond, applied to said Eacho for a loan of $1000, which said Eacho loaned to him in good and legal currency of the United States; and that on the same day said Cosby executed a note payable to Eacho for the sum of one thousand dollars, payable eleven months after date, at the Planters National Bank of Richmond. That at the same time Cosby made and executed a deed of trust dated the 25th of March 1869, by which he conveyed to said Jenkins, the following personal property viz: one close carriage and harness, one open buggy and harness, two bay horses, one brown horse, one bay horse with one eye, one bay mare and colt and one cow, then in the use and possession of the said Cosby at his stable in the city of Richmond, in trust to secure the said note from Cosby to the said Eacho; and upon the failure to pay the said note when it fell due, the trustee, upon the request of said Eacho, should sell the said property; and upon such sale the trustee should have a commission of five per cent. on the whole amount of sale, &c.

The bill further states that the note was not paid when it fell due; but at various times during the life of Cosby, he before and after it fell due, paid Eacho sundry small sums on account of the note, by which *the amount due was reduced to $640; and this amount was due when Cosby died on the — day of — 1870. That Eliza Cosby qualified as administratrix of said Cosby in 1870; and that she failed when applied to, to pay the debt. That he thereupon directed Jenkins, the trustee, to sell the property under the deed of trust, and he accordingly advertised it for sale; but when they went to the place of sale, the said Eliza Cosby and her counsel warned them from the premises, and violently and peremptorily drove them off, and prevented the sale of the property.

They further say that the property is wholly and completely in the possession of said Eliza Cosby; that she is insolvent in her own right; so that any remedy at law would be fruitless; and plaintiffs apprehend from her past conduct, that she will eloin the property and secrete it or dispose of it so that plaintiffs will be defrauded of their rights thereto. And said A. J. Cosby left no other property out of which the plaintiffs could obtain satisfaction of their debt.

The prayer of the bill was for an injunction to restrain the said Eliza Cosby, either in her own right or as administratrix, from interfering with the property mentioned in the deed of trust; and that the court would appoint a receiver to take possession of it; that all proper questions touching the rights of the plaintiffs to the property might be tried and decided by the court; and for general relief.

The court granted the injunction as prayed for, and directed the officer of the court to take possession of the property and to preserve and keep it safely until the further order of the court.

The officer reported to the court that he had taken possession of one horse, one carriage and harness, and one buggy and harness. And it was agreed between *Eacho and Eliza Cosby that the officer should sell the horse, and deposit the proceeds of the sale in bank to the credit of the cause; that he should deliver the carriage and harness to her upon her giving security which was satisfactory to the officer, for the sum of $300, to be paid to Eacho with interest, if the court should decree that the carriage and harness was embraced in the deed of trust; and that he should deliver to her the buggy and harness, Eacho laying no claim thereto.

The cause came on to be heard on the 13th of December 1870, upon the bill and exhibits, and the report and agreement aforesaid; and the court not at that time adjudicating any question touching the title to any of the property in controversy, decreed that the officer should sell the horse and deliver the carriage and harness as agreed by the parties, Eliza Cosby having given the bond, and also deliver to her the buggy and harness.

In January 1871 the defendant filed her answer. She admitted that she as administratrix came into the possession of the carriage, horse and buggy, and had them appraised as a part of her intestate's estate. She denies the right of Eacho to interfere with her possession of the property, because she does not believe there is any such note as is described in the bill in existence, and she calls for its production, if any such there be. That the carriage seized under the authority of the court is not the carriage referred to in the deed filed with the bill: that the deed describes the carriage therein mentioned as a close carriage, and this is an open carriage:—that said A. J. Cosby did have a close carriage at the time of the execution of the deed, which he afterwards sold, after as she supposes, he considered

116 the deed satisfied; as indeed he *did sell all other property mentioned in said deed, except the horse and buggy in possession of the officer. And that A. J. Cosby lived nearly nine months after the maturity of the note aforesaid, and never did she hear one word of complaint from plaintiff about her husband's disposing of the property mentioned in the deed, or of any effort on his part to enforce the provisions of said deed until since his death. On the 25th of February 1871 the court made an order referring the cause to a commissioner with instructions to ascertain and report:

1st. Whether the note in controversy was actually given as alleged in the bill; and if given, whether the same, or any part thereof, has been paid; and if any amount has been paid thereon, what amount, and what is still due; and all the evidence produced before him touching the existence of said note.

2d. Whether the property taken by the sheriff under the restraining order in this cause, is, in reality, a portion of the identical property embraced in the deed of trust; and any other matter deemed pertinent to the issue, or demanded to be reported by either of the parties.

In May 1831 the commissioner returned his report, and with it the evidence before him. A part of this evidence was the depositions of the plaintiffs Eacho and Jenkins; which were excepted to by the defendant.

The commissioner in his report refers to this exception, and considers it well founded: the parties testifying to matters relating to the note and deed of trust, and Cosby the other party to these transactions being dead. And rejecting that testimony he reports that upon the first enquiry, the evidence in the cause is not sufficient to show that the note

117 in controversy was actually given as alleged in the bill. And upon the *second enquiry, the carriage and harness being the only portions of property in controversy, the evidence was not sufficient to show that the carriage and harness taken by the sheriff, is in reality a portion of the identical property embraced in the deed of trust. The plaintiff Eacho excepted to the report of the commissioner so far as it excluded the evidence of Jenkins. He also asked that the report might be recommitted on the ground of after discovered evidence. And he filed his affidavit stating that he had discovered evidence as to the identity of the property, and giving the names of the witnesses.

In January 1872 the cause came on to be heard upon the papers formerly read and the report of the commissioner, with the exception thereto, and upon the affidavit of Eacho; and thereupon the plaintiff asked leave to file his amended and supplemental bill; which application was opposed by the defendant; and the court allowed him to file the bill upon his paying the costs of the reference to the commissioner; which was done. And thereupon the defendant filed her demurrer and answer to the same; and the plaintiff replied generally to the answer, and joined in the demurrer. And by consent the cause came on again to be heard, when the court overruled the demurrer, and recommitted the report to the commissioner, and directed him to report all the facts and circumstances attending the making the contract, the note and deed of trust mentioned in the original and amended bill, and whether the note in controversy was ever executed by A. J. Cosby, and if executed what has become of the same; and whether the property taken by the receiver is the same, or a portion of the same conveyed in the said deed of trust, and other matters, &c.

118 The amended and supplemental bill is by Eacho *alone. In this bill he states that when he loaned the money to Cosby, he employed Andrew Jenkins, a real estate agent in Richmond, to act as trustee and take the said note. Jenkins drew said deed and note, and reported the transaction with Cosby as complete; and as he said nothing about the note plaintiff supposed he as his agent had kept it. And thus supposing when it became necessary to apply for the injunction, plaintiff supposing that Jenkins had the note, charged the existence of it in the bill. He says by way of amendment and supplement of said bill, that he was mistaken in supposing that the said note was delivered. He now charges that the note was not delivered to him or to said Jenkins, through the inadvertence of said Cosby; plaintiff being unwilling to think that the same was fraudulently withheld. Plaintiff nevertheless charges that the debt was contracted as alleged in the bill for borrowed money; and that it is unpaid except as admitted in the original bill, and is now a valid and subsisting demand against Cosby's estate, fully evidenced and secured by said deed of trust. He believes the note was among Cosby's papers when he died, and since then has been and may be now in the possession of his administratrix. And he calls upon her to say whether or not the note has been or is now in her possession, and if so to produce it.

In her answer the defendant says she does not believe that said Eacho loaned to her said husband A. J. Cosby, on the 25th of March 1869, or at any other time, one thousand dollars, or any other sum of money, as alleged in said original and amended bills, and she calls for proof of any indebtedness of her late husband to said complainant. That no such note as that described in complainant's bill has ever been seen by her among her said husband's papers, or 119 ever came *into her possession; and she cannot believe that complainant would have loaned her husband one thousand dollars without taking from him a note acknowledging his obligation for the same.

The commissioner returned his report with the additional evidence taken, and says that the pleadings and evidence in the cause since his former report, were not sufficient to induce him to come to a different conclusion from that before reported, and therefore he reports:

1st. That the note in controversy was not executed by said A. J. Cosby deceased.

2d. That the carriage and harness now in controversy, and which were taken into custody by the receiver in this cause, was not a portion of the same property which was conveyed by the said A. J. Cosby to Andrew Jenkins, trustee, by the deed filed with the bill.

This report was excepted to by the plaintiff.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 27th of February 1872, when the court overruled the plaintiffs exception to the commissioner's report, and confirmed the same, and after authorizing the defendant to check for the sum of $74.47 deposited in bank by the receiver as the proceeds of the sale of the horse, dismissed the bill with costs. And from this decree Eacho applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Excluding the testimony of Eacho and Jenkins, there was little evidence of the indebtedness of Cosby to Eacho, except that furnished by the deed of trust. That states the trust to be—"to secure to Edward D. Eacho, of the city of Richmond, the payment of the sum of one thousand dollars due by note drawn by the said Andrew J.

Cosby, and payable eleven months
 120 *after date, and negotiable and payable at the Planters National Bank of Richmond." The deed was admitted to record on the 23d of April 1869 upon the acknowledgment of Cosby in the office. Jenkins proves his preparation of the deed and note at the request of Cosby, who stated that he owed Mr. Eacho some money, and that he had purchased a new carriage, and Mr. Eacho was going to let him have some more money to pay for it, upon condition that he Cosby was to execute a deed of trust upon that and some other property for the sum of one thousand dollars.

The most of the other testimony related to the identity of the carriage taken by the officer of the court with that mentioned in the deed; and as to that the evidence was unsatisfactory. It seemed to be strongly probable, if not certain, that the carriage in the possession of the officer was purchased in May 1868.

H. A. & J. S. Wise, for the appellant.

Guy & Gilliam and Spilman, for the appellee.

Staples, J. The first question which is presented at the threshold is the objection to the jurisdiction of this court. It is insisted that the only matter in controversy is in reference to the property in dispute, which is of less value than five hundred dollars. But this is an entire misconception. It is true that the main object of the bill is to recover the property embraced in the deed of trust, and to subject the same to the appellant's lien; but the claim asserted by him amounts to six hundred and forty dollars. The justice of this claim is controverted by the appellee, and was the subject of adjudication in the Chancery court. That court was of opinion the claim was 121 not sustained *by the evidence, and entered a decree dismissing the bill, without passing upon the questions arising in respect to the property. If we affirm that decree, the appellant is forever barred of recovering his debt. If we reverse upon the merits, a decree will be rendered in his favor for the amount claimed by him, or for such further inquiry as may ultimately lead to such a decree. So that in fact the principal matter in controversy here does not relate to the identity of the property, but to the validity of a claim greatly exceeding the amount necessary to the jurisdiction of this court. It would be difficult to imagine a case coming more directly within the principle governing the jurisdiction of this court.

The next ground of objection is, that the appellant has a plain and adequate remedy at law. The bill is filed by a creditor in a deed of trust against the personal representative of the debtor or grantor in the deed. The bill avers that the trustee attempted to take possession of the property with a view to a sale, but was forcibly prevented from so doing by the appellee and others combining with her; that the appellee is insolvent; that her securities upon her official bond are not responsible for the torts of the appellee in illegally detaining the trust property; and that strong reasons exist for believing that she will elude or so dispose of it as to place it beyond the reach of the process of the court. None of these allegations are denied in the answer, though the justice of the debt is strongly controverted. They may, therefore, be taken as true for all the purposes of the question of equity jurisdiction. These facts taken in connection with the loss or absence of the note referred to in the bill, I am inclined to think would have justified the jurisdiction of equity, 122 if nothing else had occurred. *However this may be, it appears that no objection was made in the court below upon this ground. In the progress of the cause an order was entered by consent for the sale of a part of the property, and another part was taken by the appellee under an agreement to account for its value in the event of an adverse decision; so that it is simply impossible for the appellant or the trustee now to maintain an action for the property. In this state of things to dismiss the bill for the want of jurisdiction, would be to deny the appellant redress in any form. This court having control of the fund, ought to go on and administer it according to the rights of the parties. Upon this point Henly's adm'r v. Perkins, 6 Gratt. 615, is a direct authority.

The next question is as to the correctness of the decree upon its merits. The learned judge of the Chancery court was of opinion, that "as the deed of trust refers to a negotiable note as the direct evidence of the debt, in order to complete that evidence it is incumbent upon the appellant to show that the note was not only executed by Cosby but delivered also; for although the deed of trust was recorded, the transaction was not consummated and complete until the note was delivered." The learned judge is certainly correct in stating that delivery is essential to the validity of a negotiable note. But the question of delivery is only important when the action is on the note, or it is sought to charge one who is only liable by reason of being a party to the instrument. When a debt exists independent of the note, the action is often upon the original consideration. If one is indebted to another for goods sold or money loaned, and executes therefor an instrument which is invalid, or which is never delivered, I imagine there can be no question as to the creditor's right of recovery upon the original cause of

executes a deed of trust or mortgage to secure the debt, and in the deed refers to a note, it will scarce be maintained that the deed is a nullity because there is a failure, fraudulently or negligently, to execute and deliver the note. The true inquiry is does the debt exist? is it due? When this is satisfactorily ascertained the form of the security is important so far only as it affects the remedy. It is not essential there shall be any bond or note whatever. The deed of trust or mortgage will be valid without any other evidence of the debt than is furnished by its own recitals. As was said by Mr. Justice Story in Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sum. R. 94, the true question is whether there is still a debt subsisting between the parties capable of being enforced in any way in rem or in personam. 2 Nash on Real Prop. 48, 49.

In this case the non-delivery of the note is a material circumstance proper to be considered in determining whether a debt is due. It may more or less tend to throw discredit upon the appellant's claim; but it cannot invalidate the deed if that claim be a just one. Whether it is or not is the only subject of inquiry. Upon this point the learned judge was of opinion that the deed of trust is not conclusive: that it is not even a direct, distinct affirmation that the sum named in the deed is due. Let this be conceded. It is certainly an acknowledgment of an existing indebtedness. Such an acknowledgment would furnish sufficient evidence of the loan, in the absence of any countervailing or explanatory evidence. It must be admitted that such evidence does exist in this case. Whilst, however, it was not sufficient to justify a dismissal of the bill, it was sufficient to throw upon the appellant the onus of showing the amount of his advancements to or for 124 the appellee's intestate. The *cause was not ready for a hearing when the decree was rendered in the then existing condition of the pleadings and evidence. The inquiry directed by the chancellor was in reference to the delivery of the note. It is apparent that he was of opinion, as was the commissioner, that proof of such delivery was essential to the maintenance of the appellant's claim. This form of inquiry was well calculated to direct the attention of the parties from the real issue and proper subject of investigation. As before stated, that issue is not whether the note was actually delivered, but whether there was an actual loan of money, and the amount of such loan.

For these reasons I think the decree of the Chancery court must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with these views. In that court the case must be recommitted to a commissioner, with instructions to state such legal testimony as the parties adduce, to require any discovery, and the production of any books and papers pertinent to the issue which either party may require of the other, and finally to report all the facts and circumstances bearing upon the question of the alleged loan.

Before concluding this opinion it is proper to notice the objection made to the evidence of Jenkins, the trustee. The commissioner was of opinion that he is incompetent, and refused to consider his testimony. The chancellor in his opinion says Jenkins' evidence is perhaps admissible. I must confess my inability to understand the grounds of this supposed incompetency. The statute declares "that no trustee or executor or other fiduciary shall be incompetent in any case by reason of being a party thereto, or of his being liable to costs in respect thereof, but if liable to costs, he shall not be com-125 petent unless some person *undertake to pay the same." The trustee was a party plaintiff in the original bill; but it is apparent he was a mere formal party, and the suit was substantially that of the creditor or cestui que trust. The name of the trustee was omitted in the amended bill filed by the leave of the court, and no longer appears in the proceedings as a party. Under these circumstances I do not think he is responsible for costs. The only remaining objection that can be urged is, that the trustee is entitled to commissioners. By the express provisions of the deed he only receives these upon a sale made by him. This cannot be done now or hereafter inasmuch as the property has been sold under the orders of the Chancery court, or by agreement of the parties placed beyond any control of the trustee. If therefore the trustee's right to commissions creates a valid objection to his competency (as to which no opinion is expressed), that objection has been removed by the circumstances just adverted to. I cannot perceive therefore that the trustee has even a contingent interest in the result.

In regard to the identity of the property I do not deem it proper or necessary to express any opinion, as the case is to be remanded and the parties may produce additional evidence upon the question.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Staples, J.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the decree of the Chancery court is erroneous; wherefore it is adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the appellee, out of 126 the assets in *her hands to be administered, do pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And the court being of opinion that further investigation is essential to the justice of the case, doth order and direct that the report of commissioner Evans be recommitted to him, with instructions to inquire and report what sum or sums of money, if any, were advanced by the appellant to the appellee's intestate prior to or subsequent to the deed of the 25th of March 1869, and intended to be secured thereby, and the dates of such advancements respectively, and also any credits to which the appellee is entitled. To that end the commissioner shall take any legal evidence adduced before him, shall examine either of the parties on oath, if desired by the other, and require the production of any documents or papers pertinent to the issue. The said commissioner is also required to report specially any facts and circumstances which he may deem proper, or which may be required by either of the parties. The said commissioner is also authorized if desired, to make the like inquiries, and report in regard to the identity of the property, which is the subject of controversy, and claimed to be included in the said deed of trust.

Decree reversed.

*Mott v. Carter's Adm'r.

1. Contract for Sale of Land—Confederate Money.—A

Confederate contract for the sale and purchase of land in May 1863 upon a credit of one, two and three years, in which it was held that the value of the land at the time of the contract was the most just measure of recovery; and one-third of the purchase money having been paid, the vendee must pay two-thirds of the value of the land at the time of the sale, with interest.

2. Suit by Administrator—Heirs as Parties.*—Bill by

*Heirs as Parties.—In Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 45, it was held that in a suit by a judgment creditor to subject lands in the hands of a bona fide purchaser from the vendor, if pending the suit the purchaser dies, his heirs are necessary parties. See Gallatin Land Co. v. Davis, 44 W. Va. 115, 28 S. E. Rep. 749.

the administrator of the vendor against the vendee, to subject the land to pay the balance of the purchase money. Vendee answers, and insists that the heirs of the vendor should be made parties; but the court below, without requiring this to be done, makes a decree for the sale of the land. Upon appeal this court amends the decree, and directs that the heirs shall be made parties before a sale of the land, and then affirms it with costs to the appellee.

In May 1863 Wm. S. Carter sold to Charles D. Mott a tract of land in the county of Pittsylvania, including one hundred and thirty-four acres, for which Mott executed to him his three bonds, dated the 25th of May 1863, each for $700, payable in one, two and three years, in current money of Virginia. Mott was put into possession of the land, and paid off the first bond within the year. No deed seems to have been made by Carter to Mott conveying the land to Mott.

Wm. S. Carter died in 1870, and Robert W. Carter qualified as his administrator; and in April 1872 he filed his bill in the Circuit court of Pittsylvania county, against Mott, to subject the land for the payment of the unpaid purchase money. He insisted 128 that though it may have been a contract with reference to Confederate *States treasury notes as the standard of value, the land was at the time of the sale worth from four to five dollars in gold or its equivalent, and would at any time since the sale have sold for more than that, upon reasonable time. And therefore he insisted that the fair value of the land was the just measure of recovery.

Mott answered the bill, admitting his purchase of the tract of land, which he said contained one hundred and thirty-three or four acres, at the price of $21 in Confederate money, and payable as above stated. He says he is informed and believes, and therefore charges that at the time of the sale by Wm. S. Carter to him, he had no title to said land, and he calls for proof on that subject. And he insists that the land shall not be sold without making the heirs of the intestate parties to the suit. He denies that at the time of the sale the land was worth four or five dollars in gold or silver, or that upon reasonable time it would have sold for more at any period since said purchase. And he protests strongly against the claim to the value of the land as the just measure of compensation, instead of the value of the Confederate money when it fell due.

A number of witnesses were examined as to the value of the land at the time of the sale, and the lowest valuation was three dollars per acre, and the highest was six; though this was as to its present value, which it was thought was enhanced by the running of the railroad from Lynchburg to Danville, within a mile or two from it.

The cause came on to be heard on the 6th of June 1872, when the court held that the contract for the sale of the land was a Confederate contract; but that the true and fair value of the land was the most just measure of recovery for the balance of the purchase money, the defendant having paid 129 one-third thereof. And *being of opinion from the testimony, that the land was worth five dollars per acre, decreed that the defendant C. D. Mott might at his election discharge the other two bonds for the second and last payments, at the rate of five dollars per acre; and that unless he should in writing, to be filed with the clerk of the court within thirty days from the date of the decree, elect to take the land on these terms, by paying the plaintiff in cash, or on such terms as he and the plaintiff might agree on, the amount ascertained as due upon the basis above established, that Robert W. Carter, who was appointed a commissioner for the purpose, should after advertising, &c., sell the said land at public auction on the terms of one-third of the purchase money for cash, one-third in twelve months, and the residue in two years, &c. And thereupon Mott applied to this court for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

Grattan, for the appellant.

Jones & Bouldin and Wm. M. Tredway Jr., for the appellee.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion that the contract between William L. Carter and the appellant Charles D. Mott, for the sale of the land in the bill mentioned, was entered into with reference to Confederate treasury notes as a standard of value; and that the fair value of said land at the date of the contract furnishes the most just measure of recovery in this case.

The court is further of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in fixing said value at five dollars per acre. The Circuit 130 court, however, instead of leaving *the amount of plaintiff's recovery to be settled by the parties, ought to have determined the same itself, or through the agency of one of its commissioners. That amount is easily ascertained by a simple calculation. The tract being estimated at five dollars per acre, the sum total of the purchase money would be six hundred and seventy dollars. The vendee having paid a sum equal to one-third, there is still due the sum of four hundred and forty-six dollars and two-thirds cents, to which the plaintiff is entitled, with interest thereon from the 1st day of January 1863.

The court is further of opinion that in a suit by the personal representative of the vendor against the vendee, to enforce the lien for unpaid purchase money, if the legal title has not been made, the heirs of the vendor ought to be made parties before a decree is rendered for the sale of the property. In this case it does not appear that a conveyance has been made to the vendee. In his answer the objection was explicitly made for the want of proper parties; but the objection was disregarded. In thus proceeding to direct a sale of the land before the heirs of the vendor were brought before the court, the Circuit court erred. Inasmuch, however, as only the naked legal title is outstanding in said heirs, and there is no pretense of any obstacle or difficulty in obtaining said title, the decree of the Circuit court may be so amended as to require that said heirs by some proper proceeding shall be brought before the court before any sale is made under said decree. As thus amended the decree is affirmed, with costs to the appellee, he being the party substantially prevailing in all the matters of controversy before this court.

Decree amended and affirmed.

131 *Farmers Bank of Va. v. Gunnell's Adm'x.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Negotiable Paper—Notice of Dishonor—Due Diligence.—To fix liability upon the endorser of a negotiable note, the holder must use due diligence in giving him notice of dishonor; and where the holder and endorser reside in different localities, and at the time of the dishonor, and for months before and afterwards, the usual and ordinary intercourse by mail between the two is intercepted by a state of war, the holder does not prove due diligence, by proving simply, that he deposited in his post office, on the day of the dishonor of the note, a notice of dishonor addressed to the endorser at his place of residence.

2. Same—Same—Same—Interruption of Intercourse by War.—A state of war which intercepts intercourse by the ordinary and usual course of mail between the holder and endorser of a note, excuses the holder from giving notice of dishonor so long as such interruption continues; but diligence on the part of the holder requires that he should forward notice to the endorser as soon as the interruption ceases.

3. Same—Same—Same—Same.—That the note was made endorsed and discounted in the city of Alexandria, and that at that time that city was in the firm occupation of the troops of the United States, and the endorser after endorsing the note and before its maturity returned to his home within the lines held by the forces of the Confederate States, and remained there until May 1862, nine months after the note fell due, does not excuse the holder from giving the endorser notice of protest and non-payment of the note.

4. Same—Same—Same—Same.—That at the date of the protest of a note in August 1861, up to the 10th of April 1862, the city and a portion of the county of Alexandria, where the note was discounted, was in possession of the forces of the United States, and the endorser was within the lines of the forces of the Confederate States, and that the bank, the holder of the note at Alexandria, on the 10th of April ceased its banking operations by res-

132 olutions *of its board of directors, and turned all its assets over into the hands, management and custody of three agents; and the bank never afterwards resumed its business, is no excuse for the failure to give notice of protest and non-payment.

5. For other insufficient excuses, see the opinion of the court delivered by MONROE, P.

6. The ordinance of the Virginia convention passed June 24th, 1861, which provides that in cases specified, the parties to negotiable notes, bills and checks payable in such cities and towns (as before specified), shall remain bound after the maturity of such notes, &c., without demand, protest or notice, as if the requirements of the law in that behalf had been complied with, is as to notes made and discounted before its passage, in violation of that provision of the constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall pass any "law impairing the obligations of contracts."

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court delivered by Moncure, P.

F. L. Smith and Wattles, for the appellant.

Moncure, P., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Fairfax county, rendered in an action of debt, brought by the president, directors and company of the Farmers Bank of Virginia against Eliza J. Gunnell administratrix of Joshua C. Gunnell, on a note for fifteen hundred dollars, made by John M. Johnson, dated Alexandria, May 31, 1861, payable sixty days after date, to the order of Alfred Moss, negotiable and payable at the branch of the Farmers Bank of Virginia, at Alexandria, Virginia, endorsed, first by the said Moss, and then by the said Joshua C. Gunnell by the name of J. C. Gunnell, and discounted by the plaintiffs at their said branch, for the accommodation of the maker. The action was brought 133 in October *1870. Issue was joined on the plea of nil debit, which was tried by a jury. And on the 9th day of June 1871, verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of the defendant. A bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiffs to certain rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, and was made a part of the record. The plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas, which was accordingly awarded.

The questions arising in the case are, whether due notice of the dishonor of the note was given, by the plaintiffs, the holders, to the last endorser, Joshua C. Gunnell, or his administratrix, the defendant? or, if not, whether a sufficient legal excuse for not giving such notice was shown in the case? The plaintiffs maintain the affirmative, and the defendant maintains the negative of these two propositions. They are presented by the bill of exceptions, which sets out the facts proved on the trial, and the instructions asked for by the parties respectively, and refused or given by the court. Such of the facts as appear to be material are as follows:

The plaintiffs, to maintain the issue on their part, introduced the promissory note, with the endorsements thereon as aforesaid; also the notarial protest of said note by a notary public in due form; in the certificate of which protest it was stated, that on the same day on which the notary made presentment, demand of payment and protest of the notes, to-wit: on the second day of August 1861, he deposited in the post-office at Alexandria notice of protest addressed to each endorser, informing him that he was held liable for the payment of said note, one of which notices was directed to "J. C. Gunnell, Fairfax C. House, Fairfax county, Va."

Also proved, that at the time of said endorsement and afterwards, the place 134 of residence *and post-office of Joshua C. Gunnell, was at Fairfax court-house, Virginia.

To maintain the issue on the part of the defendant, she proved, that the county and city of Alexandria, Virginia, were, on the 24th day of May 1861, taken possession of by the military forces of the United States, and was so held by them during the war, and that Fairfax court-house was in the possession of the military force of the Confederate States; that this state of things continued to exist up to, and after the maturity and protest of said note; that all regular postal communication between said points ceased from the 24th of May 1861, and until after the close of the war in 1865.

The plaintiffs thereupon proved, that Joshua C. Gunnell left Fairfax court-house on the 14th day of October 1861, and when the Confederate forces retreated from Fairfax court-house he went back with them; that he returned to Fairfax court-house about the 25th of December 1861, and remained there one day; that when the Confederate army fell back from Centreville towards Richmond, in the month of March 1862, the said Gunnell went with them; and remained within the Confederate lines till the month of July 1862, when he returned to Fairfax court-house.

The plaintiffs also proved, that the said Gunnell voted for the ordinance of secession; and that he was seen by several parties in Alexandria in the fall of 1863, remaining there continuously for one week on one occasion; and that he was taken from Fairfax court-house by the United States forces (but whether it was upon this occasion was not shown), and that whilst there he was at the post-office and had an interview with the post-master. It was further proved by the 135 said post-master, that he knew the said Gunnell well, *and that said post-master filled that office from the 1st of June 1861, until some time after the close of the war; that in 1862, he established a military mail, exclusively for the convenience of the officers and soldiers of the Federal army, and exclusively under military control, from Alexandria to Fairfax court-house, by which he sent all letters addressed to all soldiers, and to such civilians as he knew; that it was the custom and usage of his office, after the expiration of six weeks, to forward to the dead letter office at Washington, all communications remaining in his office, and which could not be forwarded to their address by reason of military operations; that it was the custom and rule of the general post-office department at Washington city, to return to the writers of the same, all letters which the officers of said department thought contained anything valuable.

The plaintiffs also proved by the cashier of the branch of the said Farmers Bank of Virginia, at Alexandria, that he was in the habit, and that it was his duty, of receiving and opening all letters of said bank, and that no letter containing the notice of protest of said note, addressed to the said Alfred Moss and Joshua C. Gunnell, was ever received by him from the dead letter office; that he ceased to be cashier of said bank on the 10th day of April 1862; and by a resolution of the board of directors of said bank, on that date the said branch bank ceased all further banking operations, and all its assets were turned over to three persons to take charge of; and that thereafter, said branch bank never resumed its banking operations.

The plaintiffs then read as evidence to the jury a check drawn by Joshua C. Gunnell, dated Alexandria, July 5th, 1862, for $750, on the branch of the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Alexandria, payable to John M. Johnson or order, and endorsed "J. M. Johnson;" which check was presented at the bank and paid. The plaintiffs further proved that in March 1862 Joshua C. Gunnell said that he was under heavy liability for John M. Johnson, and for another large debt for other parties, the payment of which would ruin him; and that in order to provide against which he had executed a deed of trust, dated March 13th, 1862, a copy of which was read in evidence to the jury, and is inserted in the bill of exceptions.

And thereupon the plaintiffs asked the court to give to the jury five several instructions, which the court refused to give; but gave another in lieu of the second. To which action of the court the plaintiffs excepted. The defendant then moved the court to give to the jury two several instructions, which the court accordingly gave; and the plaintiffs again excepted.

We will notice these several instructions in the order in which they were offered and refused or given; and express, in the same order, an opinion on the questions involved therein; and first, as to the five instructions asked for by the plaintiffs, and the one given by the court in lieu of the second.

"No. 1. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the defendant endorsed the note sued on, and the same was presented at its maturity, at the office of discount and deposit of the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Alexandria for payment, and the same was not paid, and that said note was then and there duly protested, and that notice of said non-payment and protest was deposited in the post-office in Alexandria, on the 2d day of August 1861, addressed to the defendant at Fairfax court-house, Virginia, and that the said court-house was his place of residence, then they must find for the plaintiffs."

general principle of commercial law, according to what is said in the petition for a supersedeas in this case: "that when the endorser of a note has his domicil and post-office at a distance from the bank at which the note is payable, notice of non-payment and protest duly mailed, and directed to the endorser at his regular post-office, fixes absolutely his liability. It is not necessary that the holder should show that the notice of protest ever reached the endorser; and under the rule above stated, it is, indeed, wholly immaterial whether he ever received it or not. The posting the letter containing the notice properly directed, is all that it is obligatory on the holder to do to render the endorser liable." This general principle would have applied to the case, if the usual and regular mail intercourse between Alexandria and Fairfax court-house had not been obstructed by war or otherwise when the note in question was dishonored. But it was obstructed by war at that time, and continued to be so obstructed until the end of the war, in 1865. The principle, therefore, does not apply to the case. The posting of a letter properly directed, containing the notice, is generally held to be a sufficient service of the notice, because the mail generally affords the quickest and best medium of communication between parties. It may reasonably be presumed, and the law does presume, generally, that such a letter is duly received. But no such presumption can exist when flagrant war (as in this case) obstructs the mail communication between the places of the parties who have to give and receive the notice. To deposit the notice of non-payment and protest in the post-office at Alexandria, addressed to the defendant at Fairfax court-house, as stated in the instruction, was, in itself, under 138 *the circumstances of the case, no more due service of such notice, than would have been to deposit it anywhere else in the city of Alexandria. To constitute sufficient proof of due service of such notice, it was necessary to show that it was given in due time, after the removal of the impediment of war which existed at the time of the dishonor of the note. "It must always be remembered that the excuse of impossibility, on whatever facts it may rest, continues only so long as the impossibility continues; that is, if a party bound to give notice gives none, because he cannot give it at the regular time, but can give notice at a subsequent period, within which the notice may possibly be of use, he is bound to give it then. In other words, the excuse of an impossibility which is not permanent, is only an excuse for a delay until the impossibility is removed." 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, p. 652. See also Id. 522; and Hopkirk v. Page, 2 Brock. R. 20, and the notes to that case in the leading cases upon Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes by Redfield and Bigelow, pp. 430-446. According to these principles, it was held by this court in Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 393, that where notice of demand and refusal to pay was put into the postoffice at New Orleans, on the 23d of October 1863, directed to the endorsers at Petersburg, Va., the war being then in progress, and there being no mail communication between New Orleans and Petersburg, the notice was insufficient.

We are therefore of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give the plaintiff's instruction No. 1.

"2d. If the jury shall believe from the evidence that, although war flagrant existed between the United States and the so-called Confederate States, the defendant received the said notice of protest and non-

This instruction is defective; for the reason, if no other, that it affirms the liability of the defendant, that without regard to the time when he may have received the notice, or whether he received it in due time or not, even though he may not have received it for several years after the termination of the war. There was no evidence before the jury which would have warranted them in finding that the defendant received such notice during the war, even if it could lawfully have been given during the war; a question which is not necessary to be decided in this case. We therefore think the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give the plaintiff's second instruction.

But the court in lieu of it gave the following: If the jury shall believe from the evidence that though war flagrant existed between the United States and the so-called Confederate States, the notice of protest deposited in the post-office at Alexandria on the 2d day of August 1861, addressed to J. C. Gunnell at Fairfax court-house, was actually received by him, then they must find for the plaintiff, if such notice was received by him as soon as it would have been received had it been transmitted by ordinary course of mail, after the resumption of the usual mail communication.

This instruction, whether objectionable or not, at all events did not prejudice the plaintiffs. It removed the defect in the plaintiffs' second instruction, by fixing the time at or before which the notice should have been received to be effectual. The notice would certainly have been effectual had it been transmitted by ordinary course of mail after the resumption of the usual mail communication; and the court 140 by this instruction *told the jury that the notice was effectual if received by the defendant as soon as it would have been (or, in other words, could have been) received, had it been so transmitted.

"3d. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the city of Alexandria and a portion of the county of Fairfax, was, at the date of the protest of said note up to the 10th day of April 1862, in the possession of the forces of the United States; and that the defendant was, at and between said dates, all the time within the lines of the forces of the said Confederate States; and that said branch bank at Alexandria, on the 10th day of April 1862, ceased all its banking operations by resolution of its board of directors, and turned all its assets over into the hands, management and custody of three agents; and that said branch bank never afterwards resumed its business; then, in that case, the plaintiff is excused from giving notice of said protest and non-payment."

The plaintiffs were not excused from giving due notice of the dishonor of the note to the endorser, by the resolution of the board of directors of the said branch bank at Alexandria, on the 10th day of April 1862, to cease all further banking operations and turn over its assets to three persons to take charge of the same; nor by ceasing such operations, and turning over the said assets accordingly; nor by never thereafter resuming said operations. The corporation of the bank and its capacity of suing and being sued still continued to exist, notwithstanding the said resolution or the acts done in pursuance thereof as aforesaid; and the plaintiffs continued to be bound to give due notice of the dishonor of the note, in order to fix the liability of the endorsers thereon. The liability of condition *must be performed to make the liability absolute. The condition is, that due notice of dishonor must be given to the endorser if it be possible, as was the case here. If it was competent for the plaintiffs as aforesaid to turn all the assets of their branch bank at Alexandria over into the hands, management and custody of three agents, to be administered and wound up by them instead of by a board of directors; then those agents, instead of such a board, would represent the bank in regard to giving notice when necessary and due notice of the dishonor in this case might have been given through their agency. They were certainly not strangers who were incapable of giving such notice, in the meaning of the cases referred to by the counsel of the plaintiffs. Chanoine v. Fowler, 3 Wend. R. 173; 1 Leading Cases upon Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes by Redfield & Bigelow, p. 383, and the cases cited in the notes.

We are therefore of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give the said third instruction asked for by the plaintiffs.

"4th. If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that at the date and maturity of the said note, Alexandria county and city were in the occupation of the forces of the United States; and that Fairfax court-house was in the possession of the forces of the Confederate States; and that the defendant was a resident at Fairfax court-house; and that he voted for the ordinance withdrawing the state of Virginia from the United States; and that when the forces of the Confederate States fell back from Fairfax court-house to Centreville, and afterwards from Centreville towards Richmond, the said defendant fell back with them, and remained within the Confederate lines until May 1862; then that the plaintiff is excused from giving 142 *any other or further notice of protest to the defendant."

We are clearly of opinion that the facts set out in said fourth instruction asked for by the plaintiffs did not excuse them from giving any other or further notice of protest to the defendant, and therefore that the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give that instruction.

"5th. If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the note sued on was made, indorsed and discounted in the city of Alexandria, and that at that time the city of Alexandria was in the firm occupation of the troops of the United States, and the defendant, after endorsing the said note and before its maturity, went within the lines held and possessed by the forces of the Confederate States, and remained therein until May 1862; then the plaintiff is excused from giving the defendant notice of protest and non-payment of said note."

We think the answer given to this instruction in the brief of the defendant's counsel is conclusive. "There is no evidence in the case to show where the note was endorsed; and even if it had been shown to have been endorsed in Alexandria the subsequent return of the endorser to his place of residence at Fairfax court-house, was no 'going within the Confederate lines,' in a sense to impose upon him any disability, or to relieve the plaintiff of any duty. After endorsing the note, the man certainly had the right to go home, without prejudice to his rights under the endorsement. The case in 9 Wheaton 598, McGruder v. The Bank of Washington, cited in the petition for writ of error, was the case of an endorser who left his place of residence after the endorsement; the present is the case of an 143 indorser, who went to, and remained at, his place of residence, *till after the note was dishonored." We therefore think the court did not err in refusing to give the plaintiff's fifth instruction.

As to the two instructions asked for by the defendant and given by the court; they are numbered 7 and 8, and are as follows:

"No. 7. To fix liability upon the endorser, the holder must use diligence in giving him notice of dishonor; and where the holder and endorser reside in different localities, and at the time of dishonor, and for months before and afterwards, the usual and ordinary intercourse by mail between the two is intercepted by a state of war, the holder does not prove due diligence, by proving, simply, that he deposited in his post-office, on the day of the dishonor, a notice of dishonor, addressed to the endorser."

We think that the law is correctly stated in this instruction, and that it does not contain an abstract proposition, as supposed in the petition.

"8th. A state of war which intercepts intercourse by the ordinary and usual course of mail between holder and endorser, excuses the holder from giving notice of dishonor, so long as such interruption continues; but due diligence on the part of the holder requires that he should forward notice to the endorser as soon as the interruption ceases."

The same may be said of this instruction that was said of "No. 7." Its correctness is shown by authorities already cited; and especially by the case of Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 393.

We have noticed all the questions raised in this case in the court below, and there remains but one question to be noticed in the case; which was presented, for the first time, in the petition for a supersedeas.

That question is, "that under the or-144 dinance of the *Virginia convention, passed June 24th, 1861, the said Joshua C. Gunnell remained bound as endorser on said note, although he may not have received notice of the protest of said note."

That ordinance is in these words: "When any city or town wherein a bank is located, shall be occupied, invested, or access thereto interrupted by the enemy, or when there is no mail therefrom to the place or places to which notice should be addressed, the parties to negotiable notes, bills and checks payable in such city or town, shall remain bound after the maturity of such notes, bills and checks, without demand, protest or notice, as if the requirements of the law in that behalf had been complied with."

Without considering whether the question as to the effect of this ordinance is properly raised in the case, we are of opinion that it is conclusively answered by the provision of the constitution of the United States, which declares, that no state shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." And the prohibition extends as well to an ordinance of a convention assembled to form or revise a state constitution, as to an act of an ordinary state legislature. That due notice of the dishonor of a negotiable note should be given by the holder to the endorser as a condition of the liability of the latter, is one of the terms of the contract between the parties.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit court, and that it ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

B and H were partners carrying on business in the state of Missouri, H living there and attending to the business, and B living in Virginia. In March 1861 they hired of K, several slaves to work in their factory, from that time to the end of the year, and they executed their three notes to K for the amount of the hires; and the slaves continued to work during the year in the factory. The war between the U S and the C S commenced the 17th of April 1861 and continued until 1865. HELD:

1. Partners Living—Different States—Effect of War—Dissolution.—B living in Virginia, a part of the Confederate States, and H living in Missouri, a part of the United States, their partnership was dissolved by the war.

2. Same—Same—Same—Personal Liability for Partnership Debts.—But both partners are liable to K on their notes for the hire of the slaves, notwithstanding the dissolution of the partnership.

3. Negotiable Notes—Based on Slave Services—Failure of Consideration.—During the year 1861 slavery was recognized as existing both by the United States and Missouri, and slaves owed no allegiance to either; and there could be no demand for their services by the United States or the state, which could occasion a failure in part of the consideration of the notes.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Christian.

Kirkpatrick & Kean, for the appellant.
Mosby & Brown, for the appellee.

Christian, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of Lynchburg.

146 *The suit was an action of debt brought by John Kirkpatrick, the defendant in error, against John M. Booker and E. S. Halsey, partners under the style of Booker & Halsey, to recover the balance due on three notes executed by the latter and payable to the former, in the aggregate amounting to the sum of $1310, given for the hires of certain slaves for the period between 15th March 1861, and 31st December 1861.

At the June term 1869 both the defendants appeared and pleaded nil debit; and the case was continued from time to time, until the June term 1871, when the defendant John M. Booker tendered a special plea, in the following words: "And the said defendant, J. M. Booker, for further and other plea in this behalf, says, that at the time of the making of the several promissory notes in the declaration mentioned, the said defendant and his co-defendant E. S. Halsey, were co-partners under the style of Booker & Halsey, engaged in the manufacture of tobacco at or near Brunswick, in the state of Missouri; which business was conducted exclusively in the state of Missouri, and by the said E. S. Halsey, who was at that time, and long afterwards, to wit: for two years, a resident of the state of Missouri: that this defendant was at the time of making said notes, and ever since has been, and still is, a resident of the city of Lynchburg, in the state of Virginia, and remained there continually from the date of the making said notes, till and after 1st day of January 1862: that the said notes in the said declaration mentioned were given by said Halsey in the name of said firm, for the following consideration and none other, to wit: the said note for $145, was given for the hire of a negro slave (naming him), and the said note for $730, was given for the hire of six negro slaves (naming them), and the 147 said note of $435, was given *for the hire of three negro slaves (naming them), which said slaves were the property of the plaintiff; and that the said hiring was from the 15th day of March 1861 (the date of said notes) for the balance of the year 1861; and that the said slaves were so hired to be employed in the said business of manufacturing tobacco at or near Brunswick, in the state of Missouri, and were there so employed for the balance of the year 1861. And the said defendant further says, that after the making of the said contract of hiring, and the making of the said notes in the declaration mentioned, to wit: on the 17th April 1861 a state of war arose, and was continued and prosecuted during all the rest of the year 1861, and thereafter between the government of the United States of America to which the state of Missouri adhered and belonged, and the government of the Confederate States of America, to which the state of Virginia adhered and belonged, and during the portion of the year 1861, from the 17th April 1861 to the 1st day of January 1862, the city of Lynchburg, and the residence of this defendant and this defendant himself, were continuously within the limits and jurisdiction of the said Confederate States; and the town of Brunswick, and the residence and persons of the said Halsey, and of the said plaintiff and of the said slaves, and the business aforesaid, were continuously within the limits and actual jurisdiction of the said United States; whereby the said copartnership between the defendant and said Halsey was dissolved, as of the 17th April 1861, and the capacity and right of this defendant to use and enjoy the services of said slaves were wholly lost to this defendant for the said period, to wit: from the said 17th day of April 1861 to the end of that year. And so the said defendant says that as to him the consideration of 148 *said notes to the extent aforesaid has wholly failed; whereby he has suffered great damage, to wit: $1085, as of 25th March 1861. And this he is ready to verify. Wherefore the said defendant prays that the said damages be allowed him and set-off against the said claim of the said plaintiff in his said declaration mentioned."

This plea was rejected by the Circuit court, and a judgment entered against the defendant for the amount due upon the notes as claimed in the declaration.

The court is of opinion that there was no error in the judgment of the said Circuit court, rejecting said plea, and entering the judgment as aforesaid.

The plea tendered, stripped of its verbiage, was in substance, that during the period of the contract of hire, from 17th April 1861 to the 25th December 1861, war was flagrant between the United States, of which the state of Missouri was a part, and the Confederate States, of which Virginia was a part; that Kirkpatrick the plaintiff and Halsey one of the defendants and one of the partners, and the slaves hired by them, were in the state of Missouri and remained there; that Booker was in Virginia and did not change his residence; that the breaking out of the war dissolved the partnership between Booker and Halsey; and that therefore as to Booker the consideration of the notes for the hires of these slaves from 17th April 1861 to the end of the hiring, 25th December 1861, had failed.

Now this conclusion, of a failure of consideration, from the facts admitted in the plea, is as complete a non sequitur as can well be conceived.

It is admitted in the plea, that the slaves were delivered to Booker & Halsey at the contract price, that they were employed by the firm in the manufacture of tobacco at Brunswick in the state of Missouri

149 for the *whole period for which they were hired, and that the services of these slaves, (the property of Kirkpatrick), which constituted the consideration of the notes sued upon, were duly performed. But Booker, one of the partners, seeks, by this plea, to relieve himself (not his partner) from responsibility, for a just partnership debt, upon the ground that the war dissolved the partnership between him and his co-defendant, and that he could not avail himself of the services of these slaves because he was separated from them and his partner on different sides of belligerent lines.

Now conceding that the partnership between Booker and Halsey was dissolved, as it undoubtedly was (according to the principles settled by this court in Taylor v. Hutchinson, 25 Gratt. 536), by the breaking out of the war and the residence of the partners within different belligerent territorial limits and jurisdictions; yet such dissolution, plainly, did not absolve them or either of them from any obligation to pay the partnership debts.

Halsey who conducted the business in Missouri was bound to account to Booker for the partnership effects in his hands at the breaking out of the war and for any profits he made out of the partnership assets. Both partners were severally and jointly bound for all antecedent engagements. The dissolution of the partnership by public war no more extinguished the liability of the partners, than a dissolution by death of one of the partners.

In the leading case of Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. R. 438, a case much relied on by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, Chancellor Kent says (p. 493): "The parties were still partners as to those goods which had actually been purchased by them before the war, and the parties 150 as partners were *bound to account to each other for the proceeds of those goods, and equally bound as partners to pay for them if not already paid for. A dissolution of a partnership has only respect to the future. The parties remain bound for all antecedent engagements. The partnership may be said to continue as to everything that is past and until all pre-existing matters are wound up and settled." See also Taylor v. Hutchinson, where the same subject is discussed and the same principles affirmed by this court.

It is therefore manifest that the dissolution of this partnership between Halsey and Booker did not relieve either of the partners from their antecedent obligations, and that they are both jointly and severally bound upon the notes executed by them to the plaintiff on the 25th March 1861.

It may be proper to notice another point urged with much earnestness by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, though not strictly arising under the plea tendered by the defendant Booker; and that is, that these slaves whose services were the consideration of the notes sued upon, were persons whose allegiance, upon the breaking out of the war, was due to the United States government, and that the government had the right to demand their services; and therefore these services could not be controlled by the owner or the parties hiring them; and for that reason, they could not be regarded as property, the subject of hire; and hence there was a failure of consideration.

It is sufficient to remark, that during the period for which these slaves were hired, the institution of slavery was recognized both by the constitution of the United States and by the laws and constitution of the state of Missouri.

These persons, who by the federal 151 and state laws *were slaves, had none of the rights, and none of the obligations of citizens, and owed no allegiance to the government either of the United States or the state of Missouri. If allegiance could be predicated of persons who by federal and state law were slaves, that allegiance was due to their masters, and not to any government, state or federal. These slaves were the property of the plaintiff, of which it is admitted in the plea, the defendants had the exclusive use during the period of the contract of hire, and for which both of the partners are jointly and severally bound according to the terms of their contract with the plaintiff.

The court is therefore of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit court of Lynchburg, and that the same be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

152 *Riddell & als. v. Johnson's Ex'or & als.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. *Wills—Draftsman as Beneficiary.**—A bequest in favor of an attorney who writes the will is not necessarily invalid.
2. Same—Onus Probandi.†—The onus probandi lies in every case, upon the party propounding a will; and **Wills—Draftsman as Beneficiary.*—In Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 69, the court says, citing the principal case: "Again, it is said that Cheatham, the chief legatee, was the draftsman of the will. That circumstance does not invalidate the will. It simply imposes upon the court the duty of increased vigilance in seeing that the will was fairly executed, and that it does in fact carry out the wishes of the testatrix with respect to her property."

†Same—Onus Probandi.—Barton's Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) page 608, foot-note 6, after citing the principal case, says: "The burden of proof of sanity is on the propounders of the will, but not so of absence of fraud

he must satisfy the conscience of the court that the instrument so propounded is the last will of a free and capable testator.

3. Same—Draftsman as Beneficiary—Suspicious Circumstance.—If a party writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, that is a circumstance which ought generally to excite the suspicion of the court, and calls upon it to be vigilant and jealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument; in favor of which it ought not to pronounce unless the suspicion is removed, and it is judicially satisfied that the paper propounded does express the true will of the deceased.

4. Same—Same—Same—Open to Explanation.—J was an unmarried man with a large property, having a large amount in bonds. B had been his counsel for years, in whom J had great confidence, and for whom he had a strong regard. In February 1867 B wrote J's will, in which he gave the most of his real estate to a number of his illegitimate children, who were coloured persons. He then did not dispose of his bonds; which were in B's hands for collection. In June following J sent for B to write a codicil to his will, and after some previous provisions as to real estate among the same parties, and providing for the payment of his debts and expenses of administration, and any orders he might draw upon B in his lifetime out of the collections from the bonds, he gave whatever remained of these bonds in the hands of B at J's death, to B absolutely. J had a number of next of kin, and among them two sisters, to none of whom did he leave anything. It being clearly proved that J was entirely competent to make a will; that he dictated the bequest in favor of B without any suggestion from B or any other person, and repeated it; that it was read to him, and he clearly understood it, and intended 153 it to be as it was written: and it appearing further that he had been on *bad terms with his family for years, and had expressed more than once his determination that none of them should have any of his estate; the bequest to B was held to be a valid bequest.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Appomattox county, brought in September 1871, by Richard Johnson and many others, heirs at law and next of kin or of undue influence. McMechan v. McMechan, 17 W. Va. 683, as reported in 41 Am. R. 682. The burden is on the propounder to prove not only the due execution of the will but the testamentary capacity of the testator. Williams' Ex'or v. Robinson, 42 Vt. 658, 1 Am. R. 359. See Martin v. Thayer, 37 W. Va. 38. A contrary view is taken in Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, vol. 25, p. 996, where many of the cases are collected, the text-writer adopting the more reasonable conclusion that the burden upon the propounder is only to prove the formal execution of the will. For what is regarded as undue influence, see Carter v. Carter, 82 Va. 624; Miller v. Rutledge et al., Id. 863. The whole subject of undue influence and extent of testamentary capacity is well discussed and expounded in the case of Chappell et al. v. Trent et al., 90 Va. 849. See also, Tucker v. Sandidge, 85 Va. 546; Porter et al. v. Porter et al., 89 Va. 118. For extent of undue influence sufficient to vitiate a will, see Floyd v. Floyd, 3 Strob. 44, 49 Am. Dec. 626; note, p. 633. See also, Wise v. Fort, Va. Law Journal, 1883, p. 441."

of John H. Johnson deceased, against Albert Thornhill, his executor, Thomas S. Bocock and others, to set aside the last clause of a codicil to the will of the said John H. Johnson, deceased. The court made an order in the cause directing an issue devisavit vel non to be tried at its own bar, in which Thornhill the executor and Thomas S. Bocock, the legatee in the said clause of the codicil, should be plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs in the cause should be defendants.

On the trial of the issue Albert Thornhill, the executor, was offered as a witness to support the will, security having been given for the payment of the costs; and he was objected to by the defendants in the issue, as incompetent on the ground that he was one of the plaintiffs, named as executor and qualified as such, and also interested in the suit. But the court overruled the objection and admitted the witness: and the defendants excepted.

In the progress of the trial the defendants proposed to introduce James Gooding as a witness. His wife was one of the heirs at law of the testator, and they were plaintiffs in the suit; but they had executed an assignment of all their interest in the estate. The plaintiffs in the issue objected to him as a witness, on the grounds that he and his wife were parties and he was liable for costs: and the court excluded him: and the defendants excepted.

After the evidence had been concluded the plaintiffs *in the issue moved the court to give to the jury the following instructions:

1. That the paper mentioned in the issue, in order to be the will of the testator, John H. Johnson, must be proved to have been executed by him when he was of sound mind, according to the formalities prescribed by the statute, to wit: Must be proved to have been assigned by him in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, and to have been attested by them in his presence and in the presence of each other, all being present together; and the burden of proving this is upon the plaintiffs in the issue, Albert Thornhill and Thomas S. Bocock.

2. That the last clause of said paper, so far as it gives a beneficial interest to Thomas S. Bocock, must be regarded as a testamentary bequest, and its validity tested by the laws of testamentary bequests, and not by the law of contracts.

3. That if it be proved that Thomas S. Bocock, who wrote said paper, was at the time of such writing the attorney of John H. Johnson, and is himself a large beneficiary under its provisions, this raises a suspicion against it, and makes it the duty of the jury to be vigilant and jealous in examining the evidence in its support. But if the suspicion, which such fact ought generally to excite, be removed; and if it be proved that the said paper was prepared according to instructions freely and spontaneously given by the testator, and was distinctly read over to, and its purport understood by him after its preparation, then the jury may find that it is the true will of the testator; it being the law of the land that an attorney may take a benefit under the will of a client if no undue influence was exerted by him over the testator, and the will was not executed under any mistake or misapprehension.

155 *4. That if it be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, that the said John H. Johnson, for a number of years of his life, extending down to the execution of said paper, entertained a feeling of aversion and dislike for his relations, who would by law be his next of kin and heirs-at-law, and had a fixed purpose not to give them any part of his estate, then this fact is sufficient to rebut any presumption against said paper, arising merely from the fact that none of said relations are made beneficiaries therein.

5. That unless the jury believe from the evidence that one or both of the propounders of the will, or somebody for him or them, induced the said Johnson to make said paper, or some provision thereof, by force, coercion, or by importunity which he (Johnson) could not resist, or procured the same by some other unfair means or practice, then the said paper cannot be held void on the ground of undue influence; it being the true interpretation of the law of wills that the influence to avoid a testamentary bequest must amount to force or coercion, and impose on the testator a provision not in accordance with his own free, unbiased will.

6. That neither sickness, old age, nor impaired intellect, even if the jury believe from the evidence that any one or all of them existed in this case, are sufficient to render void the provisions of said paper, or any of them; but if the jury also believe from the evidence that the testator at the time of executing the same "was capable of recollecting the property he was about to dispose of, the manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty," then they must find that he had legal capacity sufficient to make a valid disposition of his estate.

7. And finally, if the jury believe 156 from the evidence, *that the paper mentioned in the issue was signed and executed by the testator according to law, as set forth in the first instruction, that is several provisions were attested with the full consent of his will and understanding, uninfluenced by importunity and without any fraud practiced upon him by the propounders of the will, or either of them, or any other person, and that the testator had adequate testamentary capacity, then the said paper and all its provisions is the true will of said John H. Johnson, and it is the duty of the jury to find accordingly.

And the defendants in the issue moved the court to give to the jury the following instructions, to wit:

1. If the jury believe from the evidence, that on the 17th day of June 1867 Thomas S. Bocock was the sole professional adviser, as an attorney at law of John H. Johnson, and had been such for some years prior to said time, and was on that day employed in his said capacity of attorney and professional adviser to prepare a codicil to the will of said Johnson, which will he had previously prepared for him on the 18th of February 1867, and did prepare the codicil to said will, which codicil is dated June 17, 1867, and was probated on the 9th day of August 1867, and that in the preparation of said codicil said Johnson had no aid from any other person than said Bocock, further than that Albert Thornhill, who is named as executor in the codicil, was present during its preparation, though not interfering in the matter beyond privately urging Bocock to write the bequest in his own favor when he saw Bocock hesitate to do it; and further, that when the preparation of the codicil was completed, and it was ready to be witnessed, William T. Pankey and James A. Agee, two neighbors, were called in to witness its execution, who read the 157 codicil to him, and *satisfied themselves that he understood it, and then duly attested it in his presence, and at his request then, although they believe that the decedent was competent to make a will, and did fully understand what he was about, and fully understand the contents of the codicil, and that the conduct of Bocock, the attorney, was fair, and his purposes honest, and that he did not designedly take, or conceive that he was taking, any advantage of his professional influence over his client, they must find that the bequest made under such circumstances to Bocock is contrary to the policy of the law and invalid, and that so much of said codicil as contains said bequest is not the true will and testament of John H. Johnson.

2. The jury are instructed that, under the circumstances under which the codicil of June 17, 1867, to the will of John H. Johnson was made, as shown by the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiffs in this issue, they are bound to presume that the bequest in said codicil, contained in favor of Thomas S. Bocock, was made under undue influence.

3. The jury are instructed that as the testamentary disposition in favor of Thomas S. Bocock, made in the codicil of June 17, 1867, to the will of John H. Johnson, appears from the evidence in this case to have been formed in Johnson's mind in the presence of said Bocock, and while he was actually employed as the attorney of said Johnson, in preparing the codicil to his will, and while Johnson was without any competent independent advice, they are bound to presume, from the relation of the parties, that the bequest to said Bocock was the offspring of undue influence; and even if the subsequent execution of the codicil, in the presence of the attesting witnesses, and the withdrawal at that time of Bocock from

158 Johnson's presence, and the *other circumstances attending the execution, should satisfy the jury that this influence had been overcome by Johnson before the final execution of the codicil, yet when Bocock subsequently heard of the wish of Johnson to alter this clause of the codicil, and contented himself with merely writing the letter and accompanying papers of June 25th, 1867, he so far failed—no matter how honest his purposes—in that full discharge of his professional duty which the law exacts from an attorney in his circumstances as to render invalid the bequest in his favor.

4. The jury are instructed that so much of the codicil of the 17th June, 1867, to the will of John H. Johnson, as makes a bequest to Thomas S. Bocock, having been prepared by the said Bocock as the attorney and professional adviser of said Johnson, cannot, under the law of this court, be held as a part of the true last will and testament of said Johnson, unless it be found by them from the evidence, that in the making of so much of said codicil as makes said bequest, the said Johnson had the aid of independent advice from some competent third party; and that the mere presence of Albert Thornhill, who was named as executor in the codicil, and whose only active intervention in making of said codicil was his privately urging on Bocock to write the bequest in his own favor, did not constitute or furnish such independent advice.

5. The jury are instructed, that to enable the plaintiffs in this issue to sustain so much of said issue on their part as involves the validity of that clause of the codicil of June 17, 1867, to the will of John H. Johnson, which contains the bequest to Thomas S. Bocock, they must have shown from the evidence, to the satisfaction of the jury, that Johnson was not only competent to make a will and fully understood the contents of said codicil, but that he intended the same, at the time of executing it, as a final disposition, in the event of his death, of the property embraced in it; and that his testamentary papers in regard to said property was not formed under the influence of the presence of the said Bocock, as his attorney and professional adviser, the existence of which influence the jury are bound to presume from the relation of the parties and their presence together; and that he had, during the preparation of the codicil, or prior to its execution, such independent aid or advice from some competent third party as actually restored him, before its execution, to entire freedom from any such influence.

6. The court instructs the jury that though they should believe, from the evidence, that on the 17th day of June, 1867, John H. Johnson was of competent mental capacity to dispose of his property, yet, if they should further believe from the evidence, that by the will of the said John H. Johnson, bearing date the 18th day of February, 1867, disposing of a part of his estate, Albert Thornhill was appointed the executor thereof, and Thomas S. Bocock was appointed his legal adviser thereunder, and a referee to settle any disputes that might arise under the same as therein specified; and that the said Albert Thornhill and the said Thomas S. Bocock accepted the said several trusts therein respectively imposed upon them; and further, that at and before the said 17th day of June, 1867, the said Thomas S. Bocock was and had been for some years the general counsel and attorney of the said John H. Johnson in and about all of his legal business, and that on that day the said Thomas S. Bocock was employed as such attorney and counsel by the said John H. Johnson, in and about the special business of the drafting and execution of a codicil to the said will,

160 *designed to be a further disposition of the estate of the said Johnson, and that the said Thornhill, appointed the executor of the said will as aforesaid, was present and took an active part in the transactions thereof, and that the said Bocock, acting as such attorney and counsel, drafted the last clause of said paper, purporting to be a codicil to the said will, with the knowledge and approval of the said Albert Thornhill, executor as aforesaid, and named as the executor in the said alleged codicil, and that the said attorney and counsel failed and omitted, with the knowledge and approval of the said executor, to attend personally to the execution of the said alleged codicil, and withdrew himself from the room of the said Johnson, and remained out of doors while the said executor, together with the other subscribing witnesses to the said paper, went into the room and by the bedside of the said Johnson to take charge of the execution of the said papers by the said Johnson as a codicil to his will, and the said paper was then executed by the said Johnson without any advice, either from the said attesting witnesses or from any other person, and that afterwards the said Johnson expressed a wish to change that clause in the said paper which directed how his property and money should be disposed of after his death, and that said wish was communicated to the said counsel and attorney by the said executor, and the said counsel and attorney did not personally attend on the said Johnson for the purpose of executing the said wish, or send to him a competent and disinterested adviser, other than the said executor, to execute the said wish in the premises, but instead thereof, while remaining away himself, sent to the said Johnson by the said executor the letter of the 25th of June, 1867, together with the papers accompanying and that said counsel and attorney, after the execution of the said paper by his said client, and before his death, was in his immediate neighborhood and failed to call and see his client upon the said subject, but upon the death of his said client promptly went to his house, and, with the consent of the said executor, took charge and control of the property and bonds referred to in the said latter clause in said paper, and that he afterwards used the same with the knowledge and consent of the said executor as if the said paper were a valid codicil; and that the said Thornhill, named as executor in said will and said paper purporting to be a codicil, has never rendered any account of his transactions as executor, and has never received any money from the said counsel and attorney, or paid any debts due by said estate, but has given and submitted the whole management of said matters under the said paper of the 17th of June, 1867, to the control of the said counsel and attorney, and the said counsel and attorney has himself rendered no account of his transactions in respect to the same, and that the property and effects which came into the hands of the said counsel and attorney under the said *last clause of said alleged codicil were of large amount and greatly exceeding in value the indebtedness of said estate, then the jury must find that said last clause of said paper is null and void, and is not a part of the will of the said John H. Johnson.

161 *the same therein referred to, and never thereafter went to see the said Johnson before his death (on the 10th day of July, 1867), and no sufficient reason appears why his said counsel and attorney should not have done so upon said special business under the circumstances of the case in view of his relation to his said client as aforesaid, and of his interest under the said alleged codicil; and that his said client was in advanced old age, and afflicted with a disease or diseases expected soon to end in his death, and that the said executor and said confidential counsel and attorney were aware of his condition, and had notice of the same;

And the court gave the jury the said instructions asked for by the plaintiffs in the issue, and rejected and refused to give the said instructions asked for by the defendants in the issue; to which said several rulings of the court the defendants in the said issue excepted.

The jury found by their verdict, "that the paper writing dated the 17th day of June 1867, purporting to be a codicil to the will of John H. Johnson, deceased, is in all its parts and provisions the true will of John H. Johnson, deceased." And the plaintiffs in the suit, the defendants in the issue, moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury, and to refuse to enter any decree in accordance therewith, because the said verdict is contrary to law and the evidence. But the court overruled the motion; and the plaintiffs excepted; and the court spread the facts proved upon the record.

Be it remembered, that on the trial of the issue in this case the following were all the facts proved before the jury:

It was proved that John H. Johnson died at his residence, in the county of Appomattox, on the 10th day of July 1867, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. That on the 18th day of February 1867 he made a will, which was prepared for him by Thomas S. Bocock, who was then, and had for several years before that time been his attorney at law and legal adviser in all his business matters requiring the aid of an attorney. That said will was witnessed by William T. Pankey, *James A. Agee and Albert Thornhill. That, on the 15th day of June 1867, Thomas S. Bocock, who had been sent for by John H. Johnson, went to the house of said Johnson late in the afternoon, and learned from Johnson that he wished him, Bocock, to prepare for him a codicil to his will; whereupon Bocock told him that it was then too late to prepare the codicil that day, and undertook to come again on Monday and prepare it; and on Monday morning, about an hour after sunrise, Bocock accordingly reached Johnson's house again. When Bocock reached there on this occasion he found Albert Thornhill there. Albert Thornhill lived not far off, and had gone over that morning to see Johnson, not knowing anything of any purpose to make a codicil to the will. When Bocock arrived he told Johnson that he had come there to complete that little item of business, and that if he wished it done it would be necessary for Mr. Thornhill to go home and get the will, which was in his possession. Mr. Thornhill went and brought the will, and Mr. Bocock then told Mr. Johnson that he was ready to proceed; whereupon the preparation of the codicil began. Mr. Johnson, who said in the beginning that he would give nothing to his relations, had given several directions about disposing of his lands, which Mr. Bocock put in writing to his satisfaction, and they came to the disposition of his money and bonds and the residue of his estate. Mr. Johnson said he was "a little at a loss how to manage that," or "now you are too hard for me," or some such expression; and he spoke of his money being mostly out and barred by the stay law, and said that after all his just debts were paid, and particularly if many such debts came against him as Mosby's debt, there would be but little left; and said further, that he had thought of giving his sister Sally *(Mrs. Dunn) and his sister Betsy (Mrs. Miller) $500 each, but that he had heard they had threatened to sue his estate as soon as he was dead, and he would give them nothing; and said further, alluding, as witness supposed, to his relations, that he would not give any of them anything—they might get what they could at the end of the law: and he said to Mr. Bocock and Mr. Thornhill "I want you to give me your advice." Mr. Bocock told him if he (Bocock) was to advise him the will would not be his own, but his (Bocock's). He hesitated, and then asked Mr. Bocock how it would do to collect his money and put it in bank without interest. Mr. Bocock told him if he did so, and died without disposing of it, his relations would get it. Johnson said he did not want that; he did not want them to have it. He then asked Bocock how it would do for him (Bocock) to collect it, and hold it subject to his order. Bocock said that'l do. Johnson said suppose I draw orders on you. Bocock said he would accept them, payable when money sufficient was collected. Johnson then said now I can arrange it, and he told Mr. Bocock that if he did not order it out of his hands in his lifetime it was to be his. That it was now

11 or 12 o'clock, and Johnson called for his woman and ordered her to make a pitcher of lemonade, which was done, and she handed a glass to Thornhill and one to Bocock, who offered his to Johnson, who declined, and remarked, "these gentlemen would probably like to have theirs spiked," and ordered her to get his bottle of liquor. Then the business was suspended, because Johnson seemed to be tired, and he was allowed to rest until two or three o'clock, during which time Bocock and Thornhill withdrew from Johnson's room. Then Bocock and Thornhill again entered his room, and he seemed to be asleep, when 165 Bocock said rouse him and *let's get to work; then the business was resumed, and Johnson said a second and third time that he wanted him (Bocock) to collect his money, and hold it subject to his orders during his lifetime. Bocock asked what was to be done with it in case of his death. Johnson replied, if I do not order it out of your hands it will be yours. Bocock seemed unwilling, and refused to write that down, and said to Thornhill that he had never done anything to bring reproach on himself. Thornhill in a low voice, unheard by Johnson, who was a little deaf, told Bocock he ought to do so, as Johnson had told him several times; that Mr. Johnson had sent for him to write his will, and that seemed to be his will; and Johnson himself said, with some impatience, "I've told you several times, write it as I say." Bocock then wrote it down. Johnson then asked Bocock how it would be if he (Johnson) should draw orders on him before he had collected the money. Bocock told him he would accept the orders, payable when the money came to his hands. In the course of the preparation of the codicil, Bocock, who put it all down first in the form of notes, read over the notes to him several times, and the list of bonds appended to the codicil was prepared at the dictation of Johnson from memory. When it was completed, Thornhill, who had been told by Johnson that he wanted the same witnesses to the codicil who witnessed the will, sent for William T. Pankey and James A. Agee for the purpose. They came about night. Bocock, who was in the yard when Pankey came, gave him the codicil, and Pankey took the codicil from Bocock and went in and read it to Johnson. This was by candle-light. Twice during the reading Pankey asked him if he heard. Johnson both times said he did, and once said he had already heard it read. When the reading was completed

166 *Johnson signed it, and Thornhill, Agee and Pankey subscribed it as witnesses at his request, all three of them and Johnson being together when this was done. In the opinion of the subscribing witnesses Johnson was fully competent to make a will, and the witnesses took pains to satisfy themselves on this point. The will and codicil are in the following words and figures, to wit:

several colored people, formerly slaves of Johnson, were about the house, among them Martha, who had been kept by him as a wife, and Albert and Washington, who were reputed to be his natural children. They withdrew from the room when the writing was done, but Albert and Washington were in the adjoining room, the door of which was open, and heard and saw all that passed, as Johnson was a little deaf, and conversation with him was necessarily loud. Johnson was an old man, seventy years old or more; at least that in 1859. His health on the 17th June had become bad. He had been for some time confined to his bed, but could get up and even sit up. He continued after the 17th June to grow worse until his death. The main symptoms of his disease was dropsy and inability to retain his urine, and he required constant attention, which was chiefly given him by his woman Martha. He slept a good deal, but had a habit, many years before his death, of appearing listless and closing his eyes, when really he would be watchful and attentive.

Between 1848 and 1860 William M. Cabell was his attorney and legal adviser. In the year 1859 Cabell prepared a will for him, by which he freed his negroes and gave to his natural children, some of whom were white and some black, the bulk of his estate, 167 but nothing *to any lawful relation.

He often, during the time Cabell was his attorney, expressed himself to Cabell as very hostile to his relations, with some of whom he had much bitter litigation, and said they had worried him all his life with law suits, and had hunted him like a wild beast, and he often declared his purpose of never giving them a cent, and to other witnesses he subsequently made similar declarations.

By the will of 1859 he made Cabell and one James A. Wright his executors, and gave each of them $5,000 in lieu of commissions as executors.

Some days after the codicil was executed Johnson sent for Thornhill and said to him that Susan Johnson, and perhaps others, had been telling him he had given all his property to Bocock, and had no control over it. Thornhill told him it was not so, and that he would not have witnessed any such will, and told him he would go or send for any person he (Johnson) might wish to write the codicil over for him. He said no, he wanted no one but Mr. Bocock, and that Mr. Bocock would come down after his court in Lynchburg was over. Johnson said he wanted some alteration made in the last clause of his codicil, but what it was Thornhill could not get him to say. Thornhill told him he could not wait, because he could not live long. On the 24th June, Thornhill went to Lynchburg and saw Bocock, and told him what had taken place between him and Johnson since the codicil was written. Bocock thereupon wrote to Johnson, and sent, by Thornhill, a letter and two accompanying papers. [See post.]

Thornhill took them to Johnson on the 26th

June. Johnson rose up and sat on the side of the bed and read the letter, but not the accompanying papers, and said he was satisfied, and that Mr. Bocock understood 168 *the matter as he did, and that he had retained full control over his property, and if it pleased God he should live five or six months he might make some little change in the latter clause of his codicil.

Thornhill went to see Johnson every day but two from the 17th June till he died. He lived one and a quarter miles from Johnson. When he took the letter and accompanying papers from Bocock in Lynchburg, it was understood between him and Bocock that if Johnson wanted Bocock to come down before his court in Lynchburg was over, he, Thornhill, would send for him and let him know, and Bocock would come at once, which understanding was, however, not communicated to Johnson. No further communication took place between Thornhill and Bocock until the death of Johnson, at which time Bocock was at his own plantation, about three miles from Johnson's.

Bocock had some few days before come down to his plantation from Lynchburg, on his way to Buckingham court, where he was on Monday, the 8th day of July, and from which place he returned to his plantation on Tuesday, the 9th day of July, and when the death took place on the 10th July, he was sent for by Thornhill and went over to Johnson's at once.

On the night of the 17th June, after the codicil was finished, Washington Johnson, one of his colored natural children, approached his bedside and said to him, now, to a moral certainty, you have given Mr. Bocock everything, and have made no provision for us. He said, "I am not dead yet."

It was proved by Cabell that while he was attorney for Johnson, from 1848 to 1860, Johnson was a man of strong mind, hard in his disposition, even with his natural children, of inflexible will, and of a 169 suspicious *disposition, and extremely bitter in his feelings towards his relations.

All the subscribing witnesses knew Johnson well, but Agee and Pankey were neither intimate with him, and very seldom saw him. Thornhill had known him for forty years, but was not in the habit of visiting him till the codicil was made, and very seldom before that time went to his house.

Some time during the war the professional relations began between Johnson and Bocock. Once during the war Johnson talked with James A. Wright, who was in the habit of transacting some of his business for him, about making a will and freeing his negroes, and talked of getting Bocock to write it for him. Wright told him that Bocock was speaker of the Confederate congress, and could do it as well or better than any other man.

It was proved by Cabell that during his attorneyship, and by another witness that subsequently, Johnson spoke of his estate being probably involved in litigation after his death, and declared his purpose of leaving his executor strong-handed to defend it. A day or two after the codicil was made, Johnson was spoken to about making some provision for his servant Martha. He said when they were slaves, all they wanted was freedom; and when they got free they wanted a home, and now they wanted everything he had, and they shouldn't have it. On the occasion of the conversation above referred to, between Albert and Johnson at Johnson's bedside, Johnson said to Albert: "The stay-law and the bankrupt law are against my money. Before you were free it was nothing but freedom; then the state set you free, then you want money; now, you must work for money as I did. My estate is going to be sued; they are going to sue you and your children—170 *them in the cradle and them unborn.

Oh God, I wish I could rise from the grave and hear the contention. I leave my money to Bocock; so that he can't be bought. I leave it to him to defend you till the last dollar is spent. I might give you a bond, and you might hand it to a lawyer to collect and never receive a cent. I have been trying to collect my money and failed, and if Mr. Bocock should do so and have some left, who would have a better right to it than he who labored for it?" He said also that Bocock had been injured by the war, and was a public man, and had been disfranchised, and he intended to help him.

It was proved that the Circuit court of Lynchburg adjourned on the 29th June, 1867. The will bears date the 18th of February 1867, and in it he disposes almost exclusively of the land where he lived. From this he divided off eleven lots, which he gave to certain persons mentioned in them: and the remainder of the tract, which consisted of wood land, his executor was to hold for the benefit of those to whom he had given the lots of land; all of whom were persons of colour, and most of them were reputed to be his children. He appoints Thomas S. Bocock as the legal adviser of his executor, in all things touching the management of his estate, and he and the executor were to have full power to settle any difficulties arising among his devisees, about their respective interests under his will. And he appointed Albert Thornhill his executor.

The codicil bears date the 17th of June 1867. After making some slight changes as to the wood land reserved in the will, and making some other devises of land in the county of Prince Edward, and of interest in two houses in Lynchburg, 171 among some of the same *persons mentioned in the will, he comes to the last clause which was the subject of contest in this case, and is as follows:

"I have deposited my bonds and claims mostly in the hands of Thomas S. Bocock, in whom I have confidence, with the understanding that I can draw on him for the money as it may be collected; and if I shall draw for any amount before the same shall be collected, he agrees to accept said order, to be paid whenever the funds may come into his hands to pay the same; provided the whole amount drawn for may not exceed the net amount which may come to his hands for use. Now it is my will and desire at my death he shall proceed to collect all sums due me as the laws of the land may permit—interest when interest can be collected, and principal when that may be done,—and out of the net amount which may come into his hands, that he shall pay over to my executor whatever may be necessary for the payment of debts, also the commissions of said executor on collections made for my estate, and also all orders drawn on him by me in my lifetime, and accepted by him, as above stated; and any amount which may remain, after these payments, in his hands, shall never be claimed by my executor, or by any other person, by any authority from me; but the same shall remain his absolute property."

To this codicil was added a list of debts made out by him at the time, twenty-seven in number; being such as he remembered at the time, though not pretended to embrace all, or to be strictly accurate.

The letter referred to in the statement of facts proved, bears date Lynchburg, June 25, 1875, and is as follows:

172 *Dear Sir:

Our friend, Mr. Thornhill, informs me that you have expressed a wish to change the clause in the codicil to your will, which directs how your money shall be disposed of after your death. It was put down just as you directed, as you will remember, and after full explanation. Mr. Thornhill will read it to you again, so that you can bear it fully in mind. I wish to have it exactly to suit you. So far as I have any connection with it I wish it to be your will, and not that of any other person. Every is yours, and is altogether in your power. If it does not suit you as it stands you can change it in several modes. You can revoke the last codicil altogether, and make another if you choose, or you can make another codicil, altering the first so far as you wish to alter it; or leaving the will and codicil to stand as at present, you can draw an order or orders on me, payable after your death, in which you can direct that your money be given to whoever you wish. Just say who you wish to have it, and it shall be done accordingly. I send by Mr. Thornhill the form of a new codicil, and also the form of an order, such as I have indicated. He can have them, or either of them, changed to suit you. You have only to say what change you wish to make, and it shall be done. If I could leave here with propriety, I would go down immediately and aid you so far as in my power; but the Circuit court is in session, and will remain in session for some days longer. As soon as my business is through I will be down.

With best wishes, &c., &c.

The copies referred to in the letter, and sent with it were the copies of an order on Bocock directing that any net balance in his hands remaining after payment 173 *of debts and commissions of executor as aforesaid, be paid out and distributed among Johnson's relations, as the same would be paid and distributed under the laws of Virginia regulating the distribution of the money and effects of deceased persons not disposed of by will.

The form of the codicil was to the same effect.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 28th of May 1874, when the court made all the proceedings and evidence had on the trial of the issue a part of the record, and decreed in accordance with the verdict of the jury, the paper writing dated the 17th of June purporting to be a codicil to the will of John H. Johnson deceased, to be in all its parts the true last will of the said John H. Johnson deceased, and that the bill be dismissed with costs. And thereupon the plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed. The cause was most elaborately argued in printed notes as well as orally by Guy & Gilliam, John Howard and Cosby, for the appellants, and Kean and Kirkpatrick & Blackford, for the appellees; but it is impossible to do justice to the argument in a brief note.

Anderson, J. In view of the importance of this cause, the court has given to its consideration the most careful and earnest attention. And if we have erred in our conclusions, no fault is attributable to the learned counsel on either side, who have conducted the discussion with scrupulous fidelity to their respective clients, and with great research and distinguished ability.

It is not surprising that the mere 174 announcement, *that the decedent had given the bulk of his large estate to his attorney, who was the writer of his will, and a stranger to his blood, to the exclusion of his lawful kindred, should have excited comment in the country. And the fact, that the writer of the will was an eminent member of the profession, and had filled various posts of honor and high distinction in the service of his country, would naturally cause painful reflections in the public mind, and especially amongst the members of a profession which is so closely connected with the administration of justice, and who, in general, have been keenly sensitive, and justly so, to anything which might bring reproach or stain upon their fair and honorable escutcheon.

By the civil law, if a person wrote a will in his own favor, it was rendered void. I am not prepared to say that such a provision in our law would not be consonant with public policy, and a safeguard to public morals, especially when the writer of the will was the attorney of the testator. Not that such a disposition of his estate might not fairly be made by a testator, and that he might not justly regard his attorney his best friend, and the most worthy object of his benefaction, and bequeath his property to him free from all restraint and undue influence; but considering the relation of confidence between the client and his attorney, and the capacity which a venal and unscrupulous attorney would have to abuse that confidence, and considering the infirmity of human nature, which requires from the best of men the daily prayer, "lead us not into temptation," and the relation of the legal profession to the pure and faithful administration of the laws, and the importance of its occupying a position which raises it above suspicion, it is argued with much force, that an attorney should 175 be absolutely *incapable of taking a benefaction from his client by gift inter vivos or by will.

On the other hand it may be argued that by the law of England and America, the testator has the right, as he ought to have, to bestow his property on whom he will. He has the right to select the objects of his bounty. That his attorney may be the best friend he has in the world and the most worthy object of his benefaction; and if he has capacity to make a will, and freely and of choice desires to bequeath his estate to him, he ought not to be deprived of that privilege. Whether this be a just conclusion as to what the law should be, or whether it is best that the rule of the civil law should prevail, I think the current of decisions shows that it has not been adopted to its full extent as a rule in England or America.

In England it has not, and is distinctly so declared. (1 Williams on Ex'ors, 4 Amer., from last London edition, p. 91.) And the writer adds: "The act is not absolutely void, even though the person making the will in his own favor is the agent or attorney of the testator;" but the suspicion thereby is, for obvious reasons, greatly increased.

In Billinghurst v. Vickers, 1 Phill. R. 187, it is held that the act is not actually defeated, as it was by the civil law. To the same effect are Paske v. Ollatt, 2 Phill. R. 323; Barry v. Butlin, 1 Curteis R. 637; Baker v. Batt, 2 Moore P. C. C. 317; Hitchins v. Wood, Ibid 355, 436. The same is held in the American cases. A will by a client in favor of an attorney is not absolutely invalid. The existence of that fiduciary relation does not annul the act. Wilson v. Moran, 3 Bradf. R. 172. To the same effect is Crispell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. Sup. C. R. 393; Cramer v. Cruinbaugh, 3

Maryl. R. 491; Watterson v. Watterson, 176 1 Head's (Tennessee) R. *1; Adair v. Adair, 30 Georgia R. 104; Nexsen v. Nexen, 3 N. York Court of Appeals decision 360; Goodacre & Taylor v. Smith, 1 Law R. Probate and Div. 359. In Coffin v. Coffin, 23 N. York R. 9, Comstock C. J. said: "It is not a rule, or a principle of the law of testaments, that the draftsman of a will cannot be an executor, or take a benefit under it.

The counsel for appellants rely on Meek & Thornton, ex'ors v. Perry & wife, 36 Miss. R. 256, and Garvin's adm'r v. Williams & al., 44 Missouri R. 465, as maintaining the rule of the civil law. Though the reasoning of the judges may tend in that direction, the decision in neither case goes to that extent. They do not hold that the will is absolutely void, but only that the relation of confidence raises a prima facie presumption of undue influence, which, unless rebutted, the will cannot stand.

The Mississippi case turned upon an instruction given by the court of trial to the jury in the following words, to wit: "That the law watches with jealousy transactions between guardian and ward; and if the jury believe that Louisa McKinnie (the ward) made a will in favor of her guardian whilst the relation of guardian and ward subsisted, the circumstances must demonstrate full deliberation on the part of the ward, and abundant good faith on the part of the guardian, or they must find against the will. The appellate court held that there was no error in the instruction.

The Missouri case also turned upon an instruction, which reciting all the facts in the case, asked the court to declare, that "the presumption arising from such fact is, that the alleged will was procured by the undue influence of J. P. Williams; and that presumption can only be repelled by satisfactory proof that no undue influence was used to procure the same."

177 *The appellate court held, that under the circumstances in which the will was made, it was presumptively invalid, and the burden of proving its validity rested upon those who sought to derive an advantage under it. The instruction, therefore, which was refused by the court should have been given. It is clear that in neither of the foregoing cases was it held, that on the ground of the relation of confidence between the testator and the legatee the will was absolutely void, but only presumptively so, which presumption it was competent for the propounder of the will to repel. And in this last case it will be observed that there was much in the conduct of Williams, besides the confidential relation, from which the presumption against the validity of the will might arise. But in these cases the doctrines enunciated are not entirely conformable to the rules which have been adopted and established by the current of English and American decisions.

These rules as laid down by Baron Parke in Barry v. Butlin, 1 Curt. Ecc. R. 637, are, first, "That the onus probandi lies in every case upon the party propounding a will; and he must satisfy the conscience of the court that the instrument so propounded is the last will of a free and capable testator;" and second, "that if a party writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, that is a circumstance which ought generally to excite the suspicion of the court, and calls upon it to be vigilant and zealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument; in favor of which it ought not to pronounce unless the suspicion is removed, and it is judicially satisfied that the paper propounded does express the true will of the deceased." These rules are approved by the court in Crispell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. Sup. C. R. 393; also in Cramer v. Cruinbaugh, 3 Maryl. R., supra.

178 *In Wilson v. Moran, 3 Bradf., supra, the court says: "True, it is held that where the legatee who stands in a confidential relation to the testator, himself draws the will, this circumstance calls for increased vigilance on the part of the court in ascertaining the validity of the will. But in such cases, the most that has been, or ought to be required, is satisfactory evidence that the testator was of sound mind, and clearly understood the contents of the will, and was at the time under no restraint. No case has gone so far as to overthrow a will duly executed when it was shown that the party executing it was of sound mind, and clearly understood its contents, though it was drawn by the person taking the estate."

It seems to me that the rules and principles by which cases of this nature should be decided are clearly and correctly stated in the foregoing decisions, and they are sustained by the almost unbroken current of English and American authority. Let us now apply them to the case in hand.

In the first place, I cannot doubt, upon the evidence in this record, that John H. Johnson was capable of making a will on the 18th day of February, 1867, when this will was executed, and also when he executed the codicil on the 17th of June following. The three subscribing witnesses, who are regarded in law as placed around the testator that no fraud may be practiced on him in the execution of the will, and to ascertain and judge of his capacity, all of whom are represented to be men of intelligence and respectability, were not only of that opinion, (and the law makes their opinion evidence,) but facts are proved by them and others, which, in connection with the intrinsic evidence furnished by the instrument itself, excludes all doubt that the testator was of sound disposing mind.

179 *In the next place we will inquire, had he knowledge of the contents of the codicil when he signed it? Being capable of making a will, it is not probable that he would have signed it without knowing what it contained. But the proof is positive and direct. It is proved that the testator himself gave instructions to Mr. Bocock, which were written down by him and afterwards read over several times to the testator and approved by him. The codicil was then written, and Mr. Pankey and Mr. Agee, who together with Mr. Thornhill had attested the will, and who the testator desired should attest the codicil, were sent for, and one of them, Mr. Pankey, who had been a justice of the peace for a number of years, read it to him. The testator said he heard it and well understood it. That he had heard it several times before, and it was written as he directed.

The proof is that "the codicil," after it had been written out, had not been before read to the testator, although the note of instructions had. The fair inference from the testator's remark, that he had heard it several times before, is, that there was no discrepancy between the note of instructions and the codicil. And Mr. Thornhill testifies that "all was read to Mr. Johnson in the notes," and "all was in the notes as it is in the codicil." These two things being established, first, that the testator was capable, and secondly, that he had knowledge of the contents of the instrument, and the execution having been according to the requirements of law, ordinarily, further proof would be unnecessary to establish the will. But this case being of the class which calls upon the court to be vigilant and jealous in examining the evidence, and to be satisfied that the paper propounded does express the true will of the deceased, which satisfaction cannot be felt 180 *whilst suspicion rests upon it, we will further inquire, was the testator under restraint when he executed this codicil?

A valid testamentary disposition of property must be the voluntary act of a capable testator. In Wilson v. Moran, supra, the court said: "A will by a client in favor of an attorney is not absolutely invalid. The existence of that fiduciary relation does not annul the act; but still the circumstances call for unusual vigilance, to see that it was in consonance with the views and wishes of the testator." Baron Parke affirms in Barry v. Butlin, 1 Curt. R. 637, that all that can be truly said is, that if a person, whether attorney or not, prepares a will with a legacy to himself, it is at most a suspicious circumstance of more or less weight according to the facts of each particular case; in some, of no weight at all, varying according to the circumstances; for instance, the quantum of the legacy, and the proportion it bears to the property disposed of, and numerous other contingencies; but in no case amounting to more than a circumstance of suspicion demanding the vigilant care and circumspection of the court in investigating the case, and calling upon it not to grant probate without full and entire satisfaction that the instrument did express the real intentions of the deceased.

The quantum of the legacy and the proportion it bears to the property disposed of, according to this authority, is unfavorable to this will. But it is still only a circumstance of suspicion, which calls for vigilant care and circumspection. The turning point is, does the instrument express the real intentions of the deceased? The same principle is sanctioned and acted on in Baker v. Bott, 2 Moore P. P. C. 317. And in the subsequent case of Durling v. Loveland, 2 Curt. R. *225, 227, Sir H. Jenner Fust, referring to these passages in the judgment of Baron Parke, said, he acceded to every one of the doctrines and principles there laid down, but was not aware that the prerogative court had ever acted on any other or different. And they are recited by Judge Lomax in his book on executors, without dissent.

No presumption can be raised against the will or codicil in this case, from the fact that a stranger is preferred to his lawful kindred, when the facts certified in the record are examined. The relation was one of hostility; and the testator had long before formed the fixed and inflexible purpose that his relations should have no part of his estate; which purpose it does not appear that he ever abandoned to the day of his death, though he thought at one time of making a small legacy to each of two sisters. By the will which was written for him in 1859 by his attorney, Mr. William M. Cabell, he left them nothing.

The evidence also clearly shows that he gives his illegitimate children all that he intended them to have. On whom then could he bestow the residuum of his estate? Mr. Cabell testifies that his feelings toward Thomas Bocock were very partial. And it is also in proof that he said he intended to help him as he had been injured by the war, and was a public man, and had been disfranchised. Being unwilling to do more for his illegitimate children, and not willing that his relations should have any part of his estate, who was there, that he would have been more inclined to make his residuary legatee than Thomas Bocock.

The provisions of the codicil were known by his children and relations, and by all who felt any interest. There was nothing clandestine in the transaction. No attempt was made to exclude any one from the 182 testator's *person, or to conceal the dispositions he had made of his property. The will was not only ambulatory, revocable, or alterable, at the pleasure of the testator, from the 17th of June, when the codicil was executed, until the day of his death, the 10th of July, but the disposition in favor of Bocock could be changed simply by the testator giving orders on him. During this period the testator's relations and illegitimate children might have free access to him. The woman who waited on him and nursed him, his reputed wife, as well as his natural children, had every opportunity to bring what influence they could to bear upon him to change his will as to Bocock. Some of his children and one or two of his sisters availed themselves of this opportunity to approach him and to persuade him to change his will. But in vain. He was inflexible. He would not even do more for Martha, his reputed wife, though advised to it by his executor. All the evidence represents him as a man of strong mind and inflexible will. His sisters succeeded in disturbing his mind by representing that he had given all his bonds and choses in action to Mr. Bocock absolutely; and he expressed a desire to have some change made in that clause of his codicil. But the letter from Mr. Bocock satisfied him that it was all right, and that its provisions were just as he had directed and desired them to be. That letter represents the state of the case truthfully, and informs Mr. Johnson that he may revoke his codicil altogether, or may alter it either by executing a new codicil, or by giving orders on him, and actually sends him formulas, by which the testator can take every dollar from him and give it to whom he will. It is objected, that Mr. Bocock makes the order payable to the testator's "relations," knowing that he was 183 averse utterly to giving them any thing. But he tells him in *his letter that Mr. Thornhill can make any changes he may wish in those formulas. If Mr. Bocock inserted "relations" in the formulas, to intimate not that he should, but that he should not, make a disposition in favor of his relations, he does nothing to guard against his making a provision in favor of his illegitimate children.

It was also urged in argument, in this connection, that Mr. Bocock ought to have gone to see Mr. Johnson in order to aid him in the preparation of any papers he might wish to have prepared in relation to the disposition of his bonds and other charges on the money to be collected on them. If he kept away from Mr. Johnson to prevent him changing his codicil, or from drawing orders on him in favor of other parties, such conduct would deserve the severest censure and reprobation, and might be treated as a fraud upon those in whose favor the change was contemplated, though even such conduct could not effect a revocation of a will which had been duly executed, or defeat the probate thereof. Though the fact, if it were so, could not affect the issue involved in this suit, justice impels me to say that, in my opinion, such an inference cannot be fairly drawn from the facts appearing in this record. Mr. Bocock by his letter had plainly informed Mr. Johnson of all that was necessary to enable him to change the disposition of his bonds, &c., which he had made in his codicil, and informed him of his perfect right to make any change he thought proper, and to give the property to whomsoever he chose, and furnished him with the proper form of an order on him to effect such change, which he informed him he would respect: Thus giving him all the information he needed, and every facility to make the change which he could have afforded him if he had been personally

184 *present. It is not fair to presume that he had staid away to prevent him doing what he had already given him every facility for doing, especially when a better motive can be assigned, and with better reason for his conduct.

Mr. Bocock was aware that it was in the power of Mr. Johnson to change his will at pleasure as long as he lived, and retained testamentary capacity, and that the bequest to him was conditional, and that it was in the power of Mr. Johnson to render it valueless simply by giving orders on him, and that Mr. Johnson was aware of it. He knew also that the disposition which he had made in his favor was known to his illegitimate children, and he had reason to believe would be made public; and that the numerous persons who would feel that they were interested to defeat it, would have unrestrained access to Johnson, and would probably bring every influence they could against him. Yet it does not appear that he did anything to guard against these influences. He did not keep the disposition made in his favor concealed from Johnson's family, which would have been the most effectual, nor did he against those influences speak a word to Mr. Johnson by way of caution, or to restrain him from giving orders on him; but, on the contrary, told him that he would accept his orders payable when the money was collected, and which would be good after his death; and when he was informed by Mr. Thornhill that influences were brought to bear on the mind of Mr. Johnson to induce him to change this clause in his codicil, he wrote to him informing him that he had a perfect right to do so, and that his wishes should be carried out by him; and he furnished him with every facility he could to make any disposition he thought proper of the funds which were in his hands. In the con-

185 conclusion of his letter *he says: "As soon as my business is through I will be down;" but he never went to Mr. Johnson's house until after his death. He had a right to presume that after Mr. Johnson received his communications, if he wanted him he would let him know. He had given him all the legal advice and assistance by letter that he could if he were present. He preferred not to engage in a contest for a bequest of Mr. Johnson's property. He was willing to accept what he freely bequeathed him, but he was not willing to engage in a contest with the relations or with the illegitimate children for it. He chose therefore to surrender to them the whole field and to abide the result, without exposing himself to the imputation of going there to exert a personal influence over Mr. Johnson, to the prejudice of his blood relations and illegitimate children. It has been held that a person may by fair argument and persuasion induce one to make a will in his favor. Jarman on Wills p. 38-'9, and cases cited. And it is said by Mr. Perkins, in the 4th American edition of Jarman on Wills, to be the result of the cases, that "the influence to vitiate an act must amount to force and coercion, destroying free agency. It must not be the influence of affection and attachment, it must not be the mere desire for gratifying the wishes of another; for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act." Jarman on Wills 40, 41. Whether this be true or not, there is not an item of evidence in the record to show that Mr. Bocock, by any sort of intimidation or persuasion, influenced the testator to give him a benefit under his will, or that he even intimated a wish that he would do so. It is a fair presumption from the evidence, that the first

186 intimation that he had ever had that the *testator intended to make a testamentary disposition in his favor, was whilst he was engaged in taking a note of his instructions. And the intimation seems to have taken him by surprise. The testimony of Albert and Washington, reputed sons of the testator, who say they were present, or in hearing, when the instructions were given, and when the codicil was executed, is positive and unequivocal, to the effect that the dispositions made in the codicil were dictated and suggested by Johnson, and originated in his mind, and were written by Bocock according to his instructions, and fully corroborates the testimony of Thornhill.

If there was any sort of influence exerted by Mr. Bocock, to induce Mr. Johnson to give him so large a part, or any part of his estate, it does not appear in this record. On the contrary, the conclusion from the evidence, it seems to me, is irresistible, that the codicil expresses the real intentions of the testator, which were the suggestions of his own mind, and that it is the result of his free and unrestrained volition.

With regard to the question raised as to the competency of Albert Thornhill to testify in the cause, we think there is no error in the ruling of the Circuit court. By express statute, he is not incompetent by reason of his being executor: and it does not appear that he had any such interest in the establishment of the codicil as would disqualify him as a subscribing witness. As to the ruling with regard to the competency of James H. Gooding, the joint deed of his wife and himself releasing her interest in the estate of Johnson, if she had an interest in that estate, which would render her husband incompetent, it was thereby extinguished; and if she had not, no release was necessary to remove incompetency on that ground.

187 *But they were plaintiffs in the suit, and liable for costs. The rule which excludes a party to the record as a witness in the cause applies to all cases where the party has any interest at stake in the suit, although it be only a liability for costs, and excludes a prochein ami, &c. Murphy's adm'or & al. v. Carter & al., 23 Gratt. 485. The deposition of the wife of a prochein ami cannot be read, as he is liable for costs. If one is incompetent to testify, the other is also. Chapter 172, § 21, 22, Code of 1873, rendering parties to civil suits competent to testify in their own behalf, by express terms does not apply to husband and wife. There is no error, therefore, we think, in the ruling of the Circuit court, in excluding the testimony of James H. Gooding. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court, and that it should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Anderson, J.

Decree affirmed.

188 *McVeigh v. The Bank of the Old Dominion.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Bank Treasurer—Confederate Currency—Liability for Collections.—M was president of the O. D. bank located in the city of Alexandria, and he was a member of the firm of B & Co. of that city. In May 1861 M went to Richmond, where he remained during the war; and B & Co. removed to the same city. In January 1863, M collected of the treasurer of the state the interest on state bonds held by the bank; of course in Confederate money. After the war the O. D. bank may maintain an action of assumpsit against M for the money so collected by him.

2. Same—Same—Same—Investments.—M invests the money so collected by him in a call certificate of the Confederate States, to have it ready to be applied to the uses of the bank, and he holds the certificates until such certificates are called in by the government. He then receives the money for it, and tries to lend it out, but fails; and he then deposits it in bank to the credit of B & Co., who are to pay interest upon it, and return it on call. In 1864 B & Co. invest this money, with their own, in tobacco, M intending it to be at his own risk; he holding himself bound to pay the bank as on an investment at six per cent. The tobacco is burned during the war. This was an appropriation of the money by M to himself, and he is responsible to the bank for the value of the Confederate notes at the time they were appropriated by him.

3. War Interest.*—M is to be charged with interest only from the end of the war.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, brought in October 1870, by the Bank of the Old Dominion, located in the city of Alexandria, against Wm. N. McVeigh, late president of the bank, to recover the sum of $26,500, which it was alleged said McVeigh, as president of the bank, had collected in January 1863, from the State of Virginia <sup>189</sup> for interest upon the bonds of the state held by the bank. The declaration contained only the common counts in assumpsit.

The defendant demurred to the declaration, and pleaded non-assumpsit. And when the cause came on to be tried the court overruled the demurrer; and there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,104.17, with interest thereon from the 1st of April 1864, till paid.

In the progress of the trial the plaintiff and defendant asked for instructions, which were refused by the court, and others were given; and both parties excepted. The instructions asked and given are as follows:

Plaintiff's Instructions.

1. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the Bank of the Old Dominion had its domicil in the city of Alexandria during the war, that the defendant, while acting as president, residing in the city of Richmond, without authority collected on the 13th day of February, 1863, the sum of $26,500, interest due the bank from the state treasury, and without authority of the plaintiff invested the same in Confederate securities, they must find for the plaintiff that sum with interest.

2. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant, acting as the agent of the plaintiff, collected from the state treasury $26,500, interest due the plaintiff, and without authority of the plaintiff loaned out the said money, the jury must find for the plaintiff and assess the damages at $26,500 with interest.

3. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant, on the 13th day of 190 February, 1863, acting *as the agent of the plaintiff, collected from the state treasury $26,500, and invested the same at his own risk in business in which he was interested, the jury must find for the plaintiff and assess the damages at $26,500 with interest.

The defendant asked the court to give to the jury the following instructions, number 1, 2, 3, and 4; and in the alternative the instructions numbered 5, 6, 7 and 8, which are in the words and figures following, to-wit:

Defendant's Instructions.

1. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant, on or about the 30th of May, 1861, departed from the town of Alexandria with the intention of going within the Confederate lines, and did then accordingly go into the Confederate lines and there continually remain during the war, and for the most part in the city of Richmond, the seat of the Confederate government; then that the office of the defendant, as president of said Bank of the Old Dominion, was, in legal effect, vacated and abrogated from the time of his said departure from Alexandria, and the defendant from that time ceased to be an officer or agent of the plaintiff; and no contract, express or implied, could or did arise between the plaintiff and the defendant, on account or by reason of any alleged dealings by the defendant with the funds of the plaintiff, given in evidence in this case; and the jury must find for the defendant.

2. That in the state of facts supposed in the foregoing instruction, neither by force of the statute continuing certain officers of corporations in office until their successors are appointed, nor by virtue of the election of the defendant by the plaintiff on 191 the 16th *day of January, 1862, as its president, shown in evidence, was the defendant continued or constituted an officer or agent of the plaintiff to transact its business within the lines of the Confederate armies, or endowed with any capacity to contract for, or to be contracted with, by the plaintiff in the premises; and the jury must find for the defendant.

3. That no subsequent ratification by the plaintiff of the defendant's acts as its agent during the war, nor acknowledgment by the defendant of such agency, can retroact to constitute the defendant an agent of the plaintiff during the war, under the circumstances appearing in evidence, or give rise to any obligation on the part of the defendant to account to the plaintiff in respect to the alleged dealing of the defendant with the plaintiff's funds, given in evidence in this case.

4. That in any event, if the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant, as the agent of the plaintiff, received from the Richmond government interest on bonds of the State, belonging to the plaintiff, as in the declaration and bill of particulars set forth, the institution of this suit is a ratification by the plaintiff of such action of the defendant, and no recovery can be had herein against the defendant, merely on account of his receiving said interest, whatever was the character or depreciation of the currency in which it was so received.

5. That if the jury believe from the evidence, that the said interest was received by the defendant in Confederate notes, and that the defendant acted in good faith and to the best of his judgment in investing the same in Confederate call certificates, in the name of and for account of the plaintiff, then that said certificates thereupon became the property of the plaintiff, and the defendant is not responsible in this suit

192 for any *loss or damage, if any, which the plaintiff may have sustained by reason of such action of the defendant; and that in order to entitle itself to recover, the plaintiff must show, to the satisfaction of the jury, that it has suffered actual loss by the conduct of the defendant in collecting and dealing with their said certificates, and must prove the extent of that loss.

6. That if the jury shall believe from the whole evidence, that the defendant, after receiving the money of the plaintiff from the Richmond government, acted in good faith and according to his best judgment, in and about his management of and dealings with the same, then that he is not responsible in this action to the plaintiff for any loss sustained by the plaintiff in respect thereto, and the jury must find for the defendant. And this, notwithstanding the money of the plaintiff was invested by the defendant in Confederate States certificates, and said certificates were collected, and the proceeds placed by the defendant with C. A. Baldwin & Co., of which he was a member; if the jury shall further believe that the said money, so received and treated, was Confederate currency, and that by such change of investment from Confederate certificates to a loan to C. A. Baldwin & Co., no actual loss accrued to the plaintiff.

7. That if the jury shall believe from the evidence, that the defendant and his firm, the said C. A. Baldwin & Co., had, at all times during the war after the withdrawal of said fund from Confederate certificates and placing it with C. A. Baldwin & Co., ample funds of the same sort to meet any demands of the plaintiff, or for the plaintiff's use, to the extent of the amount received by them aforesaid, and that no demand was made by the plaintiff or for the plaintiff's use for said sum or any part of it, that the defendant is not responsible 193 *to the plaintiff in this action, and the jury must find for the defendant.

8. That the jury are entitled to judge, from all the circumstances of the case, whether or not the defendant, in placing the proceeds of the Confederate certificates with C. A. Baldwin & Co., intended at the time personally to assume responsibility to the plaintiff for anything but Confederate currency. And that if the jury shall believe that the defendant intended to undertake to be responsible to the plaintiff only for Confederate currency, and that he acted in good faith and in his best judgment for the interests alone of the plaintiff in the matter, after having endeavored in vain to invest said money otherwise for the plaintiff, then that the defendant is responsible to the plaintiff only for the value of such Confederate currency as of the time when demand was made by the plaintiff of the defendant, to wit: on the day of the institution of this suit.

And the court refused to give any of the said instructions; but in lieu thereof gave the following instructions, to wit:

Instructions given by the court.

If the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant believing himself to be president of the bank of the Old Dominion, and authorized to act for said bank, did in good faith collect in February 1863 from the State of Virginia, the interest due said bank, and invest the same for the said bank in such securities as were then regarded by the business community of Virginia as judicious investments, in this action he is not liable for anything except the interest which he 194 may have collected on such investments, with interest *thereon from the date of its receipt, unless he thereafter converted that investment and appropriated the proceeds thereof to his own use; in which event he is further liable for the value of such proceeds with interest thereon from the date of such appropriation. And the jury are instructed that a loan of the proceeds of such investment to, or a deposit thereof with the firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co., of which the defendant was a co-partner, is to be regarded as an appropriation to the use of the defendant.

Upon the application of McVeigh a writ of error and supersedeas was allowed him.

The facts material to the questions decided by the court are the following:

Before the late war William N. McVeigh was a resident citizen of the city of Alexandria, a member of the mercantile firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co., and president of the Bank of the Old Dominion located in that city. He was re-elected in January 1861, and again in his absence in January 1862. As president he from time to time collected the interest upon the bonds of the state held by the bank. In May 1861 he left the city of Alexandria, and took up his residence in the city of Richmond, where he remained until after the close of the war, and the firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co. also removed to the same city.

In July 1865 McVeigh addressed a written communication to the stockholders of the Bank of the Old Dominion, in which he says: We have been permitted again to meet together to transact business connected with this bank, and I beg here to submit a statement of my doings during the four years absent. Being separated from the board of directors by military armies, I had to act upon my best judgment and upon the judgment of 195 others with whom I advised. As *president of this bank, and as I considered it my duty to do, I collected, &c., mentioning two sums of money which he collected from the state for interest due on bonds of the state held by the Bank of the Old Dominion, and deposited on the same day in the Bank of Virginia to the credit of the first named bank; and stating that he paid, by his checks upon the Bank of Virginia, such banks as he could learn had balances against the Bank of the Old Dominion. In relation to these sums there was no controversy.

He then proceeds to state that on the 18th of February 1863 he collected from the treasurer the interest due on the state bonds held by the bank, up to the 1st of January 1863, being $26,697, and that he invested, by the advice of W. G. Cazenove, one of the directors of the bank, $26,500 in a Confederate convertible or call certificate, bearing six per cent. interest; and the balance he deposited in the Bank of Virginia to the credit of the Bank of the Old Dominion. This loan to the Confederate government continued until that government advertised for the return of all call loan certificates bearing six per cent. interest, by a certain day for payment, or they would become permanent six per cent. stocks; and then the certificate was presented, and the amount with interest paid in Confederate money; at which time a law of the state imposing a tax of one per cent. was immediately to take effect, and a law passed by the Confederate government, soon to take effect, of thirty-three and one-third per cent. tax on all Confederate currency held by banks or individuals. In order to avoid this heavy tax he made various efforts to lend out the money, but without success. As a last resort he placed it in bank to the credit of C. A. Baldwin & Co., of which he was a 196 member, with the understanding that said firm was to *pay the bank the same kind of currency on call or demand with six per cent., so that the same should stand with C. A. Baldwin & Co. on the same terms as it did with the Confederate government. In his testimony given in this case he says:

At that time Baldwin & Co. and McVeigh had more of Confederate currency than they knew what to do with, and frequently lent out large sums to such persons as they could get to take it; and they would at any time have paid any call made upon them by the bank or for its use, for the said sum of $26,500 and interest: and that said sum, with its accumulated interest, was invested by said C. A. Baldwin & Co., together with their own funds, in tobacco and other things which were destroyed by fire that occurred at Columbia, South Carolina, at Charlotte, North Carolina, and in the city of Richmond on the 3d of April 1865, at all which places the said firm had stored the said tobacco and other goods.

This investment was not made for the bank, but at the individual risk of McVeigh, he determining to continue the amount as a six per cent. investment to the bank payable any day.

John Howard, for the appellant.

Claughton, for the appellee.

Staples, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of assumpsit brought in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond by the "Bank of the Old Dominion" against William N. McVeigh, to recover certain money belonging to the plaintiff, which as is alleged, was collected by the defendant in the year 1863. During the trial instructions were asked for by plaintiff and defendant respectively, which were 197 refused *by the court; and in lieu thereof certain other instructions given; to which both parties excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; to which the defendant applied for and obtained a writ of error and superseas. It is not necessary to consider the various questions presented by these instructions. It will be sufficient to examine the two main grounds upon which defendant relies for a reversal of the judgment.

The first of these is, that the defendant in the year 1861 having left the city of Alexandria, where the bank was situated, having permanently located within the Confederate lines, his official connection with the bank as president was thereby dissolved, and his relations to that institution thereafter were those of a public enemy; and consequently no contract, express or implied, could arise between the parties during the existence of such hostile relations, and no action can be maintained against the defendant for any act done by him as president or agent of said bank during that period. In order fully to comprehend the doctrine here asserted, it is necessary to give some attention to the evidence. It appears from the defendant's own admissions, that although residing within the Confederate lines after the 11th of June 1861, he undertook to act as president of said bank; and in that character he collected from the state money belonging to the plaintiff. We must suppose that he honestly entertained the opinion that he had the right so to do. Any other supposition would be a direct imputation upon his good faith and fair dealing.

After the close of the war, in July 1865, the defendant addressed a communication to the stockholders of the bank, in which he gives a history of his official conduct during the period of his separation 198 from the *institution, and his reasons for collecting the funds belonging to it. He states that being separated from the board of directors by military forces he had to act upon his best judgment, and upon the judgment of others with whom he advised. As president of the bank he collected in November 1861 of the state treasurer fifteen hundred and seventy-five dollars, being balance of interest due the bank 1st July 1861. On the 4th January 1862 he collected eight thousand one hundred and ninety dollars, the interest to January 1862; which several sums, after the payment of certain claims against the bank, were deposited to its credit in the bank of Virginia. And on the 8th of February 1863 he collected twenty-six thousand six hundred and ninety-seven dollars, the interest due on the state bonds up to the 1st of January 1863, and invested the same, or nearly the same, amount in a Confederate convertible or call certificate, bearing six per cent. interest. The present controversy is in reference to this latter sum.

Now the position assumed in the instructions and in the argument of the defendant's counsel is, that the defendant's office or agency was abrogated by the war—that the act of the defendant as president, in collecting plaintiff's money, was null and void—that this act could not be ratified after the war by the plaintiff or defendant, so as to create a cause of action ex contractu against the defendant. Conceding all this, how does it relieve the defendant of the obligation to account to the plaintiff for money collected without authority, and appropriated to the defendant's individual use and benefit. It is a matter of no sort of consequence that he was not authorized to act as president: having undertaken to do so, he cannot set up the illegality of his own conduct to avoid the just responsibility arising out of the agency he assumed. It 199 has *been held in several cases, where money is received by an agent by force of a contract which is illegal, he cannot protect himself from accounting for what was so received by relying upon the illegality of the transaction in which it was paid to him. Sharp v. Taylor, 2 Phil. Ch. R. 801.

In Terrant v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & Pul. 3, the defendant, an insurance broker, having effected an illegal insurance for the plaintiff, and received the amount of a loss, endeavored to defend himself against the claim of his principal by showing the illegality of the insurance; but it was held the plaintiff was entitled to recover. McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. U. S. R. 236; Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 18 How. U. S. R. 289; 7 Rob. Prac. 455-6.

A fortiori does this principle apply, where the plaintiff is entirely free from censure, and the illegality of the transaction, if it be such, is attributable to the defendant alone.

The learned counsel argued this branch of the case upon the theory, that war ipso facto operates as a confiscation of the title to all property belonging to alien enemies, and that any person appropriating or holding such property cannot be required to account for the same to the former owner after peace is restored. But clearly war has no such effect. While it gives to the government authority to confiscate the property of an enemy, it does not itself confiscate, nor confer upon individuals such authority. If the government does not exercise the power, the title remains unchanged. During the existence of hostilities, the owners' remedies for its protection or recovery are suspended; but so soon as peace is restored, these remedies revive as fully and effectually as though they had never been disturbed. This is the doctrine 200 everywhere sustained by *the comity of states. Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas' R. 199, 226; Brown v. United States, 8 Cranch's R. 170.

The learned counsel insists, however, that the defendant being a mere tortfeasor, the action against him ought also to have been in tort. But it is well settled, that in cases of this sort the plaintiff has his election of remedies. He may, if he pleases, waive the tort and sue in assumpsit. Indeed assumpsit is the appropriate remedy whenever the defendant has received plaintiff's money, which in equity and good conscience he ought not to retain. 1 Rob. Prac. 484.

The defendant's second ground of defence is contained in the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth instructions, offered by him, and rejected by the court. The main proposition asserted in these instructions is, that the defendant having acted in good faith in collecting the money from the state and investing it in Confederate call certificates, the said certificates became thereby the property of the bank, and the defendant is not responsible in this suit for any loss or damage which the bank may have sustained by reason of the action of the defendant.

It will be observed that the proposition here asserted leaves out of view the important fact established by the evidence, that after the defendant had converted the certificates into treasury notes, as required by the Confederate government, he deposited the money in bank to the credit of C. A. Baldwin & Co., of which firm he was a member; and subsequently the entire amount, together with the other funds of the said firm, was invested in tobacco and other articles. This investment, as the defendant states, was made at his individual risk, he being confident it would pay him the interest, and save to the bank the heavy Confederate tax. He 201 further states that the articles so purchased *were destroyed by fires that occurred at Columbia, Charlotte and the city of Richmond, at which places the said firm had stored the property.

It thus appears that the fund did not perish upon the hands of the defendant, but was loaned by him to a firm of which he was a member, and was invested by that firm in private trade and speculation. It may be that the goods were destroyed, but we have no means of ascertaining the circumstances under which the destruction occurred. We do not know whether it might not have been prevented by the exercise of due care and diligence: whether considerable profits may not have been realized from this fund by previous investments. Upon these points the record furnishes no information; no inquiry was asked upon the subject; no issue made up. The defendant nowhere asserts that the money was wholly lost by him. He does not say that no profits were realized from its use; nor does he rest his defence upon the destruction of the property. No such ground is taken in the instructions or in the argument. The learned counsel was too well satisfied it could not be maintained. The defendant having appropriated the plaintiff's money, having invested it in trade and speculation, must of course account for it, however unfortunately the speculation may have proved. The defendant is to be regarded simply as a borrower of the fund. His use of it, whether judicious or otherwise, whether profitable or not, cannot affect the right of the creditor.

The case is wholly unlike that of Davis v. Harman, 20 Gratt. 197. There the fund was in the hands of a commissioner acting under the order of a court of chancery. He did not appropriate a dollar of it to his own use; but deposited it in bank, where it perished with the fall of the Confederate government.

202 *Nor does the case bear any resemblance to that of Pidgeon v. Williams, 21 Gratt. 251. In that case the money was also deposited in bank; was so marked as to be easily identified as the property of the plaintiff; and so remained in the bank until the termination of the war, and the consequent destruction of the currency.

The defendant is charged only with the value of the Confederate notes at the time they were appropriated by him; and with this we think he has no just cause of complaint. The verdict and judgment, however, bear interest from the 1st day of April 1864. The interest ought to be computed only from the close of the war; for the plain reason, that plaintiff and defendant were, until that date, residents of hostile sections. To this extent the judgment must be amended and affirmed, with costs to the defendant in error. In thus affirming it, we see no reason to impute any blame to the defendant. He seems to have acted throughout with a conscientious regard for what he considered the best interest of the bank. But his motives, however conscientious, cannot exonerate him from liability for his collection and appropriation of money belonging to the plaintiff.

Judgment amended and affirmed.

1. Registry Laws—Deeds of Trust.—By the act of January 16, 1867, amending and re-enacting § 5 of ch. 119 of the Code of 1860, deeds of trust &c. are to be recorded in the clerk's office of the county or corporation court within the jurisdiction of which the real estate conveyed &c. is situated.

2. Same—Same—Hustings Court.—By the charter of the city of Lynchburg jurisdiction is given to the court of Hustings for said city, not only within the limits of the corporation, but also for the space of one mile without and around said city. A deed of trust conveying real estate lying outside the corporation limits, but within one mile without and around said city, is to be recorded in the clerk's office of the corporation court of the city. And being so recorded it is valid, and has priority over subsequent judgments against the grantor in the deed docketed in the clerk's office of the county court.

Deeds—Recordation.—For reaffirmation of the doctrine laid down in the second headnote, see Burgess v. Belvin, 32 Gratt. 633; Campbell v. Nonpereil, 75 Va. 292; Boston v. Chesapeake, &c., R. Co., 76 Va. 185, citing the principal case.

The case is stated by Judge Anderson in his opinion.

Kirkpatrick & Blackford, for the appellants.

Mosby & Brown, for the appellees.

By the 4th section of the act amending the charter of Lynchburg, passed December 8, 1866 (Acts 1866-'7, p. 460), jurisdiction is given to the court of Hustings for the said city, "not only within the corporate limits of said city, but also for the space of one mile without and around said city." On the 31st of July 1869, Thomas L. Johnson, S. W. Younger, and John T.

204 *Smith, who were partners constituting the firm of Younger & Co., executed a deed of trust, conveying, with other property situated and being within the corporate limits of the city of Lynchburg, a lot of four acres of land lying outside of said corporate limits, in the county of Campbell, but within the jurisdiction of the Hustings court of said city, to the appellants, trustees, to secure the appellees equally with all other creditors of Younger & Co. And on the same day said deed of trust was admitted to record in the clerk's office of the Hustings court of said city, but never was recorded in Campbell county.

Afterwards, in 1870, judgments were severally recovered by the appellees against Younger & Co. in Lynchburg courts, which were regularly docketed in the clerk's office of the County court of Campbell county. And the question raised by this appeal is, was the recording of the deed of trust in the clerk's office of the Hustings court of the city a valid recordation as against creditors, or was it necessary that it should have been recorded also in Campbell county?

By section 5 of chapter 119, Code of 1860, p. 566, deeds of trust, &c., shall be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, until and except from the time that they are duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract may be. This section was amended and re-enacted by the act of January 16, 1867 (Acts of 1866-'7, p. 538), to read as follows: "Every such contract, &c., deed of trust, &c., shall be void as to creditors, &c., until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract or deed may be : provided, however, that all deeds of bargain and sale, of trust, of gift, or mortgage, or *power of attorney, and all writings in respect to real or personal estate, intended to be recorded, where such real or personal estate, is situated, lying and being within the jurisdiction of a corporation or Hustings court, shall be recorded in the clerk's office of such corporation or Hustings court:" which means, we think, that when the property conveyed is within the jurisdiction of the corporation or Hustings court, the deed shall be recorded in the clerk's office of that court, and shall be void as to creditors until and except from the time it is so recorded: which clearly implies that from the time it is so recorded, it shall not be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. It was the intention of the legislature, we think, by this proviso, to prescribe this recordation as to property so situated, as a substitutr for recordation in the County court. But it is nowhere said, nor, we, think is it implied, that deeds thereafter made, of property so situated, shall be recorded in the county, as well as in the clerk's office of the corporation and Hustings court.

The foregoing section, as amended and re-enacted, is not in conflict with § 6 of the Code, which is as follows: "Notwithstanding any such writing shall be duly admitted to record in one county or corporation, wherein there is real estate, or goods, or chattels, it shall nevertheless be void as to such creditors and purchasers in respect to other real estate, or goods, or chattels, without the same, until it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein such other real estate, or goods, or chattels, may be." By virtue of the preceding section, as amended and re-enacted, the property lying or being within the jurisdiction of the Hustings court of the city, although outside of the corporate limits proper, is, as to purposes of recordation, *virtually within the corporation, and need only be recorded in the corporation court; and in this case, the deed, not embracing other real estate, or goods and chattels, without the same, need not be recorded elsewhere. But if there is any conflict, section 6 must yield to section 5 as amended and re-enacted, which in point of time is the later enactment. Section 6 was not re-enacted, and is not therefore contemporaneous with section 5, as amended and re-enacted by the act of January 16th, 1867, but was enacted prior to the Code of 1860. If any of its provisions are in conflict with section 5, as amended and re-enacted, they are virtually repealed by the latter.

The deed of trust in this case having been recorded in the clerk's office of the Hustings court of the city of Lynchburg, conveying the lot or lots of land in question, lying within the jurisdiction of the Hustings court, was such a recordation as the statute required, and was valid against creditors and subsequent purchasers. And consequently, the lien so acquired by the trustees on the property embraced in the deed of trust overreached any liens upon the same property acquired by subsequent judgments. The court is of opinion, therefore, to reverse the decree of the Circuit court with costs; and doth proceed to enter such decree as ought to have been entered by the said Circuit court.

Decree reversed.

Negotiable Instruments—Usury—Bona Fide Purchaser.

—In June 1868 B filed his bill to enjoin a sale of real estate by A, the trustee in a deed given to secure the payment of a negotiable note for $1800. He says he supposed that C was the owner of the note, and charges usury in it, and sets it out. He makes C and A defendants, and calls upon them to answer on oath. He prays that they may be required to disclose the name of the holder of the note; that A may be enjoined from selling the property; that the note may be delivered up and canceled, and A required to reconvey said real estate to the trustee to whom the same was conveyed for the benefit of B's wife and children. The injunction was granted; and in June 1869 A and C answered. C said he was a broker, and the note was put into his hands for sale, and he sold it to S; and he had no interest in it. Both C and A say they do not believe there was usury in the transaction: It was a sale not a loan.

The cause stood upon the docket without any move in it, until December 1871, when B and his wife and seven infant children, by B as their next friend, asked leave to file an amended and supplemental bill. In this bill they are plaintiffs, and S is made a defendant with C and A. They set out the bill and answers, state a conveyance of the property by B to trustee for B's wife for life remainder to the children. They charge usury in the note, disclaim any discovery from defendants, ask for an issue, and if they prove the usury that the note may be declared null, the injunction perpetuated, and for general relief. Held:

1. Equity—Amended Bills.—The rule in equity in regard to amendments, is, that they may be

*AMENDED BILLS.

The General Rule Stated.—Mr. Barton in his admirable work on Chancery Practice, (page 346) says that the general rules as to amendments have been so often departed from that it is now scarcely possible to give any very accurate definition of what may be included in an amended bill. He says, however, "The general rule is, that amendments can only be granted where the bill is defective in parties, or in the prayer for relief, or in the omission or mistake of a fact or circumstances connected with the substance of the bill, but not forming the substance itself, nor repugnant thereto." Barton's Ch. Pr. (2nd Ed.) 345, citing Piercy, Ex'or, etc., v. Beckett et al., 15 W. Va. 444; McComb v. Lobdell, 32 Gratt. 185; Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. Rep. 506; Burlew, Trustee, v. Quarrier et al., 16 W. Va. 108.

"As a general rule, the court will at any time before the hearing grant leave to amend where the bill is defective as to parties, or in the mistake or omission of any fact or circumstance connected with the substance of the bill or not repugnant made when the bill is defective in its prayer for relief, or in the omission or mistake of some fact or circumstance connected with the substance of the case, but not forming the substance itself. The plaintiff will not be permitted to abandon the entire case made by his bill, and make a new and different case by way of amendment. But this rule has been much trenched upon, especially in the states and in Virginia.

208 *2. Same—Same—Alterations Permitted.—If a plaintiff is not permitted to make a new case, he may by his amendments so alter the frame and structure of his bill as to obtain an entirely different relief from that asked for originally.

3. Statutes—Suits under.—If the lender of money is made a party to a bill filed under the 7th section of the act in relation to money and interest, and answers, he cannot be proceeded against under the 10th section of said act. See Code of 1849, ch. 141.

4. Same—Equity—Filing New Bills.—Upon the coming in of the answers of C and A, B might have dismissed his bill, and immediately thereupon have filed a new bill against S, under the 10th section of said act, and he might submit to a dismissal of his bill by the chancellor, and at once file a bill against S.

5. Amended Bills—Answers of Parties As to Whom Suit Is Ended.—C and A having no interest in the note, the case is virtually ended as to them; and S not having been a party to the original bill, the answers of C and A cannot be read for or against him either under the original or amended bill, and the amended bill under the 10th section of the act may be filed.

6. Same—Delay in Filing.—As S was not a party to the original bill, and as the plaintiffs may at once file a new bill against him, the delay in tendering the amended bill cannot prejudice his interests.

7. Same—Introduction of New Parties.—Courts of equity will allow an amendment of the bill by the introduction of new parties, plaintiffs or defendants, when necessary to the ends of justice, or to prevent further litigation. As a general rule this is not a matter of course, but discretionary with the court.

8. Same—Same.—B's wife and children having an interest in the real estate conveyed in the deed, it is proper to amend the bill and unite them as plaintiffs with B.

9 Quere. Whether the original bill in this case is filed under the 7th or under the 10th section of the act.

thereto. This amendment may be made by common order, before answer or demurrer, and afterwards by leave of the 'court.' See Holland v. Trotter, 22 Gratt. 136.

Same—Omission of Proper Parties.—Where the plaintiff has shown a right to relief against parties before the court, but has omitted to make other necessary parties, there the bill will not be demurred, but he will be allowed to amend. Jameson's Adm'x v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 4. See also, Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 273; Stephenson v. Taverners, 9 Gratt. 398; Mosby v. Wither's Ex'ors et als., 80 Va. 82; Welton v. Hutton, 9 W. Va. 339.

Amended Bills—Time of Amendment.—The plaintiff may of right amend his declaration or bill before

In June 1868 Patrick Belton filed his bill in the Circuit court of Richmond, in which he states, that in April 1866 he received as a loan the sum of $1000, from, as he believed at the time, one Parker Campbell, for which he gave his negotiable note for $1300, payable one year after date, secured by a 209 deed of trust; *which he exhibits with his bill. When the said note became due, he paid $300, and executed a new note for $1300, payable one year after date, which was secured by another deed of trust; which he also exhibits. After the said note became due he refused to pay the same because of the enormous usury to which he had been subjected. And thereupon J. L. Apperson the trustee in the last mentioned deed, advertised the sale of the real estate mentioned in said deed. Complainant is not certainly advised as to who is the present holder of said note, but has been informed that it is held by one Parker Campbell of the city of Richmond. He prays that said Apperson and Campbell may be made parties defendants to the bill, and required to answer the same on oath: that they be required to disclose the name of the person who is the true owner thereof: and that Apperson be enjoined from selling, or in any manner interfering with, the real estate conveyed to him as aforesaid: that the said note may be required to be delivered up and cancelled, and that said Apperson be required to reconvey the said real estate to the trustee to whom said property was conveyed for the benefit of the wife and children of the plaintiff, by deed, of which he files a copy. The injunction was granted.

In June 1869 Apperson and Campbell filed their answers to the bill. Campbell says he was and is a broker in the city of Richmond, and about the month of April 1866 some person, he thinks Lewis A. Phelps, brought to him complainant's note, and requested him to sell it for him. The note was for $1300, payable one year after date, and was secured by deed of trust, and respondent sold it to M. H. Houston, and paid over the proceeds. That afterwards, about the 1st of May 1867, James L. Apperson, a broker of Richmond, brought the defendant's appearance, and notwithstanding such appearance, a plaintiff in equity may, at any time in the vacation of the court wherein the suit is pending, file in the clerk's office an amended or supplemental bill, or bill of revivor; whereupon, the same proceedings may be had as if leave to file it had been previously obtained in court, but the court, on the motion of a defendant, made at the term to which process to answer the same is returned executed on him, or, if it be returnable to rules, at the first term after it is so returned, may dismiss such amended or supplemental bill, or bill of revivor. Va. Code, sec. 3253.

210 to respondent another note for $1300, made *by said Patrick Belton, at one year; and secured by a deed of trust, to sell. Respondent put the note on the

Same—Same—After Publication and Cause Set for Hearing.—"The rule of the court is, that after a publication, and the cause regularly set down, you can-market, and sold it to Jacob S. Shriver, and paid the proceeds amounting to $1060, less the usual brokerage, to Apperson. That he made no enquiry as to who was the owner of said notes, or the purpose or consideration for which either of said notes was made. He sold the first note for Phelps as the holder thereof, and the second for Apperson as its holder. He or his firm have no interest, and never had any, in either of said notes, except a broker's commission. He is advised that neither of said transactions was usurious; that there was no lending or borrowing of money in the transaction, but the bona fide sale of a negotiable note to an innocent purchaser for value.

The answer of Apperson is to the same effect as to the last note; he knew nothing of the first. Plaintiff applied to respondent's firm, who were bankers and brokers, to obtain for him some money. That respondent applied to Parker Campbell & Co. to take a note for $1300 secured by deed of trust, and sell it for respondent's firm; and that Campbell & Co. sold it as he was informed, to Jacob S. Shriver, and paid the proceeds to respondent. He did not inform Campbell & Co. who was the owner of the note, or the purpose or consideration for which it was made, and that he at no time had had any communication with Shriver.

In December 1871, the plaintiff and his wife and their seven children, the children being infants and acting by the plaintiff as their next friend, moved the court for leave to file an amended bill, which was tendered for the examination of the court, and deposited with the papers in the cause. On consideration whereof the court refused to allow them to file said amended bill; but 211 tendered to the plaintiff Patrick *Belton, leave to file his amended bill making Shriver a party defendant, and requiring him to answer the allegations of the original bill, and to make discovery on oath of the true consideration of the note in controversy, and all bargains, contracts or shifts relative to the same, and the interest and consideration thereof; but this tender was declined by the plaintiff. And then the cause coming on to be heard, on the motion of the defendants the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill.

In the amended bill proposed to be filed, Patrick Belton, and his wife and their seven infant children, by their father as their next friend, are made plaintiff's; and the bill after setting out the substance of the original bill and the answers thereto, and that Shriver was the holder of and interested person in said note, states that on the 20th of May 1867 Patrick Belton conveyed the same real estate mentioned in the deed to Apperson to trustees in trust for Mrs. Belton for her life, and at her death to their children. They say that the said wife and children are necessary parties plaintiffs, not amend by making parties, and cannot introduce new charges, or put a material fact in issue which was not in the case before; but you may prefer a supplemental bill." Pleasants v. Logan, 4 Hen. & M. 489.

Same—Same—After Special Demurrer.—After special demurrer to a bill, the plaintiff may have leave to amend, on payment of costs. Rose v. King, 4 H. & M. 475.

Same—Instances Where Amendment Allowed.—Where an executor has a claim against the estate of his testator, depending on a quantum meruit only, he may exhibit a bill in equity against his co-executors and legatees, to have such claim established and fixed at a certain sum. In such case, he ought to state the claim with reasonable certainty, by setting forth his own estimate of his services; but, should he fail to do so, his bill ought not to be dismissed, but leave to amend it should be granted on motion. Baker v. Baker et als., 3 Munf. 222.

Bill being filed for the specific execution of a contract for the exchange of lands, if it appears in the progress of the cause that the defendant cannot comply with his contract, the plaintiff may amend his bill and ask for a rescission of the contract, and for such other relief as under the circumstances he is entitled to. Parrill v. McKinley, 9 Gratt. 1.

By Amending after Demurrer Plaintiff Loses Right to Appeal.—In amending, after a demurrer to the bill has been sustained, plaintiff loses his right to appeal on that ground. Fudge v. Payne, 86 Va. 803.

Cannot Deprive Defendant of Answer under Oath to Original Bill.—Where defendant answers under oath to the original bill, plaintiff cannot deprive respondent of the benefit of his answer under oath, by filing an amended bill dispensing with an answer under oath. Throckmorton v. Throckmorton, 86 Va. 768.

Omission of Fact Known at Time of Filing Bill.—The court will not allow amendments inserting facts or circumstances known to the plaintiff at the time of filing the original bill, unless some good excuse is offered for such omission—but the courts are very liberal in accepting excuses. Barton's Ch. Pr. (2nd Ed.) 346.

Making out New Case Improper.—It is well settled that an amended bill cannot make out an entirely new case. 4 Min. Inst. (2nd Ed.) 1263; Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 273; Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263; Hurt v. Jones, 75 Va. 353; Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548; Shenandoah Valley R. R. Co. v. Griffith, 76 Va. 913.

Same—Same—Same.—Says the court, in Hurt v. Jones, 75 Va. 353, "While great liberality has been manifested in modern times, especially by the courts of this country, in allowing amendments of pleadings (and with this increasing spirit of indulgence we find no fault), yet the courts everywhere agree in denying liberty to so amend and supplement a bill as to make an entirely new case."

May Ask for Different Relief.—The plaintiff may, by his amendments, so alter the frame and structure of the bill as to obtain an entirely different relief from that asked for originally. Hanby's Adm'r v. Henritze's Adm'r, 85 Va. 177, citing Belton v. Apperson, 26 Gratt. 207.

Same—Discretionary with the Court.—Amendments are largely in the discretion of the court, and are allowed with great liberality until the proofs are closed. Barton's Ch. Pr. (2nd Ed.) 345.

Liberality of the Courts in Allowing Amendments.—"The tendency of the decided cases is to relax the ancient rules and to allow amendments whenever it best serves the ends of justice so to do." Barton's Ch. Pr. (2nd Ed.) 345, note 6.

and that Shriver is a necessary party defendant, and for this among other reasons they ask that this, their amended bill, may be filed. They charge that there is usury in the loan of the said $1300 to the said Patrick Belton, and they are ready to prove it, and ask for no discovery from the said Campbell, Apperson and Shriver. And making them parties to the amended bill, they say they ask for no discovery from them or either of them; but they pray for an issue to be tried by a jury, as to whether or not there is usury in the transactions aforesaid, with the said Patrick Belton; and if the jury find that there is, that the said note may be declared null and void, that the injunctions granted may be perpetuated, and for general relief.

212 *Upon the application of Patrick Belton, an appeal was allowed by this court.

Meredith and Cocke, for the appellant.

Ould, for the appellees.

Staples, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The original bill in this case was filed to enjoin the sale of real estate under a deed of trust executed by complainant, upon the ground that the debt is tainted with usury. The only defendants are the trustee and one Parker Campbell, who negotiated the sale of the note secured by the deed. The bill, after stating the circumstances attending the execution of the note and the deed of trust, calls upon the defendants to answer on oath, and to disclose on oath the name of the person or persons who are the true owners of the note if the defendant Campbell is not the true owner.

The trustee answered, stating his connection with the transaction, denying all knowledge of the dealings which resulted in the loan, and expressing his belief that the contract is not usurious. Campbell also answered, stating that he is a broker in the city of Richmond: that the note was brought to him to sell: that he accordingly put it upon the market, and sold the same to one Jacob S. Shriver, who is the owner: that he, Campbell, made no inquiries in regard to the note: that he gave no information concerning it: that he has no interest in it, and never had any, except as to his commission: and that he is advised the transaction is not usurious, but is a bona fide sale to an innocent purchaser for value, in the usual and regular course of business.

These answers were filed at the June term 1869. No further steps seem to have 213 been taken in the cause *until the December term 1871. At that term the complainant, in connection with other persons named as co-plaintiffs, tendered an amended and supplemental bill, making Jacob Shriver, the holder of the note, a party defendant, in addition to the other defendants; disclaiming any discovery from him, asking an issue to be tried by a jury, and a decree annulling the contract.

The chancellor refused to permit the amended bill to be filed, and rendered a decree dissolving the injunction and dismissing the original bill. The only question it concerns us now to consider, is whether this refusal was proper under the circumstances. The ground taken in support of it is, that the borrower cannot be permitted to file a bill of discovery and relief, and under it obtain the answer of the defendants, and then file an amended bill disclaiming a discovery, and insisting upon an entire annulment of the contract: that if he proceeds under the 7th section of chap. 141, Code of 1860, he must be content with the relief afforded by that section: that is simply an exoneration from the payment of all interest; and having made such election he cannot be allowed to change his ground, to proceed under the 10th section, and insist upon a forfeiture of the entire debt.

It would seem to be very clear, that if the lender is made a party to a bill under the 7th section and answers, he cannot be proceeded against thereafter under the 10th section of the statute; but here the original bill is not against the lender, or against any one claiming in privity with him, or under whom he claims. It is against the trustee, who is regarded as the agent of both parties, and the broker who effected a sale of the note, and who has no further connection with or interest in the trans-214 action. When the original bill *was filed the complainant did not know who held the note in controversy: that fact was first disclosed in the answer of the defendant Campbell.

The question therefore before us, is not whether after a bill of discovery and an answer from the lender the borrower may proceed against him in an amended bill for an annulment of the contract; but whether having by mistake filed a bill against persons having no interest, and having obtained a discovery from them, the borrower is thereby precluded from a resort to the lender for an annulment of the contract upon the ground of usury.

There can be no question, I imagine, that upon the coming in of the answer to the original bill, the plaintiff might have dismissed his suit, and immediately thereupon brought a new bill, under the 10th section, against the lender. And he might equally submit to the dismissal of the chancellor, and at once file such bill against the lender. As to this there cannot be a doubt, I presume. The reason is apparent. The principle upon which equity courts have acted is, that no man shall be required to accuse himself, or to answer as to any matter which may subject him to a penalty or a forfeiture. When, therefore, the borrower called upon the lender to answer as to the usurious contract, the latter might demur to the bill, unless the plaintiff waived the penalty, and proffered to pay the principal and the legal interest. This was the practice of both English and American courts; and upon this practice the seventh section is based, modified, however, in requiring the debtor to pay the principal due without any interest.

Now it is very clear that these principles can apply only to a bill against the lender. The waiver of the forfeiture must be as 215 *discovery; and the proffer to pay must be also to him, as he alone can receive it. It is true that both the waiver and the offer of payment are now dispensed with in practice. This, however, is only because the statute dispenses with both in a bill by the borrower against the lender for discovery and relief. When the bill is not against the lender, but some other person having no interest in the loan, the borrower's rights and remedies as against the former cannot be affected, whatever may be the result. As the lender cannot be prejudiced by any proceeding in a suit to which he is not a party, so he can derive no benefit therefrom. It is therefore very clear, that upon a dismissal of the original bill in this case, the complainant might at once file a new bill against the defendant, Shriver, disclaim a discovery, and ask for an issue under the 10th section of the statute.

The question is, may he not accomplish the same object by an amended bill. The rule in equity in regard to amendments is, that they may be made when the bill is defective in its prayer for relief, or in the omission or mistake of some circumstance connected with the substance of the case, but not forming the substance itself. The plaintiff will not be permitted to abandon the entire case made by his bill, and make a new and different case by way of amendment. Shields v. Barrow, 17 How U. S. R. 130, 144.

According to the English practice, where a party has mistaken his case, and brings the cause to a hearing under such mistake, the rule is, to dismiss the bill without prejudice to a new bill. But even there the rule is in many cases disregarded. Thus in Mayor v. Dry, 2 Sim. & Stu. R. 113, the complainant by his bill sought to set aside a deed upon the ground of fraud. The defendant answered insisting upon the 216 deed; the *complainant being satisfied the deed could not be successfully impeached, was permitted to file an amended bill relying upon it.

In Smith v. Smith, Cooper's Ch. Cas. 141, a bill for an account against the defendant as bailiff was allowed to be changed into a bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage. See the cases cited in 1 Daniel's Ch. Prac., page 408. It is said by the author just mentioned, that great latitude is allowed to the plaintiff in making amendments, and the court has gone to the extent of permitting a bill to be converted into an information. It has been held where a plaintiff filed a bill stating an agreement, and the defendant by his answer, admitted there was an agreement, but different from that stated by the plaintiff, that the plaintiff might amend his bill abandoning his first agreement and praying for a decree according to that admitted by the defendant.

In the different states it is well known, that the practice of courts of equity in allowing amendments is much more liberal than in England. Those courts while professing to adhere to the rule, that the plaintiff shall not by his amended bill make a new case, have allowed so many departures from it that it is now scarcely susceptible of any very accurate definition.

For example: In Philhower v. Todd, 3 Stock. R. 54-312, it was held, even after a hearing upon a motion to dissolve an injunction and the delivery of the court's opinion, that the injunction should be dissolved and the bill dismissed, the injunction might be retained, and the party permitted to amend by altering the frame and the averments of his bill.

In Buckley v. Corse, Saxton's R. 504, the bill charged that the plaintiff had title to the premises older than the defendant's mortgage, but that under the belief that the mortgage was prior to his estate, 217 the plaintiff *had agreed to pay it, and had advanced large sums on that account. The bill prayed for an account of the moneys thus paid. Upon the coming in of the answer denying the allegations of the bill, the injunction was dissolved. Afterwards the complainant had leave to amend by making it a bill to redeem the defendant's mortgage. See Henry v. Brown, 4 Halst. Ch. R. 245; Harris v. Knickerbacker, 5 Wend. R. 638; S. C., 1 Paige's R. 209; Bellows v. Stone, 14 New Hamp. R. 175; McDougal's adm'x v. Williford, 14 Geo. R. 668; Neale v. Neales, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 1.

It is, however, unnecessary to multiply these citations from foreign courts, when we have cases so much nearer home.

In Anthony v. Leftwich's Rep., 3 Rand. 238, the bill was filed for specific execution of a contract relating to land. This court was of opinion upon the pleadings and evidence, it was not a case for specific performance. It, however, remanded the cause to the Circuit court, with leave to the complainant to make new parties, and claim compensation for the improvements he had made on the land.

In Parrill v. McKinley, 9 Gratt. 1, the bill was for specific performance, and the plaintiff was permitted to file an amended bill asking for a rescission of the contract. If these cases do not show that the plaintiff is permitted to make a new case, they at least show that he may by his amendment so alter the frame and structure of his bill as to obtain an entirely different relief from that asked for originally. This is founded upon good reason. Why should the plaintiff be put to a new bill for different relief upon the same transaction when the object can be accomplished by an amendment. If there is danger that the defendant 218 will be injuriously affected by the amendment it will be refused, *and the suit will be considered as pending only from the time of the amendment.

In the case before us, the averments of fact are substantially the same in the amended as in the original bill; the subject-matter of both is the same; and what is important to be considered, the relief asked for is the same in both cases. The only material difference between them is, that one asks for a discovery, and the other disclaims it. But this does not make a new case. It certainly has no such effect as to the lender who was not a party to the original bill. The complainant having obtained a discovery in regard to the ownership of the note, may well say he desires no discovery from the lender, as to whom he is full-handed with proof. Why should the latter complain. He is not prejudiced either by the original proceedings or by the amendment, to any greater extent than he would be by a new bill. So far as he is concerned, the amended bill is the commencement of the proceeding.

According to the rule laid down in Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 98, the aid of equity is granted to the borrower to enable him to try the question of usury before a jury, because by the form of the security he is deprived of his day in court. In such case the plaintiff may, therefore, if he pleases, waive the right to the defendant's answer. This rule, by which a court of equity gave its assistance to the vacation of the contract and the forfeiture of the entire debt, was questioned by eminent judges, entirely repudiated by others, and was finally overruled after a judicial controversy of forty years. The doctrine of Marks v. Morris has, however, been adopted by statutory enactment, and is now the law of the state, not to be questioned by this or any other court. Brockenbrough's ex'or v. Spindle's adm'r, 17

219 Gratt. 21. The legislature *has in effect said, that a borrower who wants no discovery from the lender shall not be compelled, whether he will or no, to accept it; and further, that the operation of the statute against usury shall not be defeated by the form of the contract. When, therefore, the borrower asks for an issue and disclaims a discovery, he presents himself in the assertion of a pure legal right. His application, however made, whether by original or amended bill, must be received with as much favor as the assertion of any other legal right. A party cannot be deprived of a plain statutory privilege because the court may think its exercise harsh and oppressive.

If, therefore, the bill in this case is to be regarded as filed under the seventh section of the statute, I can see no conclusive reason why it may not be so amended as to the lender (a new party) as to conform to the tenth section.

But is the original bill under the seventh section? The counsel on one side contend that it is; the counsel on the other as strenuously maintain that it is not; and the judges are not agreed on the question. The truth is, it has features that bring it under either section. It calls upon the defendants to answer under oath; but this does not necessarily convert it into a bill of discovery and relief. In Marks v. Morris the prayer of the bill was, that the defendants may, on their corporal oaths, true and perfect answer make to the premises, as fully as if they were particularly interrogated. The court say, that notwithstanding this prayer, it was not a bill of discovery and relief contemplated by the third (now the seventh) section of the statute. One of the reasons, and indeed the principal one, assigned for this conclusion was, that the appellant, so far from averring he stood in need 220 of a discovery, averred, on *the contrary, that he could prove the same by a particular witness whom he named. That averment is wanting in the present bill. It, however, contains another equally suggestive. It asks that the note may be delivered up to be cancelled, and the property be reconveyed by the trustee to the proper parties. This form of prayer is entirely inconsistent with the extent and measure of relief prescribed by the seventh section. It is true the complainant does not ask an issue; but inasmuch as he requires the securities to be cancelled, he is entitled to a trial before that tribunal which can alone declare the nullity of the contract on the ground of usury. This was the view taken in Marks v. Morris, and other cases. McPherrin v. King, 1 Rand. 172.

This original bill was manifestly prepared in great haste, and without due consideration. It is very probable the attorney was looking more to prevention of the sale than to the measure of his relief. It is impossible to say with absolute certainty what was intended, unless we can affirm with confidence that the plaintiff meant one form of bill exclusively. We ought not to deprive him of the privilege of stating by proper averments, in an amended bill, precisely the object in view.

The rule laid down in Story Eq. Pl., § 391, is, that "where a matter has not been put in issue with sufficient precision, the court, even upon the hearing, will give the plaintiff liberty to amend his bill for the purpose of making the necessary alteration." Clearly, where so much uncertainty exists as to the objects of a bill, and there is an equity on the face of it, it is better to allow an amendment than to dismiss it. Such an indulgence better accords with the liberality of courts of equity in Virginia.

*The singular anomaly suggested by 221 the learned counsel *for the appellee, of the answers being evidence under the original bill and not evidence under the amended bill, does not exist in this case. The answers of the trustee and the defendant Campbell have accomplished their end. For all practical purposes they are out of the case. They cannot be read for or against the defendant Shriver, either under the original or amended bill. The matter of controversy is now between the borrower and the lender. The answer of the latter cannot be read of course, because the complainants have disclaimed any discovery from him.

The principal difficulty in this case grows out of the delay in tendering the amended bill. This difficulty might be insuperable had the defendant Shriver been a party to the original bill from the beginning. But he is now for the first time brought before the court. He did not choose to make himself a party to the original bill, or to move for a dissolution of the injunction. The cause seems, by common consent, to have remained upon the docket without any action or motion by either party. However this may be, as the complainants may at once file a new bill against the defendant Shriver, the delay in tendering the amended bill cannot prejudice his interests.

The only remaining question is as to the new plaintiffs inserted in the original bill. They are the wife and infant children of the original plaintiff, and claim the lots in controversy, or an equity of redemption in them, under a deed executed for their benefit by the complainant subsequent to the deed of trust in controversy. These parties are, of course, directly interested in the subject-matter of this suit. The only question is, whether they may be united in the amended bill with the original plaintiff. It is the settled practice of courts of equity to allow an amendment of the bill by 222 *the introduction of new parties, plaintiffs or defendants, when necessary to the ends of justice, or to prevent further litigation. As a general rule this is not a matter of course, but discretionary with the court. 1 Dan. Ch. Pr., page 405.

In Mangkan v. Blake, 3 Chancery appeal cases 32, the sole plaintiff in a creditor's administration suit alleged that she was the personal representative of a creditor of the testator. At the hearing it appeared that the plaintiff was not his representative, and she then applied for leave to amend the bill by adding the true party as a coplaintiff with her, and by inserting other allegations to show that she had a beneficial interest in the debt which was the foundation of the suit. It was objected that the amendments amounted to a new bill, that the plaintiff's case was wholly changed, and that it was contrary to the practice of the courts to allow amendments under such circumstances. The court, however, permitted the amendments, saying they were not unreasonable, and did not cause any prejudice to the defendants. In Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 273, it was held that when the plaintiff has an interest in the subject matter of the suit, the bill may be amended, and other persons having a like interest may be joined as coplaintiffs. Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263, is to the same effect. These authorities fully maintain the amendment proposed by the introduction of the new plaintiffs.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the Chancery court erred in refusing to permit the amended bill to be filed, as requested by the appellants; and for this error the decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed. The reasons for this conclusion have been given at greater length, because the and because the appellee is sustained by the decision of the learned judge of the Chancery court, always received by this court with the greatest respect and consideration.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, that the Chancery court erred in refusing the leave asked for by the appellant and his coplaintiffs to file the amended bill tendered by them and made a part of the record of this cause; and in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the original bill of the appellant with costs, without allowing said amended bill to be filed. Therefore it is decreed and ordered, that the decree of the said Chancery court be reversed and annulled, and that the appellant recover against the appellee his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And this court proceeding to render such decree as the said Chancery court ought to have rendered, it is further decreed and ordered, that the said amended bill tendered as aforesaid be allowed to be filed, and proper process issued to mature the cause thereon, without prejudice to the injunction heretofore awarded; and that the cause be remanded to the said Chancery court for further proceedings to be had therein on the issues presented.

Decree reversed.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

Local Assessments.—The City council of Norfolk has authority under the charter of the city and the constitution of Virginia, to assess the expense, or a part of the expense, of paving a street upon the owners of the property on the street in the ratio of the front foot of their lots facing on the street.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Corporation court of the city of Norfolk, brought by W. H. C. Ellis against the city of Norfolk, to recover the sum of $874.11, which he paid under protest, as the amount assessed upon a lot on Wood street in the city, owned by the said Ellis, for the paving of said street. The parties agreed the facts, and dispensing with a jury, submitted the whole case to the decision of the court.

By the charter of the city the council of the city of Norfolk have "the power to close, extend, widen, narrow, lay out, graduate, improve and otherwise alter streets and public alleys in said city, and have them properly lighted and kept in good order," &c. "And for the execution of their powers and duties, they may raise, annually by taxes and assessments in said city, such sums of money as they shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of the same, and in such manner as they shall deem expedient, in accordance with the constitution and laws of this state and of the United States: provided, however, that they shall impose no tax on the bonds of the city."

225 *An ordinance of the city for paving and repairing streets, after providing a fund of $150,000 for this purpose, to be raised by the issue of the bonds of the city, provides how the work shall be given out to contract, when it is ordered to be done by the councils; and by § 5, provides—That when any unpaved street is to be graded, curbed and paved, three-fourths only of the cost shall be assessed upon the lands or lots lying thereon. Such assessment shall be collected by the city collector as other taxes are collected. And by § 7, it is provided—That when a street is ordered to be paved, the city surveyor shall furnish to the street committee a plan of the street, the squares, the number of front feet of each lot, and the names of the owners thereof. From this plan the bills of assessment shall be made out by the commissioner of the revenue and delivered by him to the collector.

The streets recently paved under the ordinances were not ordered to be paved until all the conditions precedent to such ordering were complied with, as specified in the charter; and Wood street was ordered to be paved upon a petition of a majority of the owners of real estate fronting on said street, and by a unanimous vote of the councils in joint meeting. The plaintiff Ellis owned a lot fronting two hundred and forty feet on Wood street, which was unimproved, and before the street was paved was assessed at $3000. The assessment on the lot was at so much per front foot, amounting in the whole to $1165.48; and after deducting the one-fourth to be paid by the city, left the amount chargeable to the plaintiff $874.11. And the ratio of assessments on all the lots on the street whether improved or unimproved was the same; viz: between four and five dollars the front foot. This tax the plaintiff paid under protest and compulsion.

226 *It appears that the lots on the corners of the streets are assessed for the pavement of both streets, so that a lot fronting twenty or forty feet on one street which was paved heretofore, and running on another street from one hundred to two hundred feet, is assessed on the whole length of the lot; and one case is stated, in which one person owns several lots on Queen street recently paved, valued in the aggregate before the improvement at $9000, one of which lots fronts on Queen street two hundred feet, and has an average depth of three feet six inches. This lot was assessed before the improvement at $150, and its proportion for the expense of paving the street is not less than $1000.

Until the passage of the present ordinance the whole cost of the paving the streets of the city had been assessed upon the owners of real estate lying on said streets per front foot.

Upon the hearing of the cause, the court below rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the said sum of $874.11, with interest from the date of the judgment and costs. And thereupon the City of Norfolk applied to a judge of this court for a writ of error and supersedeas; which was awarded.

W. B. Martin, for the appellant.

W. H. C. Ellis, for the appellee.

Staples, J. It has been held by this court that the provision in the constitution of 1851, declaring that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property, other than slaves, shall be taxed in proportion to its value," relates to taxation by the general assembly for purposes of state revenue; and does not

The present constitution however includes counties and corporate bodies also; so that the prohibition, which was formerly confined to the state government, must now equally apply to corporate bodies; but in either case the prohibition relates to taxation for purposes of revenue, and not to those assessments made by municipal authorities, upon the owners of real estate within the corporate limits, for local improvements. These assessments are not founded upon any idea of revenue, but upon the theory of benefits conferred by such improvements upon the adjacent lots. It is regarded as a system of equivalents. It imposes the tax according to the maxim, that he who receives the benefit ought to bear the burthen; and it aims to exact from the party assessed no more than his just share of that burthen according to an equitable rule of apportionment.

Whether these assessments are to be regarded as an exercise of the taxing power or the police power, or whether they are based exclusively upon the idea of compensation received in the form of benefits conferred upon the owner's property, is a question not necessary now to be discussed or decided. It is sufficient to say, that the right to make such assessments, unless prohibited by some constitutional provision, is almost universally conceded. Concurring with Judge Anderson that the power unquestionably exists; that it is vested in the corporate authorities of Norfolk, I am led to a conclusion the very reverse of that which he reaches. His view seems to be, that as the owner of real estate in a city is liable to an assessment only by reason of benefits conferred, all levies in excess of such benefits are unconstitutional and 228 void. But who is to *determine whether such excess does in fact exist? What tribunal is to settle the question? Are the courts to take cognizance of such cases, enter into a critical examination of the assessments, strike a balance of benefit on one side and burden on the other, and sustain or annul as the one or the other may seem to prevail? In a large majority of such cases, in the very nature of things, the courts cannot have before them the proper material for such investigations. I do not mean to say, that cases may not occur of such gross oppression and injustice as to require judicial interference: but they are exceptional, and must be decided as they arise upon the particular circumstances attending them, rather than upon any general rule or principle. My understanding has always been, that if the mode of assessment is regular and constitutional, if the power to levy the tax exists in that class of cases, the courts are not authorized to interfere merely because they may consider the taxation impolitic, or even unjust and oppressive. In such case the remedy is in the legislative and not in the judicial department. Cases, without number, might be cited in support of this principle. People v. Lawrence, 41 New York R. 137; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Peters' R. 514; Langhorne & Scott v. Robinson, 20 Gratt. 661; where the authorities are reviewed by Judge Joynes. In the case before us it appears that the city council of Norfolk, for the purpose of grading and paving its streets, has adopted the system of assessment by the front foot on lots adjacent to the street to be improved. The same system has been adopted in other towns and cities in the United States, and has been generally recognized by the courts as constitutional and valid. It is sustained by the highest courts in New York, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, California, Kansas, 229 *Connecticut and Pennsylvania. See Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law 502-'3-'5; and cases cited in Cooley's Const. Limitation 507.

I admit there are some opposing cases; but neither in number, learning, or weight of authority, do they bear any comparison with the decisions which affirm the validity of this mode of assessment. Upon reason and principles of natural justice, it may be sustained as apportioning the burden according to the benefit, as nearly, perhaps, as any other that can be adopted. That it may in some instances operate harshly, and even oppressively, is conceded; but this is true of all forms of taxation.

It has been well said by a learned jurist, "taxation is sometimes regulated by one principle, sometimes by another; and very often it is apportioned without reference to locality, or to the tax payer's ability to contribute, or to any proportion between the burden and the benefit." The citizen who is required to pay a tax of one thousand dollars for the support of free schools, to which he sends no children, while his neighbor, who has a half dozen to be educated, contributes nothing, may well complain of inequality of burdens. A county levy for the construction of a free bridge or other local work not unfrequently operates with peculiar hardship upon persons residing remote from the locality; and yet no one now questions the validity of such taxation. An ad valorem tax is regarded as the most just and equitable for the general purposes of government. The reason is, that a rich man derives more benefit from taxation in the protection of his property than a poor man, and ought therefore to pay more. The same rule, however, does not necessarily apply to local assessments.

They are based upon the idea of benefit 230 fits conferred by the work upon *the owners of adjacent lots. If the owner of the unimproved lot pays only according to its value as ascertained at the time, his contribution is not in proportion to the benefits derived. The lot which is worth but little to day may, by the opening, grading and paving of the street adjacent, be enhanced in a few weeks in value to the amount of thousands of dollars.

We are, however, not called upon to decide which is the most just and equitable system of taxation, but whether the one under consideration is in conflict with the constitution or laws of the state. And in this connection I cannot do better than quote from the opinion of Judge Peck, of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in the case of Northern Ind. R. R. Co. v. Connelly, 10 Ohio R. N. S. 159. He thus states and answers the objection to this form of assessment: "But it is said, that assessments, as distinguished from general taxation, rest solely upon the idea of equivalents, a compensation proportioned to the special benefits derived from the improvement; and that in the case at bar the railroad company is not, and in the nature of things cannot be, in any degree benefited by the improvement. It is quite true that the right to impose such special taxes is based upon a presumed equivalent; but it by no means follows that there must be in fact such full equivalent in every instance, or that its absence will render the assessment invalid. The rule of apportionment, whether by the front foot or a percentage upon the assessed valuation, must be uniform, affecting all the owners and all the property abutting on the street alike. It is manifest that the actual benefits resulting from the improvement may be as various almost as the number of owners and the uses to which the property may be applied. No general rule, therefore, could be laid down which 231 would do exact justice to *all. * * * *

The mode adopted by the council becomes the statutory equivalent for the benefits conferred, although, in fact, the burden imposed may greatly preponderate. In such case, if no fraud intervene, and the assessment does not substantially exhaust the owner's interest in the land, his remedy would seem to be to procure, by timely appeal to the city authorities, a reduction of the special assessment, and its imposition, in whole or in part, upon the public at large." I refer also to the cases of People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 New York R. 419; and People v. Lawrence, 41 New York R. 137; where the whole subject is exhaustively treated, and the law of local assessments placed upon impregnable grounds.

Upon my first examination of this record

I was inclined to think that the assessment here was upon the owners of the several lots for the expense of paving the street in front of each lot respectively. This upon well settled principles is illegal. A more careful examination has satisfied me, that the assessment is apportioned at uniform rates among all the owners of lots lying upon that particular street. It is one of the facts agreed, that the plaintiff has been assessed at the same rate per front foot, on his property, that all other owners of real estate on said street have been assessed on their property. In other words, the street to be improved is made a taxing district, and the expense of paving it is assessed upon the adjacent lots in proportion to the frontage of each upon said street.

Unless the expense of paving a street is very enormous, it is difficult to understand how a tax apportioned in this manner, can operate with very great hardship upon the owners of real estate abutting on the street.

It appears also, that the pavement
 232 was directed by *a unanimous vote of the two councils in joint meeting, upon the petition of a majority of the owners of real estate fronting on the street. The city pays one-fourth, and the owners of adjacent lots pay three-fourths of the expense. They are permitted to make their payments in what is known as paving bonds, received at par and payable in annual instalments of five years. The very fact that this improvement is made at the instance of a majority of those upon whom the burden falls, and that among all the members of the city councils not a vote is recorded against it, is very persuasive evidence, at least to my mind, there is no great hardship in the assessment, nor injustice in the system under which it was made. If either exists, if there are individual cases of wrong, the remedy is by a timely appeal to the city authorities; or to the legislature for an amendment of the charter. The courts cannot interfere except by an assumption of power not properly belonging to the Judicial Department.

These are my views, the results of a careful examination of the authorities, and such reflection as I could give the subject. The question is an important one, and I regret extremely that my other duties have prevented the preparation of a more elaborate opinion. For the reasons stated I think the judgment of the corporation court erroneous, and should be reversed.

Anderson, J. Upon petition of a majority of the owners of lots fronting on Wood street, in the city of Norfolk, the city council ordered it to be paved, and that one-fourth of the expense should be paid out of the public treasury, and three-fourths be assessed on the lots fronting on the 233 street. The defendant in *error being owner of one of the lots was assessed with $874.11, which he paid under protest, and then brought suit in the Corporation court of said city to reclaim it, and obtained judgment. And the case is brought here by the city of Norfolk upon a writ of error.

The main questions are, "Have the city council authority to make assessments upon the owners of real estate, especially benefited, to pay the expense of the improvement, or any part of it? And is the per front foot apportionment lawful?"

I am not aware that these questions have ever been decided in Virginia. But numerous cases have been cited from other states, in which the power to make such local assessments has been maintained, though upon different grounds. In some of them the power has been derived from the right of eminent domain; in others from the taxing power. I think it is clear that the power cannot be derived from the former source. Government cannot take private property in the right of eminent domain, except by giving to the owner a just compensation therefor. And it has been held, and I think rightly, that money is not subject to the right of eminent domain. Why should the government take the citizen's money, to return it to him as soon as taken? The power cannot be derived from that source.

Is it taxation? If it is, it is prohibited by the constitution of this state. Section 1, article 10, provides "That taxation, except as hereinafter provided, whether imposed by the state, counties, or corporate bodies, shall be equal and uniform, and all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as prescribed by law." To raise revenue, it is required that all property shall be taxed, and it must be taxed in proportion to its value.

234 *But it is contended that although it is taxation, it does not fall within this constitutional limitation, because though it is a tax, it is not a tax on property but on benefits. But it seems to me that is untenable. If it is a tax at all, and is not a tax on property, it would be difficult to perceive what is a tax on property. It is an assessment upon the land of the defendant in error to pay for the improvement of public property, the paving of a public street, which incidentally enhances the value of his property. It cannot be said that it is not a tax on property, but on benefits, because it incidentally enhances the value of the property taxed. All taxation is for the benefit of the body politic; and the well being and benefit of the body politic benefits all its members. Therefore it may be said, that all taxation is incidentally for the benefit of the taxpayers, and may as logically be said to be a tax on benefits.

In other cases cited, it is said that whilst it is an exercise of the taxing power, it is not exerted for the purposes upon which the constitutional limitation was designed to operate. And in support of this position, Gilkeson v. Frederick Justices, 13 Gratt. 577, is relied on. In that case, art. 4, § 22, of the constitution of 1851, that "taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property, other than slaves, shall be taxed in proportion to its value," &c., was construed to apply "to the commonwealth's revenue, and to nothing else." This construction was put upon the ground, that County courts, city councils, &c., had always exercised the power of local taxation for local purposes, and upon different rates and upon different subjects, and they were not expressly embraced in the constitutional limitation. Judge Samuels, speaking for the whole court, says (p. 235 583) "the power of the general *assembly to confer authority on County courts, city councils, corporations, and other organized bodies, to impose local taxes for local purposes, had been exercised from the adoption of the first constitution down to the formation of the last. The rates and subjects of taxation were different in many instances, if not in all; the powers conferred were not always the same, but were varied to meet the exigencies of particular circumstances, and frequently were left to the discretion of the body on which they were conferred. All this was known to the convention, yet no explicit provision was inserted in the constitution changing this power of the general assembly. Surely if a change in the whole scheme of taxation was intended, the convention would have expressed the intention in plain terms, and not have left us to arrive at it by forced construction." In the present constitution it is expressed in plain terms; and perhaps with reference to the above decision. Counties and corporations are expressly embraced within the limitation. And as the public streets are a subject of municipal regulation, and the putting them in good condition, and keeping them in repair, and paving them when necessary, and the raising money for such purposes, are as much a public duty and necessity, as to raise money for any other branch of municipal administration, taxation for such purpose necessarily falls within the aforesaid constitutional limitation; and this reasoning is consistent with the principles enunciated in Gilkeson v. Frederick Justices, supra. The case of Langhorne & Scott v. Robinson, 20 Gratt. 661, is under the constitution of 1830, which contained no restriction on the taxing power, and consequently has no application to this case.

If therefore it is a tax I can see no reason why it is not included in the general terms "taxation" and "tax" as employed in the constitution. If it is taxation, or an exercise of the taxing power it seems to me, that it plainly falls within the letter of the constitutional limitation; and within its spirit too. For I can see no reason why the legislature and municipal corporations should be limited in laying a tax for general purposes to uniformity and equality amongst those who are assessed with the tax, and should not be so restricted in laying a tax for local purposes. Equality in the one case is as essential to justice as in the other. Unless then we can find some other ground upon which the assessment is warranted it seems to me, that it is plainly prohibited by the clause in our constitution referred to above. If it is taxation, it is prohibited upon the ground that it is not equal and uniform; and further, upon the ground that it is a tax on property, and is not apportioned according to the value of the property.

But I am inclined to the opinion, that it is not properly a tax; and that it is erroneously ranged under the taxing power, in the cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel. Whilst we have great respect for the judicial decisions of our sister states, and for the opinions of the able text writers, who seem to follow them, they are not binding authority upon this court: and I am the less reluctant to dissent from them upon this question, inasmuch as the decisions of other courts, equally entitled to our respect, hold that it is not an exercise of the taxing power. The question is one of first impression in this state; and not being trammelled by authority I feel free to consider it upon what I consider sound principles of law, and reason.

It is an assessment. But the word assessment does not always mean a tax. A jury of inquest, upon a writ of ad quod damnum, is directed to assess the damage 237 *to the owner of the lands through which the road passes, or which shall be condemned for the abutment of a mill dam, and the like. And a jury is required to assess the damage, to which the plaintiff in an action at law is entitled, in the execution of a writ of inquiry. And by section 67 of this same charter, the city councils are required to assess, and pay to any one whose house has been destroyed by the city authorities to arrest the progress of a fire, the damage he has sustained. In these cases assessment does not mean a tax. And so it may not in the provision of the charter now under consideration. It is evidently a mode of raising money to defray the expense of improving the streets, which is different from the mode of raising it by taxation. The charter empowers the councils to determine what proportion of the expense of the improvement shall be paid out of the public treasury, and what proportion shall be paid by the owners of real estate who are benefited. For the former the money is raised by taxation; for the latter it is raised by an assessment on the owners of the real estate which is specially benefited.

In the class of cases now under consideration, the improvement is chiefly for the benefit of the owners of the real estate which is adjacent to the street which is paved. And the design is, that they shall pay a proportion of the expense of the improvement beyond their contribution in common with other citizens, by taxation, according to the special benefits they receive. And the city having paid the whole cost by its bonds, the city councils are authorized to assess—that is, to ascertain and determine—what proportion of the cost paid by the city was for the owners of the real estate thus exceptionally benefited; a bill or an account of which is to be stated by the commissioner of the revenue, 238 *and placed in the hands of the city collector. And to enforce the payment he is required to collect it as city taxes are collected. This very language implies, that these assessments were not regarded as taxes. The city having paid part of the cost of a street improvement, which certain owners of real estate ought to have paid, it being to that extent for their peculiar benefit, in order to have it refunded to the city, the councils are authorized to assess each one with his fair proportion—that is, to ascertain and determine what he shall pay—which I think is made a charge upon his estate, real and personal, by the provision that it shall be collected as city taxes.

It seems to me, that these local assessments fall neither under the head of the taxing power nor the power of eminent domain. It is a distinct power vested in the councils by the charter, to enable them to perform their important function of providing suitable streets and highways for the city, to determine what proportion of the cost, if any, shall be paid by the city, and what portion the parties benefited shall pay. The portion of the expense which the city shall pay they may raise by taxation, it being for a corporate purpose; the part which the owners of real estate benefited should pay, being for individual benefit, and therefore wanting in an essential element of taxation, which must be for a public purpose, the charter impliedly authorizes the councils to apportion it amongst them, and to assess the amount against each of them, as a jury would assess damages. Independently of the power thus conferred upon the councils by the charter, they could not make the requisition upon the parties benefited. They could not do it under the taxing power, because the constitution requires a tax on property to be apportioned according to the value of 239 *property, real and personal. If this power was not specially given, all that the councils could do, if they were petitioned to have a street paved, and did not regard it of such public interest as to justify its being done wholly at the public charge, would be to agree that they would pay out of the public treasury, one-half, one-third, or one-fourth, or other proportion of the expenses as they might consider the public interest in the work would justify, provided the balance should be raised by the parties to be benefited. Such it is believed, has been the common usage in the administration of county affairs. The inhabitants of a section of a county, are desirous of having a bridge over a stream. It is a work in which they are peculiarly interested. And whilst it will be of general advantage to the county, the justices do not regard it as of such general advantage as to justify its construction wholly at county expense; and they propose to order it, and to pay a part of the cost, provided the balance is raised by private contribution. And in order to have the bridge those who are interested must raise the balance. And so, whilst the paving of a street may be of public benefit to a city, the council may consider that it will not be of such benefit as to justify an outlay to have it done at the public expense in the whole, or in some cases, even in part. If then it is done, it must be entirely by private contribution in the one case, or partly in the other.

These contributions must be either voluntary or compulsory. If the former, the misfortune is that all will not contribute in proportion to the benefits they will receive from the improvement. The more liberal and public spirited will contribute more than their just proportion; some will barely do their part, and others will do little or nothing, willing to share in the

240 benefits, *but not in the burden. The inhabitants of Norfolk in providing a government for their city, provided in their charter that contribution in such case should be compulsory, and that the amount which those benefited ought to pay should not be left to their own biased judgment, but should be determined by the city councils, not arbitrarily, but according to benefits received. And the ground of compulsory contribution is, that it is a public improvement which enhances the value of their real estate in a way that it does not the real estate in the city generally, and benefits them especially as it does not the citizens in general, and that it is just and proper that they should be required to contribute specially to the cost of making it. The authority given by the charter to make these assessments is founded in this (under proper restrictions) just principle, and I do not regard it as falling strictly or appropriately under the head of the taxing power. But it is a distinct power vested by the charter in the councils, with the assent of the corporators, to ascertain and determine upon a question of quid pro quo what a member of the corporation should pay to it for the special benefits he receives from the improvement. If it be said he did not ask for it, that the work was not done at his instance and request, it might be answered, that he, being a member of the corporation consented, (for his consent to the charter must be presumed,) that the councils might, under certain prescribed conditions, decide for him whether the work should be undertaken and assess him with such portion of the expense as ought to devolve on him in proportion to the special benefits which he derives from the improvement. Their decision that the improvement is a work of public convenience or necessity, and

241 that it shall be made, supersedes *the necessity of a special request from him. It being a public work which must be paid for by the citizens, it is not right that those who derive special and extraordinary benefits from it should pay no more than the citizens generally. Therefore the principle of the charter which authorizes an assessment on the owners of real estate who are specially benefited by the improvement, to pay a part of the expense of the work, in proportion to the special benefits which they derive from it, over and above what they receive in common with the other citizens, it seems to me, is founded in reason and justice, and a sound public policy. The power can only be exercised on this principle, or on the principle of taxation. If on the former, it is on the principle of a return for benefits received: If on the latter, it is on the principle the right of sovereignty to command. But we have seen that this right to command, this power of taxation, is limited by the constitution: That taxation must be equal and uniform, and that all property, real and personal, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, whether levied by the sovereign legislative power of the commonwealth or by municipalities. And if these assessments can only be supported as a tax, or under the taxing power, I could not consistently with my obligations to the constitution, sustain them. A plain mandate of the constitution ought not to be evaded by ingenious construction.

But the assessments being warranted, upon the other principle, the councils are clearly not authorized to make an arbitrary assessment—that would be despotism; nor an assessment in proportion to the value of the property owned by the parties assessed; or of their ability to pay; or of the value of their lots fronting on the street; or the size of them; or their 242 *per front foot. But these matters may all be considered, as well as the condition and situation of the lots, and the use to which they are or may be applied, and any other circumstance which may have any bearing upon the question of proportion of benefits received. Upon this principle in no case could the owner of a lot be assessed with a sum which would necessitate a sale of his lot for less than the amount of his assessment. For if he is benefited it must be by the enhanced value given to his real estate; and I cannot see how he would be benefited by the improvement if he was thereby forced to sell his real estate to pay it at a price not exceeding the amount of his assessment. It is in fact a judicial inquiry, and should be proceeded with as such.

It is contended that the councils in making the assessment exercise their legislative function. That I apprehend is a great mistake. The councils are invested with both legislative and judicial functions, as will be readily seen by inspecting the charter. This is a judicial function. The determination of what constitutes a benefit, and its valuation, says Mr. Sedgwick, are judicial acts, which do not pertain to the legislative function. Sedgw. on Const. Law, pp. 169, 174-'5, 177. In State v. Collector of Newark, 1 Ducher's R. 315, it was held that these local assessments were of a judicial character, and that the power of the court to review them was too well settled to be questioned. In The People v. The Mayor &c., of New York, 5 Barb. R. 43, it was held that it was competent for the Supreme court to vacate the estimate and assessment of the common council for the construction of a sewer, as the common council then acts in a judicial capacity. In

Parks v. The Mayor &c. of Boston, 8 Pick.

R. 218, it was held that the power
 243 vested in the mayor *and aldermen of Boston, as to the laying out and altering of streets, is judicial, and a certiorari lies in such case. But it is unnecessary to multiply citations of authority further, in support of this proposition. It seems to be very clear both upon reason and authority, that the function is judicial and not legislative.

In my opinion it would be competent for the councils, and it would be the right way, to summon the parties sought to be assessed before them, to show cause against it, who should be allowed to be heard, and to adduce evidence upon the question: or the councils might make the inquiry through a commission, as is required by the statute of New Jersey, who upon an actual view, and upon such evidence as either party might adduce, should make their report to the councils for confirmation; and in either case the party should have notice. It has been held in New York and New Jersey that notice is necessary, although not expressly required by the statute.

But it is contended, that an apportionment according to the front foot extent of the lots along the street paved may be adopted as a safe and uniform rule for a just apportionment of the expenses according to the benefits received. It is possible that there might be a case in which it would so operate. But if so it would be an exception to the general rule. In New Jersey and the great State of Illinois, where they have immensely wealthy and populous cities, their experience seem to be different. In State v. Hudson City, 5 Dutch. R. 116, 117, it was held that an impost according to extent of front, absolutely excludes the idea of an assessment in the ratio of benefits. See also City of Chicago v. Larned, 34 Illi. R. Whether it is true to that extent or not, I think that enough may be seen in this brief record of the operation of the rule in 244 this case, to *show that the reverse of the proposition contended for is true. It shows that in the assessments made by the councils, under the operation of that rule adopted in this case, the owner of a lot valued at $150, before the improvement of the street, was assessed with $1,000 as his share of the expense of the improvement. A rule which produces a result so shocking to our every sense of justice cannot have the merit which is claimed for it, and cannot be relied on as the best practicable rule to make an apportionment among the owners of the lots benefited according to the benefits they receive from the improvement. But it is attempted, by the advocates of the rule, to parry the effect of this damaging fact, by alleging that the party thus demnified had not then applied to the councils for relief. He may be awaiting the decision of this cause, which seems to be treated as a test case. Whilst I would not regard the value of the real estate benefited as the rule upon which the assessments should be made, I would regard it as having an important bearing, with other circumstances, in making a just apportionment of the benefits received; which we have seen is the only principle upon which the assessment can be made. The owner of a lot handsomely improved, with a costly residence upon it, would be greatly more interested in having a well-paved street than the owner of an unimproved lot; but upon the basis of apportionment per the front foot the owner of the unimproved lot having double the front, although the area was no greater, would be required to contribute twice as much to the pavement of the street. And between lots unimproved there might be a great difference in the benefits which they receive from the improvement on account of situation and other circumstances, although they 245 were equal in the front foot. And *yet the owners on this basis are required to pay the same. Their benefits are not equal. One may own a lot on which he has a costly hotel, and the pavement of the street may add 50 per cent. to its value by increasing his custom; but he is required to pay no more than the owner of an unimproved lot which is not a tenth of its value and from which he derives no income. Do they derive equal benefits from the improvement? A man of plain common sense would answer no. The same may be said with regard to the owner of a lot upon which there are valuable stores or machine shops. Is it not manifest that he derives much greater benefits from the improvement than the owner of an unimproved lot, or of one the improvements on which are of inconsiderable value, though of equal front, and from which he derives little or no income.

It is not without doubt and difficulty I have reached the conclusion that, under the constitution of Virginia this power of local assessment can be maintained at all. I am clear that it cannot be maintained under the taxing power. And that if it can be maintained at all it is by virtue of the judicial power vested in the councils by the charter, to assess the owners of real estate with a just proportion of the expense, according to the special benefits which they respectively derive from the improvement. I cannot conceive of any other principle upon which they could justly or lawfully be required to pay for a public work beyond their just liability, in common with other citizens, to taxation for public objects. The improved street is not theirs: It is public property. They have no right to use it that does not equally pertain to every other citizen. And it is urged with much force of reason, that it ought to be made at the cost of the 246 city by a *constitutional tax upon all the citizens. The only ground upon which they can be required to pay beyond their common liability with all other citizens, is, that the improvement is a benefit to them in a way that it is not to the citizens in common. And it is only to the extent of those benefits, and in proportion to the value of those they respectively receive, that they can be held liable. And this is a judicial question, which ought not to be determined against them without notice and an opportunity to be heard. And in no case can they be assessed beyond the value of the benefits which they specially receive from the improvement.

But it is said that it is a power which the legislature could not exercise and therefore could not delegate. It is true that it is a power which the legislature could not exercise. And it is true, that the legislature cannot delegate a legislative power with which it is not itself invested. But I apprehend it is not true as to judicial power. The legislature can surely invest another tribunal with judicial power which it cannot exercise itself. And therefore it is only upon the ground that it is a judicial power vested in the councils by the consent of the corporations, that it can be maintained, and in my opinion, can only be maintained under the restrictions and qualifications which I have endeavored to explain.

It does not appear from the record, that these restrictions were observed by the councils in this case. It appears to be an arbitrary assessment per the front foot of the lots, and not, nor professed to be, in proportion to the benefits which the owners of the real estate derived from the improvement. The councils have not therefore confined themselves within the limits of their authority; and the assessment is void.

247 *In this conclusion I am fortified by the recent decisions of the Supreme court of Illinois; in one of which the great city of Chicago was a party; by repeated decisions of the Supreme court of New Jersey, and other cases. I am of opinion for the foregoing reasons, that the assessment in this case being without authority, is null and void, though it is competent for the councils to make another assessment upon the principles indicated in this opinion. I am therefore for affirming the judgment of the Corporation court.

given to her, being the property of the daughter Rosa B. Gregory, James A. Gregory, in April of that year, qualified as her guardian, with William Smith and C. H. Pettus as his sureties. He then closed upon his books the executorial account which he kept, and opened on them an account as guardian of Rosa B. Gregory; and the first item in this account as guardian is a credit to his ward, under date of January 1st 1860—Amount due from estate of R. T. Gregory $4,016.37. And the account was kept as a guardian's account upon his books. When, however, he submitted his accounts for settlement to the commissioner in 1863, the commissioner stated it as his account as executor; and reported the balance due from him as executor on the 1st of January

1862 to be $4,659.80. Gregory states
250 in his evidence *given in this case, that he gave the commissioner his book containing the account as he kept it, and requested him to settle the account as a guardian's account; and when he saw that it was made off as executor, he enquired of the commissioner why it was done, and the commissioner said that as there was but one legatee it made no difference.

In 1860 when James A. Gregory transferred on his books the balance due from him as executor to his account as guardian, and at any time subsequent to that, he did not have in his hands, any money, stocks, bonds, accounts or assets of any kind belonging to the estate of his testator; but the amount so transferred was his personal indebtedness as executor to the estate. Nor did he afterwards make any investment of funds in the name or for the special benefit of his ward Rosa B. Gregory. He says in his evidence in this case, that both in 1860 and in 1863, his estate was ample to pay this and all his other debts. It also appears that at these dates and indeed until the decree in this case, there was a debt of $1,000, contracted by the testator, which had not been paid.

At the rules in July 1866, James A. Gregory had a suit instituted in the Circuit court of Mecklenburg county, in the name of Rosa B. Gregory, by her next friend, against him as executor of Robert T. Gregory, deceased, and guardian of the plaintiff, asking that James A. Gregory might be required to render before a commissioner under the direction of the court, a full settlement of his accounts as executor and guardian. On the same day Gregory filed his answer, in which he says he has made several ex parte settlements of his transactions as executor, which he believes are satisfactory to all parties having an interest in them. Subsequent to these settlements, however, he, both as executor

251 *of Robert T. Gregory and as guardian of the plaintiff, has had a number of transactions, the consideration of which was Confederate States treasury notes; and he is advised that an account of these transactions can be properly and equitably adjusted only under and by the direction of a court of equity. Being so advised he unites in the prayer of the bill for a settlement of these accounts by a commissioner.

On the 5th of September 1866 the court made a decree that the defendant James A. Gregory do render before one of the commissioners of the court, an account of his transactions as executor of Robert T. Gregory deceased, and also as guardian of Rosa B. Gregory; which the commissioner was directed to examine, state and settle, and report to the court.

On the 8th of September commissioner Atkins returned his report. He first states the account as executor, which he brings down to the 1st of January 1863, and states a balance in his hands at that date of $4,599.93; which he settles by an entry of that sum transferred to J. A. Gregory's account as guardian of Rosa B. Gregory. He then states an account as guardian, charging him as of the 1st of January 1863, with this sum as guardian; and reports a balance due from the guardian on the 1st of September 1866 of $5,350.20.

The cause came on to be heard on the 18th of the same month of September, upon the papers formerly read and on the report of the commissioner, which was received and considered by consent of parties by counsel, on consideration whereof, there being no exception to said report, the court confirmed the same, and decreed that James A. Gregory do, from time to time, and without any further decree, render before one of the commissioners of the court a further ac-

252 count *of his transactions as guardian of Rosa B. Gregory, which accounts the commissioner &c.

In March 1869 Rosa B. Gregory, who was still an infant under twenty-one years of age, by her next friend, brought a suit in equity against James A. Gregory as executor of Robert T. Gregory deceased, and as guardian of the plaintiff Alexander Smith, in his own right and as the administrator de bonis non of William Smith deceased, D. G. Smith, and Mary A. Pettus administratrix of C. H. Pettus deceased. In her bill after setting out the death and will of her father, the qualification of James A. Gregory as executor and guardian, and the suit brought in 1866, as herein before stated, she charged that at the time he made the transfer of his indebtedness as executor to his guardian's account he had no money or assets of his testator in his hands. She says that in the settlement of his account in 1866 he gave the first indication that he regarded the balance of $4,599.93, as held by him in his character of guardian of the complainant; and she charges that at the time that account was rendered the said James A. Gregory was in insolvent circumstances. She charges that he had been declared a bankrupt, and had made a surrender of his property, and complainant is left to look to the sureties of said Gregory on one of his official bonds for the satisfaction of his indebtedness to her. She insists that the act of the commissioner transferring a balance found due by an insolvent executor who held no money or property whatsoever belonging to the estate of his testator in his hands, could not shift the onus from the shoulders of his sureties as executor to those of his sureties as guardian of the complainant; and that she is entitled to look to the sureties upon the executorial bond for satisfaction of the indebtedness of the said *James A. Gregory to her. Certainly, however, she is entitled to look for indemnity to the sureties upon the one bond or the other. And making the said James A. Gregory, and Alexander and D. G. Smith his sureties in his executorial bond, and the said Alexander Smith the administrator de bonis non of William Smith deceased, and Mary A. B. Pettus administratrix of C. H. Pettus deceased, the said William Smith and C. H. Pettus, having been the sureties in the guardian's bond, defendants, she prayed that the court would decree against the said Gregory and his sureties in one or other of the official bonds aforesaid, for whatever may be ascertained to be the amount of his indebtedness to her, and for general relief.

At the March rules James A. Gregory filed his answer. He admits that he did in 1866 cause the suit aforesaid to be instituted, in which suit his accounts both as executor and guardian were settled by a commissioner, whose report was confirmed. That from these accounts as early as January 1st 1863 the entire balance due from him as executor was debited to him as guardian of the plaintiff; and he refers to these accounts. He denies that the report by the commissioner of the transfer of balance made by him as of January 1st 1863, was the first act or intimation of the respondent that he held the balance due on his executorial account as the proper funds of his ward Rosa B. Gregory. On the contrary, as appears from his original book of accounts, the last entry in his account as executor was made March 15, 1860. The balance due the estate at that time was $4,016.37. On the 16th of April 1860 he qualified as guardian of plaintiff, and the said balance was transferred on his books to her credit in an account headed: R. B. Gregory to J. A. Gregory, guard., and from that time to the settlement 254 *aforesaid by the commissioner, every entry in relation to the estate was made by respondent on his guardian account; and he treated and regarded the whole of the estate as belonging to his ward Rosa B. Gregory, from and after the date of his qualification as guardian and transfer as aforesaid.

He further says that in April 1860, when he opened his guardian account as aforesaid and credited his ward with the balance due from him as executor, although the balance was not actually in his hands in cash, and so transferred, he was the owner, over and above his other debts, of property and effects, worth largely over, indeed many times over the amount thus transferred. He denies that he was in insolvent circumstances either in 1866 when the account above referred to was settled, or in January 1863 when the balance was transferred by the commissioner to the guardian account. In January 1863 as in 1860 he was fully able to meet an indebtedness many times larger than the balance transferred; and in 1866 although his means were much reduced by the disasters of the war, he yet regarded himself as fully able to discharge the indebtedness in question after satisfying his other debts.

At the April 1869 term of the court, Rosa B. Gregory by her next friend, filed her petition in which after setting out the proceedings in the suit of 1866, as herein before given, she says that James A. Gregory is a bankrupt, one of the securities in the guardian's bond is dead, and his estate is believed to be insolvent, and the solvency of the other security is doubtful; and stating that though nominally plaintiff in that suit, she had no agency in bringing or prosecuting it, she prays that the said cause may be reheard upon the report of the commissioner, and that it may be 255 *heard with another suit in this court upon a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review filed by her by her next friend, against the said James A. Gregory as guardian and executor as aforesaid and against his sureties in his official bonds.

In May 1869 Alexander and D. G. Smith the sureties in the executorial bond, filed their answer referring to and adopting the answer of James A. Gregory as a part of their own, and relying upon the same and all the facts therein set forth as their proper and full defence. The only material fact not already stated is, that Atkins who prepared the papers and filed the petition in bankruptcy for James A. Gregory states, that nearly the whole of said Gregory's indebtedness was reported to him by Gregory as being due in 1860, or before that time; and that the indebtedness was very heavy.

In October 1871 Commissioner Atkins restated the accounts of James A. Gregory, in which he brings down the executorial account of James A. Gregory to September 1, 1866, and states a balance on that day due from the executor to his testator's estate of $4,599.43 of principal and $769.95 of interest. He states a guardian's account commencing January 1st 1863, which he brings down to September 1st 1866, and reports a balance due to the guardian of $63.79.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 27th of October 1871, when the court, being of opinion that the proceedings in the suit instituted by James A. Gregory in the name of his ward were irregular and erroneous, and that the plaintiff should not be estopped by the decree entered in that suit on the 18th of September 1866, reversed and set it aside. And the court being further of opinion that the defendant James A.

Gregory, being both executor and 256 guardian, *could not by his voluntary act transfer his liability on his official bond from one set of securities to the other, and that he had no authority to transfer the money due by him as executor to the guardian of Rosa B. Gregory, until the estate of his testator was fully administered by the payment of all the debts and liabilities of the testator known to him; and that not having been done his securities on the executorial bond are responsible to the plaintiff for the amount due from him to the estate of his testator. And James A. Gregory admitting by his answer his indebtedness to the estate as reported by the commissioner in his report of September 8th 1866, and the defendants Alexander and D. G. Smith having by their answer adopted the answer of said Gregory, and the court reforming the said account by striking from the administration account the items which should be charged in the guardian's account, and giving credit for the balance due to the guardian on that account, decreed that the defendants James A. Gregory, Alexander Smith and D. G. Smith do pay to Robert Burton, legal guardian of Rosa B. Gregory, the sum of $5,306.13 with legal interest on $4,599.93, part thereof, from the 1st of September 1866, till paid, after being credited with the sum of $1,300.16 as of this day; it being the amount of a bond due from the estate of Robert T. Gregory to R. R. Jeffress, and which has been transferred to the defendants Alexander Smith and D. G. Smith. And that the defendants pay to the plaintiff her costs. From this decree Alexander and D. G. Smith applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

The case was argued in printed notes as well as orally, by Jones & Bouldin for the appellants, and Page & Maury for the appellee.

257 *Staples, J. The law is well settled that where an executor or administrator having assets in his hands, becomes the guardian of the legatee or distributee, he may elect to hold the share of such legatee or distributee in his character of guardian; and thus while he charges his sureties in the guardian bond he exonerates those in the administration bond. And it is equally well settled, that in order thus to shift the responsibility from one class of sureties to the other, some distinct act or declaration is necessary on the part of the executor or administrator, indicative of his intention to hold the fund in his character of guardian. Myres v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444; Suope v. Chambers, 2 Gratt. 319; Alston v. Munford, 1 Brock. R. 266, 278; note 6.

These principles are not controverted by the counsel on either side. While, however, they have a strong bearing upon the point in controversy they do not cover the entire ground. The question arising here involves some additional issues necessary to be considered. This will be better understood by a brief reference to the facts of the case.

The testator Robert T. Gregory, died in October 1856. James A. Gregory, one of the executors appointed by the will, qualified as such shortly thereafter. In April 1860 he also qualified as guardian of Rosa B. Gregory, an infant daughter of the testator and the principal legatee under the will. Both as executor and as guardian he executed bond with sureties for the faithful performance of the duties of these several offices. As executor he received assets to a large amount; and at the time of his qualification as guardian in 1860, there was an acknowledged balance against him of more than four thousand dollars. Neither at that time nor at any subsequent period, had he 258 *in his possession or under his control, any money, bonds, stocks, credits or assets of any description belonging to the estate of his testator, but this balance was the executor's own indebtedness growing out of assets received by him and wasted or converted to his own use. This fact is proved by the executor himself, and is not controverted.

It is also claimed and not denied, that the executor after his qualification as guardian, by distinct acts and declarations more particularly to be adverted to hereafter, elected to charge himself as guardian with the balances due by him as executor. The controversy here is not between different sets of sureties; but between the infant legatee and the sureties in the administration bond. The guardian is himself a bankrupt; and the sureties upon that bond are in doubtful circumstances, if not entirely insolvent.

The ground taken by the appellants, is, that the same person being both executor and guardian, he had the right to decide for himself, when and to what extent he would transfer his account as executor to his account as guardian; and when he has made his election to transfer and does transfer a balance from one account to another his sureties, who have trusted to his discretion, are bound in the one case and relieved in the other by his acts; and in this case such acts of election were neither slight nor trivial, but they were solemn, decisive and repeated.

On the other it is insisted by the counsel for the legatee, that while the executor may elect to hold in one character or the other property in his actual possession or under his control, he cannot thus transfer a mere liability from one set of sureties to another; that all the cases upon the subject, proceed upon the idea that the executor has 259 funds actually in hand, and *that he is not a mere debtor for converted assets; and when he has been guilty of a devastavit in wasting or appropriating the estate a right of action at once accrues upon the bond, his liability and that of his sureties becomes fixed, and can only be discharged by actual payment, or what is equivalent to it: and when the executor is also guardian, although he cannot make a payment to himself; it is incumbent upon him to do what he would do if the payment was to be made to a third person, he ought to keep the trust fund separate and distinct from his own estate, and easily identified as the property of the ward.

These views, it seems to me, are so sensible, so manifestly in accordance with the dictates of common justice, they ought to prevail, unless the authorities plainly establish a different doctrine.

The Virginia reports do not show that this precise question has ever been decided, or even considered by this court. In the various cases upon this subject it does not distinctly appear, whether the executor had or had not wasted or converted the assets; but in the opinions of the judges expressions occur which plainly indicate that the funds were in the hands of the executor, or under his control, at the time of the election to hold in the character of guardian.

Thus in Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444, 446, Judge Green says: The Chancellor properly held in this case, that the sureties for the guardianship, and not those for the administration, were responsible.

Mrs. Myers' admission in her answer that upon qualifying as guardian, she received the estates of the infants into her hands, though not conclusive, is prima facie evidence against her sureties, and is not contradicted." The decision might have been very different had evidence been adduced 260 contradicting the answer and showing *that Mrs. Myers had not in fact received the estate in her hands as guardian, but was a mere debtor for assets received and converted.

In Morros' adm'or v. Peyton's adm'or, 8 Leigh 54, it appeared that the estate of one decedent was indebted to that of another, and the same person was administrator of both, and wasted the assets of the debtor estate. This court held that if it should ultimately appear that the funds received by the administrator from the debtor estate ought to have been passed over by him to the credit of the creditor's estate, then the sureties for the administration of that estate should be held responsible for the omission to pass them over, and for the administrator's devastavit of those funds.

It must be borne in mind, that at the time the funds were received by the administrator of the debtor estate, he was then administrator of the creditor estate also; and having the funds in hand it was his duty to pay himself as representative of the creditor estate if there were no debts of superior dignity against the debtor estate. And for his failure to do so his sureties for the due administration of the creditor estate were liable. But Judge Tucker declared that for the waste or misapplication of the assets of the debtor estate the sureties on that administration bond would be also liable. And so in the present case, if at the time or after his qualification as guardian, the executor had funds in his hands which he ought to have passed to himself as guardian, but failed so to do, the sureties for the guardianship might be held responsible. It would not follow that the sureties for the administration would not be also liable. In the case supposed, the executor having received assets his sureties become at once responsible. That responsibility can only be discharged by showing that he has properly applied the 261 *funds in his hands to the purposes of the estate; or not being so needed, they have been passed to his credit as guardian.

These are the views, I think, substantially, presented in Morros' adm'or v. Peyton's adm'or. That case so far from being adverse to the ground taken in the present case, may be regarded rather as an authority in support of it.

I do not propose to notice the other cases decided by this court, because it is not pretended that in either of them the question now before us was discussed or considered. The point being undecided in this state, the learned counsel on both sides have been extremely diligent in examining the decisions of other states. They have found many. It would be a most unprofitable consumption of time, it would extend this opinion an undue length, to enter into a discussion of these decisions, and to attempt to show wherein they have or have not any bearing upon the present case. It is sufficient to say, that they are conflicting, and while in some of them expressions occur which seem to accord to a personal representative the power to shift the liability from one set of sureties to another even where he has converted the assets, yet whenever the question here has been distinctly made and considered, the weight of authority sustains the views presented in this opinion.

It may be proper, however, to notice briefly, the case of Taylor v. Deblois, 4 Mason R. 133. That is a leading case, and is mainly relied on by the appellant. When carefully examined, however, it will be found there is nothing in it in conflict with what has been said here.

There the same person was both administratrix and guardian. The administratrix had settled her accounts in the Probate court, which showed a considerable 262 *balance against her due the distributees. She afterwards qualified as guardian of one of the minors; and thereupon she presented a certificate to the same court, stating that she had in her possession the funds belonging to her ward; and upon that she obtained from the court a quietus or decree exonerating her as administratrix and her sureties upon that bond.

Upon a suit afterwards brought by the ward, the question was whether the sureties on the administration or on the guardian's bond were liable. It was alleged by the ward, that at the time the certificate was presented to the Probate court and the quietus obtained the administratrix did not have the funds in her possession or under her control; but that they had been wasted by her or her agent. That in this respect the certificate was false, and the quietus fraudulently obtained.

This was the real issue between the parties. The sureties of the administratrix relied upon the decree as conclusive in the absence of fraud, under the statutes and practice of Rhode Island. And the court held there was nothing to show that the certificate was false or fraudulently obtained. Throughout the case, both in the pleadings and in the very learned and elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Story, it was impliedly conceded, that if the administratrix at the time of obtaining the quietus did not have the distributive share in her possession, but had wasted the same, her sureties for the administration would still be liable to the distributee.

Now if an executor who has wasted the assets may, by his mere election, transfer his liabilities to his guardianship account, it was a matter of no sort of importance whether the certificate was true or false, whether the administratrix had or had 263 not the funds in hand. *Such an inquiry was altogether immaterial. It would have been sufficient to say, that the certificate itself was an open and notorious act of election to hold as guardian, and such election exonerated the administration sureties, no matter what was done with the assets. But no such ground was taken by the counsel or the court; and I think the case strongly discountenances the idea that a personal representative, who is also guardian, guilty of a devastavit may at his pleasure charge one set of sureties and exonerate the other from all liability to parties interested in the estate.

It is true that Mr. Justice Story, in the course of his opinion, states another ground upon which, as he thinks, the responsibility of the administratrix and her sureties is discharged. He says: The administratrix after the guardianship having assets to pay the amount of the distributive share it was presently satisfied by way of retainer; and by operation of law there was a transmutation of the same to her as guardian, and she no longer held the same as administratrix.

Now it is sufficient to say, that this doctrine of transmutation of possession by operation of law, where the same person is both executor and guardian, has been repudiated by this court in every case before it. It was disapproved in Morros' adm'or v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54; in Swope v. Chambers, 2 Gratt. 319; in Harvey's adm'or v. Steptoe's adm'or, 17 Gratt. 289, 300, 301; and by Judge Story himself in the subsequent case of Pratt v. Northam, reported in 5 Mason 95. As the time when the transfer is to be made depends upon the condition of the estate and the state of the administration, the court will not shift the responsibility from one set of sureties to the other without 264 some act or declaration on the part of the representative, indicating *an intention to transfer the assets. Harvey's adm'or v. Steptoe's adm'or, 17 Gratt. 289, 301.

I do not deem it necessary to answer further the various cases upon this subject, but will refer to Phillips v. Minnings, 14 Eng. Ch. R. 309, 315; Harrison v. Nard, 3 Dev. Law R. 417; Claney v. Carrington, Id. 529, and especially to the case of Conky, Judge v. Dickinson et als., 13 Metc. R. 51. In the latter case the question arising here was discussed and carefully considered. The Supreme court of Massachusetts lays down the doctrine broadly, that if the sureties on the bond of the executor were liable by reason of his misapplication of the assets, it was not competent for him to transfer that liability to his sureties on the guardian's bond. The assets were never in the possession of the guardian as such; nor was there any means by which he could obtain possession in that character. He could not sue himself; and he is not chargeable on the ground, that an executor or administrator is chargeable for a private debt which he owes the estate. That principle is grounded on the necessity of the case; and no such necessity exists in the present instance.

It seems to me that this view is well nigh conclusive. The ground usually taken in opposition to it is, that as the executor, being also guardian, cannot sue himself nor make a payment to himself, he must from the necessity of the case, have the right to charge himself in either character. The answer is, that if the executor does his duty no suit is required. It is only necessary for him to keep the funds of the estate separate and distinct from his own, faithfully apply them to the purposes of the estate if needed, and when the administration is closed, transfer the surplus in his

265 *hands to the guardian account, and the obligation of his bond is at once discharged and the sureties released. This court said in Morrow's adm'r v. Peyton's adm'r, that when the same person is representative of both debtor and creditor estate, it is his duty as representative of the debtor estate, to pass the funds over to himself as representative of the creditor estate. The same rule applies when the same person is both guardian and executor. Having the funds in his hands as executor, he may elect to hold them in his character of guardian; and his sureties will be bound by his election. In this way he fulfills the condition of his executorial bond as completely as if he had made the payments to a third person.

The rule which allows an executor guilty of a devastavit, at his pleasure to shift his liabilities from one set of sureties to another, is calculated to produce much inconvenience and injustice. Its effect is to hold out a premium for fraud and collusion by giving the power to the executor to favor one set of sureties at the expense of the other, without fear of detection and exposure.

It enables him at his pleasure, to transfer a liability from the party who ought primarily to bear it, to innocent parties, who ought not to be the sufferers.

It enables him, if so inclined, to defeat the just claims of the distributee by shifting the responsibility from capable and solvent sureties to those that are doubtful and insolvent.

It clothes a defaulting fiduciary who has wasted a trust fund, with an unlimited discretion, which ought to be accorded only to one who has faithfully performed his duty.

And finally, it takes from the sureties a strong motive to see to it that the personal representative faithfully *dis-266 charges all the trusts and obligations of his office.

It is said, however, that much of the evil thus apprehended is imaginary, as this right of election can only be exercised by an executor or administrator whose solvency is unquestioned. But it is often difficult if not impossible to determine, especially after the lapse of years, what was the pecuniary condition of the executor at a given time. He may be a man of fortune to-day and a bankrupt to-morrow. He may be apparently possessed of ample means and at the same time overwhelmed with debt. The law does not look to the solvency of the fiduciary, but to that of his sureties. The object in taking the bond is to protect parties interested against losses and contingencies of this very character.

In the present case the executor is a bankrupt. He tells us, however, that before the war he was possessed of an estate amply sufficient to discharge all his liabilities. It appears that his bankruptcy was the result of debts contracted almost exclusively prior to the year 1860. Within fifteen months after his qualification as executor he had wasted or misapplied the assets to the amount of two or three thousand dollars; and within the next two years succeeding he had wasted more than two thousand dollars besides. The executor has never replaced the amount, nor attempted to do so. The funds were probably used in the payment of his private debts, or in the support of his family. It may be fairly presumed, that at no time could he have replaced the amount except by a sale of property. Upon his qualification as guardian he quietly transfers the devastavit to that account, and thus relieves himself and his sureties from any suit upon the administration bond. But even after 267 he had become guardian his *settlements before the commissioners were made in his executorial capacity; and these settlements were continued down to the 1st of January 1862; on which day a large balance is reported against him as executor. It does not appear that any other settlements were made during the war. The only transfer made to the guardianship account before the year 1866, consists of entries in the executor's private account book, made after his qualification as guardian in the year 1860. No such transfer appears by any of the settlements made in the County court.

The executor tells us he presented to the commissioner his book as guardian and asked him to make the settlement in that way; but the commissioner said there was but one legatee and it made no difference in which way the settlement was made.

Under our statutes and rules of practice these settlements before the County courts are entitled to peculiar respect and consideration. They are the sources to which creditors and legatees look for information touching the administration of the estate, and upon which sureties on the administration and guardian bonds rely to ascertain the nature and extent of their own liabilities. When a fiduciary thus charges himself with assets, when he deliberately holds himself out to the world as chargeable in a particular character, neither he nor his sureties should be permitted to destroy the effect of admissions thus solemnly made, by any mere private entries of the executor himself, or by parol proof of verbal instructions given to the commissioner who made the settlements. As the records show one state of facts, and the executor's account book shows another, we must look, I imagine, to the records only. These show that 268 he was never charged as guardian with these balances until the year *1866.

In that year a bill was filed in the Circuit court of Mecklenburg in the name of the ward, by her next friend, against the guardian and executor, asking for a settlement of his accounts in both capacities. In the progress of the suit the accounts were referred to a commissioner, and a settlement made by him. It seems that the commissioner refused to recognize the transfers made by the executor to his guardianship account in 1860. He brings the executorial transactions down to the 1st of January 1863; and on that day he finds a balance against the executor of nearly five thousand dollars. The commissioner then opens a guardianship account, and transfers to that account the executorial balance just mentioned; and this account is brought down to the 1st of September 1866.

The bill was filed the first Monday in July; the answer of the executor and guardian on the same day. Two months thereafter, on the 5th September 1866, the order for an account was entered; the account was taken and completed on the same day, and a decree rendered confirming it on that day.

It is admitted that the infant had no agency in bringing the suit, that it was brought by the executor, and conducted by him and in his interest throughout. It was to all intents and purposes his suit, in which for all practical purposes, he was both plaintiff and defendant. Neither the sureties on the administration bond nor the sureties on the guardian's bond were parties to it. This decree is relied on as conclusively settling the rights of the parties. In my judgment it binds no one except the executor and guardian. It may show an election in 1866, on the part of the executor, to transfer his liabilities to his guardianship account. It cannot operate as an election and transfer 269 in 1863, when there was no such election and *transfer, and in the very teeth of the public records to the contrary. Nor can it operate as a release of a previous well ascertained liability on the part of the executor and his sureties, for a devastavit continued and acknowledged for years upon the public records. Had the sureties upon the guardian's bond been made parties they might be bound; but their liability would be merely cumulative, and would not affect that of the sureties for the administration. There is nothing in the decree which professes to exonerate them.

The executor's election to hold as guardian could not have any such effect, according to the principles already discussed. No such election would be permitted at this late day, after such a length of time, except upon the most satisfactory proof of the entire solvency of the executor himself and the sureties upon the guardian's bond. The latter are confessedly in doubtful, if not insolvent circumstances. How they were in 1866 we do not know. We do not know what was the condition of the former at that time. We do know that he went into bankruptcy under the act of 1867 upon debts contracted before the war; and the reasonable, the fair presumption is, that he was much embarrassed if not insolvent in 1866.

I do not mean to impute any bad faith, or unfair conduct, or improper motives, to this executor. He is represented as a conscientious and honorable man. Whatever may have been his motives, however fair his proceedings, the proposition to my mind is not tenable in law or equity, that he can be permitted by his mere fiat to exonerate the only solvent sureties, the parties who are justly liable, and compel this legatee to seek redress upon a doubtful bond against parties who are not properly chargeable for the loss of this estate.

270 *In every point of view in which the case can be considered, I think the decree of the Circuit court is clearly right, and ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Staples J.

271 *Mason v. Jones & Wife.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

M by his will gives his executor discretion to sell his whole estate real and personal.* He lends it to his wife for the support of herself and his daughter L, until the daughter attains lawful age or marries. He provides for the contingency of his wife's marrying again; and then says: Should my wife not marry, I wish when L comes of age or marries, one-half of my estate to go to my wife for life and the other half to L absolutely; and at the death of my wife the other half. He appoints J. his executor. The executor pays the debts, and sells the whole estate at public auction, nearly all of which is bought by the widow; and he takes her bond for the amount. He afterwards settles his accounts and is charged with the amount of the sales, and then settles with the widow and takes her receipt for the amount of her purchases. L marries, and she and her husband sue J. and claim one-half the amount reported against him at once, and security for the other half to be paid on the death of the widow. HELD:

1. Wills—Executors—Trust.*—The will does not create a trust of the estate in the executor. And *Life Tenants—Right to Possession of the Corpus.—In Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 89 Va. 791, the court lays down the rule that in case of a legacy of money or stocks the rule is that the legatee for life is not entitled to possession of the corpus, trusting to the profits, and it is the duty of the executor to invest the fund and hold it in trust until the determination of the life estate, unless as was the fact in the principal case, a different intention appears in the will.

when he had paid the debts he properly turned over the remainder of the property to the widow; and her receipt was a discharge to him. His taking her bond did not affect his responsibility.

2. Same — Same — Discharge. — Having properly turned over the property to the widow, who was the life tenant, his office was fully discharged, and he is not liable to L, who took in remainder.

In December 1854 Joseph W. Mason, of the county of Suffolk, died, leaving a widow and one child, an infant, named Lucy. By his will he says: 1st. I direct that all my estate, real and personal, be sold at the discretion of my executor. 2d. After 272 the payment *of my debts, I loan to my wife Frances, the whole of my estate for the purpose of supporting herself and supporting and educating my daughter Lucy, until Lucy shall attain to lawful age or marries, or until my wife shall marry. 3d. Should my wife marry again, then I lend her one-third of my estate during her natural life; the remaining two-thirds I give to my daughter Lucy, absolutely; and at the death of my wife the third loaned to her. 4th. Should my wife not marry, I wish when Lucy becomes of age, or marries, one-half of my estate to go to my wife for life, and the other half to Lucy absolutely, and at the death of my wife the other half. He appointed John T. J. Mason his executor, and guardian of his daughter. And he qualified as executor, but declined the guardianship of the daughter.

The executor paid the debts, and left the land, stores and property upon the farm with the widow, who cultivated the land for a year or more. He then on the request of the widow, sold the land, stores and other property, all of which, except two slaves, were purchased by the widow, who executed to him her bonds for the amount of her purchases. He in 1858 settled his accounts before a commissioner of the County court, the whole amount of the sales being brought into that account; and the balance reported against him was $16,785.67. He then settled with the widow and took her receipts for the amount reported against him, which was made up of her purchases.

The widow did not marry again; but in October 1866 the daughter Lucy, then in the 18th year of her age, married J. B. Jones; and in July 1869 he and his wife instituted this suit in the Circuit court of Sussex county against John T. J. Mason, the executor, and his sureties, and the 273 widow, to recover the moiety *of the estate reported by the commissioner of the County court to be in the hands of the executor, and to require him to give security for the forthcoming of the other moiety on the death of the widow.

The cause came on to be heard on the 25th of April 1870, when the court made a decree according to the prayer of the bill, that John T. J. Mason do pay to the plaintiffs the sum of $8,392.83, being one-half of the amount of principal reported by the commissioner of the County court, to be in his hands in July 1858, with interest thereon from the date of the marriage of the plaintiffs; and that he should give security for the payment to the plaintiffs of the like sum of $8,392.83 on the death of Mrs. Mason. From this decree John T. J. Mason applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Keily, for the appellant.

Mason & Stringfellow, for the appellees.

Anderson J. delivered the opinion of the court.

Joseph W. Mason by his last will and testament, dated December 29, 1854, after authorizing his executor at his discretion, to sell his whole estate, real and personal, loans it to his wife Frances, for the purpose of supporting herself, and supporting and educating his daughter Lucy, until she attains to lawful age or marries. He then provides for the contingency of his wife marrying again, which contingency never happened. He then by the 4th clause declares, "Should my wife not marry, I wish when Lucy becomes of age or marries, one-half of my estate to go to my wife for life, and the other half to Lucy absolutely, and at the death of my wife the other half." Lastly he appointed J. T. J.

274 Mason, the appellant, his executor, and guardian *for Lucy, who made probate of the will on the 4th of January 1855, and qualified as executor; but as the bill alleges, declined the office of guardian.

In October 1866, Lucy, having then attained eighteen years of age, intermarried with J. B. Jones. In 1869 they filed their joint bill in chancery against Louisa F. Mason, the widow of the said Joseph W. Mason, and J. T. J. Mason, his executor, and his securities, alleging that there was a balance of $16,785.67, in the hands of the said executor, of which the said female plaintiff was entitled to one-half, which was due and payable to her, on the 23d of October 1866, the date of her marriage; and praying a decree for the same, with interest from that date, against the party or parties liable therefor; and further that the said executor be required to give additional security, to have the other moiety forthcoming at the death of the widow.

The executor answered, and admits his qualification as executor, and that he took possession of the money, bonds and other papers of his testator, and a small portion of the personal property, which he sold, leaving the land, slaves, and the bulk of the perishable estate, on the plantation in possession of the widow, according to the direction of testator's will.

He proceeded to collect and pay off the debts of the estate as rapidly as he well could. The widow took possession of the land, slaves, and other estate left on the plantation, hired an overseer, hired out one or more of the negroes, sold the crops, and collected the money, and exercised entire control over the same for that year, 1855. Late in that year, at her request, as he was authorized to do by the will, he offered the land for sale, when the amount bid for it, not being as much as the widow thought it should sell for, she bought it herself, 275 *at the price of $2,854, for which she executed her bonds, payable in one, two, and three years, the widow still keeping all the property, and absolutely controlling the same, until some time in the month of February 1856, when the executor, in the exercise of his discretion under the will, offered all the slaves and chattel estate for sale; at which sale she purchased all the slaves but two, and most of the perishable estate; and executed her bonds for the same, not paying one cent for the land, slaves, and perishable estate; and the whole remained unsettled until the fall of 1858.

On the 3d of June 1858 the executor settled his accounts with a commissioner of the court of Sussex county; which settlement was returned to the court and was confirmed, after lying one term without exception. In this settlement it seems that the executor was debited with the bonds executed to him by the widow for the land, slaves and other personal property; and the commissioner reported a balance against him on the 1st of July 1858, of $18,075.49; of which the sum of $1,289.52 was interest. The plaintiffs take no exception to this settlement, and seek not to disturb it.

On the 7th of October 1859, after the settlement aforesaid was confirmed by the court, the executor had a settlement with the widow, who executed to him her receipt in full, for the balance of interest due by him as executor as aforesaid, the same being due to her absolutely under the will of her deceased husband; and at the same time under her hand acknowledged the receipt from him of $16,785.67, the balance of principal in his hands. This constituted the whole estate after payment of debts, which was loaned to her by the testator, by his will. He also took her bond for the amount bearing interest from the 1st of July 1858.

276 *As a result of the war the slave property, which probably chiefly constituted the estate, perished, and the widow was unable to pay over to her daughter on her marriage, one-half the amount which had been loaned to her. How much she paid or turned over to her, does not appear from the record. The answer avers from information received, that the appellee Jones, soon after the marriage took possession of all the property lately belonging to the estate of Joseph W. Mason, and had a sale of the same, except the real estate, which he rented out, and had received considerable money in that and other ways, in part, or whole of the estate which he now claims.

According to this averment the widow had surrendered everything to her daughter's husband, so that there was nothing found upon which the execution sued out by the executor against her upon the judgment which he had recovered against her in 1869 upon her bond aforesaid, could be levied; which tends to confirm the averment of the answer. He also avers that a proposition had been made to him by Jones, before he brought this suit, that if the widow would convey to him the land he would accept it in full of his wife's interest in the estate, and obligate himself to support her the balance of her life; which proposition she had agreed to accept, showing a disposition on her part to surrender to her daughter's husband, not merely a moiety, but the whole of the estate which had survived the wreck of the war, and to be content with a mere support, which she would probably more than earn by assistance which she would render her daughter in her family.

There is nothing in the record to show that the female plaintiff would have been any better off if no sale had been made 277 of the estate; or that she has lost *or her mother gained anything by the sale, which the executor in his discretion might, or might not have made; or that she would have gained, if the sale had been made to a stranger; to which, however, the executor was in no manner restricted by the will. But if he had sold to a stranger the widow was entitled to the proceeds of the sale, by virtue of its being loaned to her by the testator; and whether she would have been able to have carried it, or any part of it, safely through a war which has wrecked the hopes and the fortunes of so many, is at least problematical.

But is the executor liable for the balance which was in his hands, and which he turned over to the widow, as is shown by her receipt? That is the main question. The decree appealed from holds him liable for the whole, without even an abatement for what the plaintiffs may have received from the widow, since their marriage.

Not even an inquiry was directed to ascertain the amount so received.

When property is vested in a trustee, and is trust property, and consists of stocks and other personal securities, it is conceded, that the trustee in whom the legal title is vested, must retain possession for the benefit of the remainder-man; but he may put the tenant for life in possession of the dividends, interest or income, by giving him a power of attorney to collect them as they become due. But the estate of Joseph W. Mason is not vested by his will in his executor in trust for his wife and daughter. By a fair construction of the will, if his executor should not sell, he lends his whole estate real and personal in kind, to his widow; if in the exercise of the discretion with which he is invested he should sell, he lends the proceeds of the sale to his widow; in either case after payment of his debts, for the support of herself

278 and *the support and education of his daughter, until she attains full age or marries; then to be equally divided, and one moiety to go to his wife for life, remainder to his daughter, and the other moiety to his daughter absolutely. He does not give it to his executor to be held in trust for such purposes. It is a loan directly to his wife, without the intervention of a trustee. Nor is it an authority to his executor to loan it to his wife, which might imply a trust reposed in his executor, but it is a confidence reposed by himself in his wife, by a direct loan to her. If there is a trust and confidence placed, it is in his wife, and not in his executor. If there is an implied trust it is in his wife, as the trustee, and not in the executor; and she alone was amenable to the person in remainder.

"If the title of the tenant for life is a legal and not an equitable title, he is of course entitled to the possession; but the tenant for life is in such case an implied, or quasi trustee for the remainder-man, and a court of equity can enjoin him from injuring the inheritance." Perry on trusts § 540; Joyce v. Gunnels, 2 Rich. Eq. R. § 259. This was the case of a devise of real estate and slaves, by the testator to his wife for life, remainder to all the children of his daughter. The court held that it now may be considered as settled, that the tenant for life stands in the nature of a trustee to the remainder-man.

In Hovey v. Glover, 2 Hill Ch. R. 515, it was held that the tenant for life of slaves is bound to account, as a trustee for the remainder-man. It was also held in this case, that limitations of trusts of personalty are the creatures of equity, and it is by regarding the tenant for life as trustee of the remainder-man, that equity takes jurisdiction to compel the execution of the trust to the remainder-man.

The office of the executor in the case 279 under judgment, *was to collect and pay the debts and to make sale of so much of the property as was necessary for the payment of debts, or the whole estate if in his discretion he deemed it to the interest of the estate to do so; and to turn over the residue of the estate, whether in kind or converted into money, to the widow to whom the testator had loaned it. This done he had completed the administration of the estate. He had discharged his executorial duty, and was functus officio. Kenney's adm'ors v. Kenney & als., 25 Gratt. 293. The executor sold the whole estate to the widow. If she had paid cash for the property he was required by the will to pay it over to her. It seems she gave her bonds for the property which she never paid. But as she was entitled to the money, if she had paid off her bonds, she settled with the executor, and gave him her receipt in full for the whole balance in his hands, as money lent to her by the testator. This receipt was a full discharge to him as executor, at least as against legatees.

Judge Lomax says, "There may be a case, Lord Redesdale has observed, where executors would be charged as against creditors, though not as against legatees; for legatees are bound by the terms of the will, creditors are not; and, therefore, if the testator direct the executor to collect the assets, and pay the proceeds into the hands of A, which is done accordingly, and A fails, if a creditor remain unpaid he may charge the executors; but, as regards the legatees, the executors may justify themselves by the direction of the will. 2 Lomax on ex'rs, top p. 500, side p. 304; citing Doyle v. Blake, 2 Sch. & Lef. R. 229, 245. In this case the Lord Chancellor said, legatees are bound by the terms of the will; creditors are not so; and therefore in many 280 cases executors would be discharged *as against legatees, though not as against creditors. For example, in the present case if these gentlemen (the executors) had collected the effects and had paid the amount to Martin Horan, (who afterwards became insolvent, to whom the will had directed it to be paid, for certain legatees,) still, if a creditor had remained unpaid, he might have charged them upon the insolvency of Horan; whereas in the case of a legatee, the executors might justify themselves by the directions of the will." We think the law as thus laid down is reasonable and just, and it is decisive of this case. As against the legatee the executor may justify the payment of the balance due the estate in his hands, to the widow by the will.

The execution of her bond to the executor could not create a liability in him which otherwise had not existed. The bond, although for the whole principal sum, and interest thereon from the 1st of July 1858, she could have discharged, by the payment of only one-half the principal sum, to her daughter on her marriage. It would in equity have been a full discharge of the obligation. She would then be in possession of a life estate in the other moiety, and her daughter would be entitled to the remainder; and if any action of the court were necessary for its preservation, it could only be upon the application of the husband and wife, and not of the executor, who is functus officio. If there ever was any sort of trust in the executor it is terminated, whether by operation of law, or by a surrender of the trustee to the cestui que trust, or a presumption of a surrender from the fact that the purposes of the trust are accomplished, and the property is vested in the cestui que trust, who may after that time maintain an action on the title. Perry on trustees § 328.

281 *The court is therefore of opinion that the appellant from anything that appears in this record to the contrary, has faithfully executed the will of his testator, and there is no liability on him to the legatees, or either of them, for or on account of the fund which he had placed in the hands of the depository to whom the testator had loaned it; that he acted under the directions of the will, and cannot be liable to either of the legatees, who are likewise bound by the will, and that the bill ought to be dismissed as to him and his sureties. But as Louisa Frances Mason, the widow, may be liable to the plaintiffs, to what extent, it is not proper for this court to indicate, as it has not been passed on by the court below, the case will have to be remanded to that court, for further proceedings as against her, if desired by plaintiffs, and dismissed as to the executor and his sureties with costs.

The court is therefore of opinion to reverse the decree of the Circuit court with costs, and to remand the cause.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the executor of Joseph W. Mason, the appellant, having turned over the whole of the estate in his hands to Louisa Frances Mason, the widow, to whom it had been loaned by the testator by his will, he is not liable therefor, or for any part thereof to the legatees. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the decree of the Circuit court of Sussex be reversed and annulled, and that the bill be dismissed as to the appellant and his securities, with costs; and that the appellees pay to the appellant his costs expended in the prosecution of his appeal here. And *the cause is remanded to the Circuit court of Sussex county for further proceedings to be had therein, if desired by the appellees, against Louisa F. Mason, in conformity with the opinion filed with the record.

Decree reversed.

283 *Huff & al. v. Broyles & al.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

1. Statutory Recoupment—Breach of Warranty—Separate Action for Damages.*—A party who in an action of debt against him files a plea under the statute, Code of 1873, ch. 168, p. 1098-1100 of the breach of the warranty in the sale of an animal, and claims to be relieved to the extent of the price paid for the animal—in which he succeeds—cannot maintain another action for other damages and expenses he has incurred on account of the breach of said warranty.
2. Same—Same—Damages.—A party filing a plea under said statute, may claim and recover all the damages he has sustained by the breach of the warranty, which he could recover in an action for a breach of the warranty.
3. Same—Same—Same—Separate Action.—If a party filing such a plea only claims and recovers a part of the damages he has sustained, and then brings an action to recover for other damages, a plea of the former judgment is a good plea in bar to the action.
4. Practice—Demurrer—Judgment.—In such action defendant pleads non-assumpsit, and a special Manganese Co.*, 91 Va. 272, it was held that the meaning of the words "or any other matter" used in sec. 3299 of the Code is restricted by the enumerated defences which precede them, and hence no set-off can be pleaded by the defendant which does not grow out of the contract in suit." For instances of the special plea in the motion of a plea of set-off, see Thornton v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 121; Fleming v. Toler, 7 Gratt. 301; Cunningham v. Smith, 10 Gratt. 255. plea of the former judgment, vouching the record, to which special plea plaintiff demurs. The court sustains the demurrer, and the plaintiff not replying further to the special plea, the court may render judgment for the defendant without trying the issue upon the plea of non-assumpsit.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Floyd county, brought in June 1871, by Charles H. Huff and Jackson Godbey against Adam Broyles and Oceola Sitgreaves, to recover the amount of certain expenses the plaintiffs had incurred in relation to a jack purchased by them from the defendants. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion. There was a judgment in favor of the defendants; 284 and the *plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for a writ of error and supersedeas; which was awarded.

Shelton and Tompkins, for the appellants. There was no counsel for the appellees.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The question presented by this record is, whether a vendee, who, in an action on the contract for the price of the property purchased, files a plea under the statute, alleging any such failure in the consideration of the contract, or any such breach of any warranty to him &c., as would entitle him, either to recover damages at law from the plaintiff &c., or to relief in equity, in whole or in part, against the obligation of the contract; and who, in such action, obtains relief to the full extent of the price; is entitled to recover in an action subsequently brought by him, any damages which he may have sustained by the said breach of such warranty over and above the price of the property?

The statute referred to is contained in the Code of 1873, chapter 168, pp. 1098-1100. Section 5, of the chapter, provides, that "in any action on a contract, the defendant may file a plea alleging any such failure in the consideration of the contract, or fraud in its procurement, or any such breach of any warranty to him of the title or the soundness of personal property, for the price or value whereof he entered into the contract, or any other matter as would entitle him either to recover damages at law from the plaintiff or the person under whom the plaintiff claims, or to relief in equity, in whole or in part, against the obligation of the contract; or" &c.; "and, in either cases

285 alleging *the amount to which he is entitled by reason of the matters alleged in the plea. Every such plea shall be verified by affidavit." Section 9 provides, that "a defendant who files a plea or account under this chapter, shall be deemed to have brought an action against the plaintiff (at the time of filing the same), for the matters mentioned in such plea or account, and the plaintiff shall not, after the plea or account is filed, dismiss his case without the defendant's consent; but shall be entitled to every ground of defence against the defendant's demand, of which he might have availed himself by any special plea or otherwise, in any action brought against him upon the same demand. On the trial of the issue in such case, the jury shall ascertain the amount to which the defendant is entitled, and apply it as a set-off against the plaintiff's demand, and if the said amount be more than the plaintiff is entitled to, shall ascertain the amount of the excess, and fix the time from which interest is to be computed on the same or any part thereof. Judgment in such case shall be for the defendant against the plaintiff for said excess, with such interest from the said time till payment."

The plain purpose of this statute was, to give precisely the same measure of relief on a plea filed under the same, as could be obtained in an independent action brought for the same cause, and to prevent one cause of action from being divided into two. So that the same objection exists to a claim of a part of the damages for the same breach of the contract under the statutory plea and another part in an independent action, as to a claim of a part in one action and another part in another action. One cause of action cannot be divided into two or more; and a judgment in one action is a bar to another action for the same cause. "A defend-286 ant who files a plea or account *under this chapter, shall be deemed to have brought an action against the plaintiff, (at the time of filing the same,) for the matters mentioned in such plea or account" &c., is the language of the 9th section of the chapter, and can leave no doubt as to the intention of the legislature to place the plea upon precisely the same footing with an independent action for the same cause.

The property sold in this case was a Jack, and there was a warranty by the vendors in the contract of sale that he was a sure foal-getter. In an action of assumpsit brought by the vendors against the vendees, among other things, for $300 the agreed price of the Jack, the vendees, besides other pleas, filed a plea of set-off under the statute aforesaid, alleging a failure in the consideration of the said contract and a breach of the said warranty, and that the said Jack was not a sure foal-getter, and was utterly useless as such; and that by reason of his impotency the consideration of the said contract had failed. The vendors replied generally to the said plea; and the issue thereon being tried by a jury, verdict and judgment were rendered in behalf of the vendees, to the full extent of the said sum of $300, the price of the said Jack; for which sum credit was given, to take effect from the 1st of November 1860, the date of said contract, by reason of the matters set up by the said special plea.

After that action was determined, the vendees brought an action of assumpsit against the vendors for the same alleged breach of the said warranty; alleging that, relying upon said warranty, after purchasing said Jack, they paid license thereon for same for two years, hired a groom to attend upon him, stabled and fed said Jack, and put him upon the stand for two years, and thus incurred expense and damage to 287 *the amount of $400; and claiming to recover the said amount of damage in the said last mentioned action, besides having been relieved in the former action from the payment of the said sum of $300, the price of the said Jack as aforesaid.

The vendors, besides pleading non-assumpsit to the second action, to which plea there was a general replication, on which issue was joined, filed two special pleas, relying on the said judgment in the former action as a bar to this action, and vouching the record of that action in support of the said pleas. The vendees moved to strike out the said two special pleas, because the same had not been sworn to by the defendants or either of them; but the court overruled the motion, and at the instance of the defendants' counsel permitted one of the defendants, who was then in court, to swear to the same; which was done. To which ruling of the court the plaintiffs excepted. And this was the subject of their bill of exceptions No. 1.

The plaintiffs then filed a special replication to the said two special pleas, alleging that the claims asserted in this action were not the same with, but different from, the claim asserted by the special plea in the former action, and were not settled and adjudicated in that action. To this replication the defendants demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer and rejected the replication; to which ruling of the court the plaintiffs again excepted; and this was the subject of their bill of exceptions No. 2.

The defendants thereupon moved the court to give judgment in the cause upon the pleadings as they then appeared, which motion was resisted by the plaintiffs who desired delay until the return of the sheriff upon an attachment awarded against a witness on the preceding day, and demanded 288 a jury to try the *issue of fact in the cause, (which was upon the plea of non-assumpsit,) but the court overruled the plaintiffs' objection; and it seeming to the court, on an inspection of the record filed with the defendants' special pleas, that the matters and things in the plaintiffs' declaration mentioned, had been settled and adjusted on the merits, as in the said special pleas alleged, judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the defendants against the plaintiffs. To which opinion of the court overruling the plaintiffs' objection, refusing the delay aforesaid, and the demand for a jury aforesaid, and giving the judgment aforesaid, the plaintiffs again excepted; and this was the subject of their last bill of exceptions, to-wit: No. 3. To that judgment, a writ of error and supersedeas, being applied for by the plaintiffs, were awarded by a judge of this court, and that is the case we now have under consideration.

We are of opinion, for reasons already stated, that the judgment in the former action is a bar to the latter action, and that there is no error in the judgment rendered in the latter action; unless there be some technical or formal error in the case. But we think there is none such; and certainly none which requires a reversal of the judgment. There are but three errors assigned in the petition for a supersedeas; 1st, in not sustaining plaintiffs' motion to strike out the special pleas; 2d, in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiffs' replication; and 3d, in refusing the plaintiffs' demand for a jury to try the issues of fact, &c. We think the following are sufficient answers to these assignments of error:

1st. The court properly refused to strike out the special pleas. They were good pleas of former judgment and recovery.

289 *2dly. The court properly sustained the demurrer to the plaintiffs' replication, which was not a sufficient answer to the special pleas. Those pleas presenting good bars to the action, admitted of but one answer, and that was, a replication of nul tiel record.

3dly. There was no occasion for a jury to try any issues of fact in the case. There was no issue of fact but the general issue upon the plea of non assumpsit; and that issue became immaterial when the special pleas stood confessed by the failure of the plaintiffs to make any other answer to them after the demurrer to the special replication was sustained. The case then stood as if there had been a replication of nul tiel record to those pleas and a judgment of the court on such issue in favor of the defendants. Whenever one complete bar to the action is established by the judgment of the court, all other pleas in bar which may remain untried then become immaterial, and the case is ended. When the special pleas remained unanswered and were thus confessed, it was the province and duty of the court to enter judgment as it did, in favor of the defendants. The whole case then depended upon the record of the former action which was vouched in support of the plea and as part thereof, and there was no occasion for the intervention of a jury.

We deem it unnecessary to notice the many authorities collected in the notes to Smith's Leading Cases on the subject of recoupment and set-off in cases of warranty in contracts of sale of personal property; because, whatever doubt or difficulty there may be on the subject according to those authorities, 290 which are to some extent conflicting, there can be none under our *statute, the language of which is plain and unmistakable.

We are therefore of opinion that there is no error in the judgment and that it ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

business with W and A. That partnership was dissolved; and J and A formed a partnership to carry on the same business at the same place; and this partnership was dissolved. Afterwards J filed his bill against W and A charging that both partnerships are indebted to him and asking for a settlement of their accounts. W demurs and answers, the demurrer being contained in the answer and not stating the grounds of demurrer.

HELD:

1. The bill is multifarious.

2. The demurrer is sufficient in form.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Washington county by J. B. and W. A. Dunn against W. W. Dunn, A. J. Dunn and others, to have a settlement of the accounts of two mercantile firms, one of which consisted of the plaintiffs and the two named defendants, and the other consisted of the plaintiffs and A. J. Dunn. W. W. Dunn appeared and filed a demurrer and answer, the demurrer being contained in the answer, and not stating the ground of demurrer, except that the bill is not sufficient in equity to entitle the plaintiffs to the relief which they seek. Upon the hearing the court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill with costs. And the plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

292 *Johnston & Trigg and Sheffey, for the appellants.

Gilmore, for the appellee.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

In 1859 J. B. and William A. Dunn, surviving partners of themselves and John Dunn, late merchants and partners trading under the style of John Dunn & Sons, claiming to be creditors of A. J. Dunn and W. W. Dunn in about $4,000, and also of the said A. J. Dunn in about $1,500, and that W. W. Dunn resided out of the state, and A. J. Dunn was preparing to remove from the state, and each of them had property within the state, sued out of the Circuit court of Washington county a foreign attachment against the said debtors and their property for the purpose of recovering the said debts. In their original bill in the said suit they charge, among other things, that in the year 1849 a partnership was formed to merchandise at Tazewell court-house between the firm of John Dunn & Sons and A. J. Dunn and W. W. Dunn, the style of which partnership was John Dunn & Co., and which lasted about two years, when it was dissolved by mutual consent. A new firm was

Practice in Chancery—Demurrer.—In Matthews v. Jenkins, 80 Va. 463, the principal case is cited for the statement that it is settled law in this state that a demurrer in the form prescribed by the statute, and assigning no grounds, inserted in the answer, is sufficient. The principal case is cited in Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 200, 18 S. E. 468.

then formed called A. J. Dunn & Co., consisting of John Dunn & Sons and A. J. Dunn, which commenced in 1851, was managed at Tazewell court-house, its place of business, wholly by A. J. Dunn, and was dissolved in 1853. There was no written contract of partnership in either case. There has never been any settlement of either of these firms. The assets of the first are in the hands of A. J. and W. W. Dunn, and of the second in the hands of A. J. Dunn. The plaintiffs therefore pray, among other things, that A. J. Dunn and W. W.

293 Dunn be made defendants to the *bill, that an account be taken to ascertain the amount due to the plaintiffs from A. J. and W. W. Dunn, and from A. J. Dunn individually, and that a decree be rendered against them for the sums found due, and also for the sale of the property of either of them to satisfy said decree.

Afterwards, to wit, in March 1861, an amended bill was filed by the plaintiffs, in which they charge, among other things, that W. W. Dunn owned a house and lot at Tazewell court-house which he sold to Thomas R. Smith for $1,500, which was still due, but had not then become payable. They therefore pray that the said Smith and A. J. and W. W. Dunn be made defendants to said amended bill, that the said purchase money may be made liable for their said claims, that the said Smith be enjoined from paying it away or otherwise disposing of it until the further order of the court, that the settlement prayed for in the original bill be made accordingly, and for further and general relief. An injunction was awarded, which appears to have been forthwith perfected by the execution of the proper bond.

The record does not show that anything further was done in the suit until 1870, about nine years after the filing of the amended bill. In that year W. W. Dunn, who was then still a non-resident of the state, filed a demurrer and answer to said original and amended bills. Before proceeding to answer he "demurs to said bills, and says they are not sufficient in equity to entitle the complainants to the relief which they seek, or to any relief in this court." But if respondent be held bound to answer said bills, he proceeds to answer the same accordingly; in which answer he sets out his defence, denies that he owes the firm of John Dunn & Co. one cent,

294 but *charges that said concern, upon a full and fair settlement, owes him; says that he "knows nothing of the new concern charged by complainants to have been entered into by John Dunn & Sons and A. J. Dunn, as he had nothing to do with it, and cannot imagine how he is interested in any way with the settlement of the business of that concern;" and prays that the injunction may be dissolved and the bills dismissed.

After that demurrer and answer were filed nothing further appears to have been done in the suit until the 14th day of September 1872, when the cause came on to be heard upon the bill and amended bill of the complainants and the demurrer of W. W. Dunn thereto; on consideration whereof the court sustained the demurrer, dismissed the bill, and ordered that complainants pay the defendant W. W. Dunn his costs. From that order the said J. B. Dunn and W. A. Dunn, surviving partners of John Dunn & Sons, applied for and obtained an appeal from a judge of this court.

There is no assignment of error in the petition for an appeal, except that "neither the demurrer nor the decree of the court assign any reason why the bills should be dismissed;" and that "the court, instead of dismissing the bill, should have overruled the demurrer and allowed the case to proceed on its merits." The case was submitted to this court upon the petition and upon a brief filed by the counsel for the appellee. In that brief it is contended that "the Circuit court did not err in sustaining the demurrer in this case and dismissing the bill, as it was clearly multifarious." Story's Eq. Pl. sec. 271, note 1; Newland v. Rogers, 3 Barb. Ch. R. 434; Boyd v. Hoyt, 5 Paige R. 65, 79, note 1.

295 *The question then which we now have to solve is, whether the bill be multifarious or not.

If it be so, it is because there are united in the bill a demand against A. J. Dunn and W. W. Dunn jointly, for a settlement of the partnership accounts of the firm of John Dunn & Co. and for a balance claimed to be due to the plaintiffs upon such settlement; and a demand against A. J. Dunn individually; for a settlement of the partnership accounts of the firm of A. J. Dunn & Co., and for a balance claimed to be due to the plaintiffs upon such settlement; the said two firms being wholly unconnected with each other; and the defendant W. W. Dunn having no interest in the firm of A. J. Dunn & Co., or in the settlement of the partnership accounts of that firm, and not being responsible, in any way, for any demand of the plaintiffs against that firm or any member of it.

We are of opinion that the bill is multifarious upon that ground, and was therefore demurrable, according to the authorities referred to in the brief of the counsel for the appellee. In Story's Eq. Pl. § 271, it is said that "a bill should not be, what is technically termed multifarious; for if it is so, it is demurrable, and may be dismissed by the court of its own accord, even if not objected to by the defendant. By multifariousness in a bill is meant, the improperly joining in one bill distinct and independent matters, and thereby confounding them; as, for example, the uniting in one bill of several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected against one defendant, or the demand of several matters of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants, in the same bill. In the latter case, the proceeding would be oppressive, because it would tend to load each defendant with an unnecessary burden of costs,

296 by swelling the pleadings *with the statement of the several claims of the other defendants, with which he has no connection. In the former case, the defendant would be compellable to unite, in his answer and defence, different matters wholly unconnected with each other; and thus the proofs applicable to each would be apt to be confounded with each other, and great delays would be occasioned by waiting for the proofs respecting one of the matters when the others might be fully ripe for hearing."

The doctrine on this subject is fully set forth in the work referred to and in the cases cited in the notes thereto; but it is unnecessary to state any more of it in this opinion. There are some nice distinctions in the cases, and it is sometimes a difficult question to determine whether a bill is multifarious or not. But without noticing those distinctions any further, it is sufficient to say, that consistently with them all, the bill in this case appears to be plainly multifarious. In note 5 to § 271, before quoted, it is said, that "multifariousness must be objected to by the defendant on demurrer, and cannot be objected to by him at the hearing. But the court may, however, take the objection at the hearing sua sponte; for the court is not bound to allow a bill of such nature, although the parties may not take the objection in season." In this case there was a demurrer at the beginning of the answer, though the causes of the demurrer are not assigned therein. According to the English practice, and that of many of the other states of our Union, it appears that the causes are assigned in the demurrer; but such is not the general practice in this state. On the contrary, it seems to be usual with us to embody the demurrer in the answer, in general language, as was done in this case; and that practice 297 seems to be *recognized, it be not expressly authorized, by the Code p. 1093, ch. 167, § 31, which says that "the form of a demurrer or joinder shall be: 'The defendant (or plaintiff) says that the declaration (or plea &c.) is not (or is) sufficient in law.'" In this case there could have been no doubt as to the ground intended to be relied on in support of the demurrer. For besides that it is palpable on the face of the bill, it is made even more so by the allegation of the answer, that "respondent knows nothing of the new concern charged by complainants to have been entered into by John Dunn & Sons and A. J. Dunn, as he had nothing to do with it, and cannot imagine how he is interested in any way with the settlement of the business of that concern."

We are therefore of opinion, that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court and that it ought to be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

has received in June 1861 in good money, a part of the trust fund applicable to pay a creditor who is ready to receive payment, his investment of the fund in Confederate bonds, under an order of the court made on his motion in a suit which he had brought for the administration of the trust, is invalid, and he continues liable for the fund; and this whether the creditor was or was not a party in the suit.

2. Same—Same—Same—Interest.—In this case the court below, whilst giving a decree in favor of the creditor for his debt, disallowed the interest on the debt during the war. On appeal by the trustee the decree of the court below was affirmed generally.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Floyd county, in August 1860, by Andrew J. Kirby, trustee in a deed from James B. Headen and wife to secure the payment of debts due from Headen, to have the direction of the court in the administration of the trust fund. In the progress of the cause all the debts seem to have been paid or settled, except a debt due to Lane & Tompkins, which was assigned by them to D. & J. Goodykoontz. This debt was secured on specific property mentioned in the deed, and on the balance of the proceeds of other property after paying the debts first charged thereon. The only question in the cause arises upon an exception by these de- 299 fendants, *to the last report of the commissioner, in which the trustee is allowed a credit for $1000 invested under an order of court in the cause in a bond of the Confederate States. This order was made before D. & J. Goodykoontz became parties in the cause. There was also an exception by the plaintiff to the charge of interest upon this debt during the war. The cause came on to be finally heard on the 25th of August 1873, when the court sustained both exceptions, and made a decree against Kirby in favor of D. & J. Goodykoontz, for $629.10 with interest on $626.02, a part thereof, from the 22d of September 1859, until the 17th day of April 1861, and from the 10th of April 1865 until paid, and their costs. And from this decree Kirby obtained an appeal from a judge of this court. The facts are stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

Taylor for the appellant.

Phlegar for the appellees.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit court of Floyd county.

The main if not the only question, we have to consider, is, whether the said Circuit court erred in sustaining the exceptions taken by the appellees to the commissioner's report, which in the settlement of the account of the appellant as trustee under the deed of Headen and wife allowed to said trustee a credit of $1000, which he claims ity.—See Cole v. Cole, 28 Gratt. 365, and note, and Carter v. Dulaney, 30 Gratt. 192, and note. See also, Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 792; Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 751.

was a part of the trust fund invested by order of the Circuit court in the bonds of the Confederate States.

300 *The appellant Kirby, was trustee in a deed of trust executed by Headen and wife on the 29th day of February 1860, to secure numerous creditors of said Headen. By the provisions of said deed his creditors are divided into different classes, and different and specific property conveyed to secure to the several classes of creditors their several debts, according to their priorities declared in said deed.

In the second class of the debts thus secured was one due to Lane & Tompkins for the sum of $626.02, with interest from 22d September 1859. This debt together with another debt of $300, was secured by the conveyance of certain real estate known as the Tentmire tract and a certain lot and blacksmith shop. These two parcels of land were expressly charged in the hands of the trustee with the payment of these debts. In addition to this specific security upon this real estate there was a provision that out of the proceeds of other property, if the property conveyed specifically for that purpose should not be sufficient, the balance remaining should be paid before other debts named. Lane & Tompkins assigned their debt thus secured to D. & J. Goodykoontz, in whose favor the decree appealed from was rendered.

The real estate charged in the deed with the payment of this debt was sold in 1860. The Tentmire tract brought the sum of $557.50, three-fourths of which, $433.11, was paid to the trustee on the 28th July 1861. It is not proved when the balance was paid; but the whole was due in a sound currency. The blacksmith shop and lot brought $110, and was paid to the trustee in March 1862. It thus appears that at least $543.11, the proceeds of the sale of the specific property dedicated by the grantor to the payment, in part, of this debt, came into the hands of *the trustee, not one dollar of which he ever paid over to those entitled to receive it under the deed. But the commissioner's report further shows (and to this there is no exception,) that there remained, of other property sold and moneys collected, (which were first appropriated to other debts, but the balance to the payment of the Lane & Tompkins debt if the whole should not be paid by the proceeds of the sale of the real estate above referred to,) in the hands of the trustee the additional sum of $390.52, which was also dedicated by the grantor to the payment of this debt. It is thus conclusively shown that on the 2d of June 1861 the trustee had in his hands at least $823.11, of the very fund which the deed had charged with the payment of the Lane & Tompkins debt.

The record further shows that this debt was assigned to D. & J. Goodykoontz on the 4th day of June 1860, and on the very day of the assignment David Goodykoontz gave notice thereof to the trustee, and demanded payment of the debt. The trustee declining to pay them, was then informed by Goodykoontz that they would need the money in September following, an expected the debt should certainly be paid then. The trustee Kirby had no further communication with Messrs. Goodykoontz until January 1863, when he pressed upon them to receive this debt in Confederate money; which they refused.

In April 1863 the trustee Kirby obtained, upon his motion, from the Circuit court of Floyd the following order: "It appearing to the court that A. J. Kirby, trustee in this cause, has in hand a fund which at present he is not able to dispose of, and the court is not at present advised what disposition ought to be made of said fund, doth order and direct, that said Kirby trustee do invest said funds at interest until the further order *of the court, in such manner as he may deem prudent, under the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of Virginia passed March 5th 1863."

Under this order the trustee Kirby made an investment in Confederate bonds, and now produces a bond of $1,000 which he insists must be received as a credit to the trust fund remaining in his hands; and now gravely proposes to pay, with this bond, the debt due to the appellees.

This pretension cannot be tolerated for a moment. This court has had occasion, more than once, to construe the act of March 5th 1863. See Campbell's ex'ors v. Campbell's ex'or, 22 Gratt. 649; Crickard's ex'or v. Crickard's legatees, 25 Gratt. 410.

In these cases this court has held, that before a party can avail himself of such an investment made under an order of court, he must show affirmatively, that, 1st, the fund he proposes to invest was received in the due execution of his trust; and 2d, that he is not able to dispose of the same, there being no hand to receive it. When these two things concur the investment will be lawful and the party protected; otherwise he will be held liable to make it good. Now in the case before us neither of these essential requisites are found; but on the contrary, the fund dedicated by the grantor to the payment of this debt was received (except a small part) in June 1861, in a sound currency, and so far from there being no hand to receive it, the appellees were pressing for payment at that very time.

Much stress is laid, in the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, upon the fact that the order referred to, directing an investment, was not an ex parte order, but one made in a pending cause; and that therefore it is binding on the parties, and cannot now be reviewed. Pre-

303 cisely the same question was raised *in Crickard's ex'or v. Crickard, supra, and decided by the unanimous opinion of this court. In that case, as in this, the trustee filed a bill asking for a settlement of his accounts and the advice of the court as to a distribution of the fund. There, as here, the account was settled under the supervision of the court and distribution directed under its decree. There, as here, in 1863 by a decree entered in the pending cause an investment in Confederate bonds was made. But in that case, as in this, it was shown that the fund received by the trustee was in a sound currency, and that he might have disposed of it at the time it came into his hands. And this court compelled the trustee to make good the investments thus made.

The difference between that case and this is against the appellant. As to these appellees, the order of the Circuit court of Floyd was ex parte. They were no parties to the suit. The Lane & Tompkins debt had been assigned to them, and notice of that assignment had been given to the trustee on the very day the assignment was made.

The order of April 1863, made in their absence, and without notice to them was purely ex parte and cannot bind them, even if valid as to others; which we have seen it was not.

The Circuit court was right in striking out the item of credit of $1,000 allowed by the commissioner, and thus sustaining the exception of the appellees. Striking out this item the commissioner's report shows that there is in the hands of the trustee (after all debts of prior dignity under the deed have been fully paid) a sum amply sufficient to pay the appellees' debts. To this report there was no exception by the appellant except as to the war interest, which exception was sustained. If there be any errors in the commissioner's 304 *report the appellant has failed to show it or even to object to it, except to the interest accrued between the 17th April 1861 and 10th April 1865.

Upon the whole case the court is clearly of opinion, that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court of Floyd, and that the same should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

305 *Cox & als. v. Cox.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

Absent, ANDERSON J.

Facts—Contract to Devise.—In 1851 J marries and brings his wife to the house of his father E; and he lives there for years, under an understanding or agreement with E, that E will leave him the land by his will upon condition that J will support E and his wife during their lives. J lives on the land which he cultivates, and he supports E and his wife until 1863, when he goes into the army, and dies in 1865. After J went into the army his widow and E and wife do not agree, and E and wife leave the place, and are supported by another son of E until the death of E in 1868, when he gives the land to this son, except fifty acres which he had previously given to J's widow and children.

HELD:

1. Parol Wills—Specific Performance—Breach of Condition Precedent.—The court will not decree specific execution of the agreement between J and E.

*Parol Wills—Specific Performance—Breach of Condition Precedent.—As to the invalidity of a parol will,

2. Compensation—Proceeds of Land.—J having received from the proceeds of the land a full satisfaction for the support of E and his wife and any improvements he had made upon it, is not entitled to further compensation.

In May 1873 Anderson Cox and four others, children of Joseph Cox deceased, filed their bill in the Circuit court of Carroll county, against Solomon Cox, seeking to enforce a specific execution of an agreement between Joseph Cox and his father Enoch Cox, by which, as they alleged, in consideration that Joseph Cox would support the said Enoch Cox and his wife during their lives, the said Enoch would give to the said Joseph the tract of land on which they then lived. The plaintiffs alleged 306 that in pursuance of said *agreement the said Joseph did enter upon the land and support the said Enoch and his wife as long as the said Joseph lived, and that the mother of the plaintiffs and themselves were willing to do it afterwards; but through the false and calumnious charges made against the mother of the plaintiffs by the defendant Solomon Cox, the said Enoch, who was infirm and feeble, was induced to leave them, and to make his home with said Solomon, and either by deed or will gave the land to him. And they charge that Solomon Cox had notice of the agreement between the said Enoch and the said Joseph.

The prayer of the bill is for a specific execution of the contract; or if the court will not enforce the contract, that they may have compensation for the work and labor and valuable improvements made upon the land by their father.

Solomon Cox answered the bill, denying that there was any such agreement between Enoch Cox and Joseph Cox; denying that Joseph Cox entered upon the land under such agreement, averring that Joseph Cox was born and raised upon the land and never left it; that Joseph Cox went into the army in 1863 and continued therein until he died in February or March 1865, in no sense supporting the old people; and that after he went into the army his family, instead of supporting them, treated them so badly that Enoch Cox could not stand it, and left the place. He denies that he in any way induced Enoch Cox to make his will, and that he made any effort to get the land for himself, or that he made any calumnious charges against the mother of complainants.

It appears from the evidence, that Enoch Cox owned a tract of land in the county of Carroll, on which he lived; and that Joseph Cox was married about the 307 *year 1850 or 1851, and brought his wife to his father's house, and they lived there until Joseph Cox went into the army in 1863, and his family lived there afterwards until 1866. About 1854 Enoch Cox divided his land into three parts, conveying to his sons Solomon Cox and Hugh Cox each one part, and retaining the part on which he lived, which, owing to the improvements, he considered more valuable than the other part. This part it was agreed or understood between himself and Joseph Cox, that Joseph Cox was to have, on the condition that he was to support Enoch Cox and his wife during their lives. Enoch Cox, however, did not, nor did he intend to make a deed to Joseph Cox for the land. He made a will in — by which he gave this land to Joseph Cox upon the condition that Joseph Cox should support him and his wife during their lives.

Joseph Cox died in March 1865, and whilst he was in the army his family and Enoch Cox seem to have lived on bad terms; and soon after his death Enoch Cox and his wife left the place, and Enoch Cox brought an action of ejectment against Mrs. Joseph Cox to recover the land. This suit seems to have been compromised by Enoch Cox conveying to Mrs. Joseph Cox and her children fifty acres of the land; and some of the buildings which Joseph Cox had put upon the land were removed to the fifty acres part, and Mrs. Joseph Cox removed with her children to it.

In 1866 Enoch Cox entered into a written contract with Solomon Cox, to give him the remainder of the tract he had intended for Joseph, upon the condition that Solomon Cox should support him and his wife during their lives. He died in 1868, leaving his wife surviving him, and by his will gave the land to Solomon Cox.

308 *At the time Enoch Cox made his agreement with Joseph Cox he was a cripple, not able to do much work, though it is said he could hoe corn, and both he and his wife were old. At the death of Joseph Cox all his children were young, the oldest, Anderson Cox, being only about fourteen years of age.

Upon the question of compensation for improvements, &c., this court was of opinion that there were no grounds for it.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 21st day of October 1873, when the court dismissed the bill with costs. And thereupon the plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed.

Tipton and Brown, for the appellants.

Shelton and Tompkins, for the appellee.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

Every bill for the specific execution of a contract is an application to the sound discretion of the court. It is not a case requiring the interposition of the court ex debito justitiae, but rests in their discretion upon all the circumstances. He who seeks the exercise of this extraordinary jurisdiction must show a contract certain and definite in its terms: that he himself is in no default, but has performed his part of the agreement; or in the language of the judges, that he is "ready, desirous, prompt and eager" to do so. If the contract is conditional it must be shown that the conditions have been complied with. When the condition is subsequent and becomes impossible of performance, equity will sometimes relieve upon compensation being made. But the courts never dispense with 309 *conditions precedent, because in such case the estate does not vest until the condition is performed. When the party seeking performance, is himself in default, whether he can have it depends in a great measure upon how far the default goes to the essence of the contract.

The rule laid down by an eminent writer and supported by abundant authority, is, that when the substance of the agreement can be fully executed, and when a trifling adjustment only is needed to satisfy the equities of the case performance may be decreed with satisfaction. If, however, the default of the plaintiff goes to the substance of the agreement, or if there be some things which he is bound to do and cannot do, or has not done, and the court cannot compel him to do it, equity will not decree specific execution in his favor. 3 Parsons on Contracts 402, 407-'8; Harvey v. Banks, 1 Rand. 408; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 69.

These principles, as will be seen, have a direct application to the present controversy. Admitting for the present the existence of a valid contract between Enoch Cox and Joseph Cox, it is not denied that it was a conditional contract. By the express terms of the agreement Joseph Cox was to have the land upon condition that he supported Enoch Cox and wife during their respective lives. These were the terms imposed by the father and accepted by the son. The courts have no power to change them or to substitute others in their place. If it be conceded that Joseph Cox furnished the necessary support down to the year 1863, it is very clear that he failed to do so after that year, although Enoch Cox lived until 1867, nearly five years longer. Mrs. Nancy Cox the wife, for whose benefit the provision was made equally with that of the husband, was alive when this suit was brought, 310 and is *said to be still living. She has received no assistance from Joseph Cox or his family since 1863; but during all this time she has been dependent upon aid derived from other sources. Joseph Cox went into the army in 1863, and was killed or died in March, 1865. If he was prevented by these causes from complying with his contract, it was his misfortune. The courts cannot dispense with conditions which constitute the essence of the agreement. The default is in the very nature of things incapable of adequate compensation. The support to be furnished Enoch Cox and wife did not include meat and clothing merely, but services of a personal character, which the father and mother might well expect and exact from them, and which no doubt constituted one of the main inducements to the arrangement.

It is said, however, that the family of Joseph Cox, after he went into the army and even after his death, were willing and ready to render the necessary support; but they were prevented by Enoch Cox and his wife. At the time of Joseph Cox's death, in 1865, he had six children, the eldest about fourteen and the youngest about five years of age. It is impossible to believe that this boy of fourteen and his widowed mother, besides taking care of four small children, could have sustained the burden of furnishing a support for this infirm and aged couple. The proposition is too extravagant to be entertained for a moment. Indeed the case as presented by the record, is that of a father promising his son to make a devise in his favor upon certain conditions which have never been complied with. This court is asked to dispense with these conditions, although they constitute the substance of the contract. It is to be 311 remembered that Joseph Cox was never under any obligation to furnish *the necessary support for his father and mother. He might have found it to his interest to do so, and had he lived it is possible he would have done so. But he made no contract which bound him to that duty. At least this record shows none such. The entire obligation was upon Enoch Cox's side. His promise was to devise the land to his son, provided the latter supported him and his wife during their respective lives. Here then is an agreement lacking the essential element of mutuality, binding upon one of the parties and not upon the other. It has been settled by repeated decisions, that in applications for specific performance the remedy must be mutual, and that where a bill will lie for one of the parties it will lie for the other. Courts of equity, as a general rule, will not decree in favor of a plaintiff who is himself not bound by the agreement. It is very true that if Joseph Cox had complied with all the terms and conditions upon which the land was to be devised to him, he or his representatives would be entitled to a decree for specific performance. The vendor having received the full consideration would of course be bound to convey. But where the vendee has not only not performed his part of the agreement, but cannot be compelled so to do upon a bill filed against him, he is clearly not entitled to the aid of a court of equity. He may be entitled to a decree for compensation for the services rendered; but not for specific execution of the contract. Adams' Equity top page 252, marg. 82; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 John. Ch. R. 370.

Thus far the case has been considered as if there was a valid contract between the parties. It may be doubted, however, whether this contract, or supposed contract, amounts to more than a voluntary promise, an inchoate gift, on the part of Enoch Cox the father. No writings were ever ex-312 ecuted. The understanding, *whatever it may have been, was merely verbal. There was no delivery of possession to Joseph Cox, but father and son remained in joint possession cultivating the land in common and together exercising control of the premises. Although frequently applied to, Enoch Cox always refused to make his son a title to the property, or even to surrender the control to the latter. It may be that in his will he devised the land to Joseph Cox upon the conditions already mentioned. But the fact that he adopted this form of disposition rather than a deed, shows very clearly that he reserved to himself the right of determining whether he would give the land to his son, and under what circumstances he would make the gift. It is very true that representations made by one party and acts done by another upon the faith of such representations may constitute a contract which will be specifically executed; but where the representation is merely of a future intention, as to which the party refuses to bind himself by contract, the engagement must be regarded rather as of an honorary character, and not enforceable as such in a court of equity. As has been well said, "such a promise or gift in the case of a parent, in its very nature leaves to the donor a locus penitentiae, a right to change and revoke or modify the gift, a right which the exigencies of his fortune or his family may make it proper for him to exercise." Taylor v. Staples, 5 Am. R. 556; Rucker v. Abell, 8 B. Mon. R. 556; Pinchard v. Pinchard's heirs &c., 23 Alab. R. 649; Adamson v. Lamb, 3 Blackf. R. 446.

This court has repeatedly expressed its disapprobation of those pretended contracts based upon declarations by parents of intentions to make certain specific provision for children, in consideration of supposed services rendered or sacrifices made by the latter. Such promises are generally 313 made in the freedom and *confidence of domestic intercourse, and without a suspicion that they constitute legal obligations. The efforts constantly made to enforce them fully vindicate the statute of frauds and perjuries. Reed's heirs v. Vannorsdale & wife, 2 Leigh 569; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 69.

I do not deem it necessary further to consider or discuss the evidence upon this point, as all of us agree it is insufficient to warrant a decree for specific execution. The only question is whether the complainants are entitled to a decree for compensation.

It is in proof that about ten acres of the land were cleared and enclosed by Joseph Cox; some inferior buildings erected by him, and some additions made to those already built. All the work done by him was for his own benefit, and was such as a tenant from year to year paying rent might have done without compensation. Joseph Cox was in the enjoyment of the farm for fifteen years without rent; he used without restraint his father's teams in cultivating the land, and it is no exaggeration to say that for every expense he incurred in improvements, or in the support of the father and mother, he was fully remunerated by the rents and profits. This fact is established by complainant's own witnesses. It seems also that since the death of Joseph Cox, Enoch Cox has conveyed to the widow and children fifty acres, part of the land in controversy. To this tract the buildings erected by Joseph Cox have been removed, and are now in the possession of the family. This would seem to be conclusive upon the question of compensation. Upon the whole, in any view we may take of the case, it would seem that the decree of the Circuit court is clearly correct and must be affirmed.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of Craig county, in which Henry Walker was plaintiff and Daniel and Lloyd Huffman were defendants. There was a judgment for the plaintiff; and the defendants obtained a writ of error from a judge of this court. There were several questions made in the Circuit court which were not considered by this court. tween him and a certain John H. Walker, since deceased, in relation to a bond 315 *of the plaintiff and said Walker, executed to John Leffle, which the defendants claim to have taken up at the instance of the plaintiff, and on which they relied as a payment upon the bond sued upon. The second is, whether the bond so taken up by the defendants could be relied on as a payment. The case is stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

Kent, for the appellants.

Wade and Sullivan, for the appellees.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of Craig county. It was an action of debt brought by Henry Walker against Daniel Huffman and Lloyd Huffman as surviving obligors of themselves and Giles Huffman, upon a bond executed by them to the plaintiff for $1,060, subject to two credits endorsed thereon, one for $563.33, the other for $144.23.

The defendants pleaded payment and set-off; to which the plaintiff replied generally. The defendants filed with their plea an account stating the nature of the payment and set-off on which they relied, which was in the following words and figures to-wit:

"Major Walker to Daniel Huffman Dr. To this sum paid for your bond to John Leffle for $354.18—due Dec. 17th 1847. Credit by $145.20 paid March 1st 1856. This bond was discharged by me pursuant to an agreement with you that I should do so, on account of the debt which you hold against me, and now in suit, and which was to be taken as a payment thereon."

Upon the issue made up on this plea of payment, the parties went to trial, and 316 the jury found a verdict *for the plaintiff for the amount of the bond above described, subject to credits endorsed upon said bond, upon which judgment was entered. To which judgment the defendants obtained a writ of error from this court.

From the several bills of exception taken in the court below, it clearly appears that there was evidence, at least tending to prove that it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendants, that if defendants would take up a bond which the plaintiff owed to John Leffle that the bond of defendants should be credited by that amount; in other words, that the Leffle bond when paid, should be received as a payment pro tanto of the bond of defendants in the hands of the plaintiff.

After evidence had been offered tending to prove this agreement, the defendants moved the court (among other instructions) the following: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this cause, that the defendants took up the bond executed to John Leffle by Henry Walker and John Walker at the instance and by agreement with Henry Walker, that the same should be allowed as a payment on the bond upon which this suit is brought, then the jury should find for the defendants the amount of said bond executed to John Leffle."

This instruction the Circuit court refused to give.

This court is of opinion, that the said Circuit court erred in such refusal.

Payment of a debt is not necessarily a payment of money; but that is payment which the parties contract shall be accepted as payment. Whether under a simple plea of payment, (without notice to the plaintiff of how the payment claimed was made,) payment may be shown of any other thing than money, is a question that does not arise in this case; because here with 317 the *plea of payment was filed an account showing the nature of the payment relied upon by the defendants by special agreement with the plaintiff; and that was that if defendants would pay the bond which the plaintiff owed to Leffle, the amount thus paid should be a payment pro tanto of the defendants' bond held by the plaintiff. The instruction simply announced the proposition that if there was such an agreement to accept the Leffle bond as a payment pro tanto the defendants were entitled to a credit for the amount due on that bond as a payment. There was certainly evidence tending to prove such an agreement; and it was a question for the jury whether such agreement was established by the proof. If it was so established it was certainly a good defence to the extent of the amount due on the Leffle bond.

The court is further of opinion, that the court erred in not permitting the defendant Daniel Huffman to testify as to how he obtained the Leffle bond. It was proposed to prove by this witness that he had authorized one John H. Walker, who was the security of Henry Walker in the Leffle bond, to get said bond from said Leffle. But the court excluded his evidence upon the ground that John H. Walker was dead. Now it is clear that this ruling of the court was erroneous. John H. Walker was not a party to the suit. The parties to the suit were Henry Walker the plaintiff and Daniel Huffman and Lloyd Huffman defendants: these were all living. The subject of investigation, the transaction which was the subject of the suit and the distinct issue raised by the pleadings, was whether there was an agreement between Henry Walker and Daniel Huffman that the Leffle bond, if taken up by the Huffmans, should be received as a payment pro tanto of the bond due Henry Walker.

318 *The parties to this transaction were Henry Walker on the one side and Daniel Huffman on the other. Both were living, and both were competent witnesses.

The death of John H. Walker, not a party to the suit, could not affect the right of Daniel Huffman to testify in his own behalf.

The act of the general assembly allowing parties to testify in their own cases has already been construed by this court. In Martz v. Martz's heirs, 25 Gratt. 361, Judge Anderson, speaking for the court, thus clearly lays down the rule which must govern in this case: "One party to a suit is incompetent as a witness on account of the disqualification of the other party only in a case where he was a party to the transaction which is the subject of the suit or proceeding, and the other party to it is dead, insane, or incompetent from some legal cause."

Applying this rule to the case before us, it is clear the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to testify upon the subject to which he was interrogated, as set forth in the defendant's first bill of exceptions.

The court is therefore of opinion, that for the errors hereinbefore declared, the judgment of the said Circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded for a new trial to be had therein in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel; and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the said judgment and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the 319 said Circuit court erred in refusing to permit the defendant *Daniel Huffman to testify upon the subject to which he was interrogated, as set forth in defendant's first bill of exceptions, notwithstanding it appeared that John H. Walker was dead; and that the said Circuit court further erred in refusing to give, on the defendant's motion, their instruction number one, evidence having been given tending to prove the state of facts therein supposed.

Therefore it is considered by the court that, for the errors aforesaid, the said judgment of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendant in error do, out of the estate of his testator in his hands to be administered, pay to the plaintiffs in error their costs by them about the prosecution of their said writ in this behalf expended; and the cause is remanded to the said Circuit court of Craig county with instructions to set aside the verdict of the jury therein, and award the defendants a new trial to be conducted in conformity with the principles above declared.

Judgment reversed.

He proves that H in his lifetime assigned the judgment to D, who was a debtor of T, who was a debtor of W; and that under an agreement between T and D that T would take in payment of his debt, any debt on W which K would take in payment of T's debt to W, D obtained this judgment from H, and assigned it to K, who credited the amount on T's debt to W. There was a verdict for the defendant, and on motion for a new trial, HELD:

1. Plea of Payment—Fallacy in.*—The evidence should have been excluded from the jury, the defendant's plea not describing the payment so as to give plaintiff notice of its nature, as required by the statute, Code of 1860, ch. 172, § 4.

2. Assignment of Judgment—Assignee's Rights and Liabilities.—K having taken the assignment to himself, and credited the amount upon the debt due from T to W, he made himself

3. Same—Effect—At Law—In Equity.—The arrangement does not constitute a payment of the judgment at law, though it may constitute grounds of equities between W and P.

In June 1869 H. F. Peery recovered a judgment by confession in the County court of Tazewell, against John M. Witten and W. W. Peery, for twelve hundred and forty dollars, with interest from the 3d of January 1861 until paid and costs, $5.38. Prior to June 1873 both the plaintiff H. F. Peery and John M. Witten had died, and James P. Kelly had qualified as administrator of H. F. Peery and as executor of Witten.

In June 1873 James P. Kelly, as administrator of H. F. Peery, sued out of the clerk's office of the County court of Tazewell county a scire facias to revive the said judgment against W. W. Peery the surviving obligor therein, and the same having been executed upon him, he appeared and filed the plea of payment; upon which issue was taken. The cause was then removed to the Circuit court.

Upon the trial the defendant to sustain his defence, introduced a bond for $4,000 executed by David Toomy to John M. Witten, bearing date the 15th of June 1869, and payable four years after date, and an endorsement thereon dated the 1st of June 1871, of a credit on the bond for $2,084.23. And he then introduced a witness George W. Deskins, who proved that in the lifetime of Witten said Toomy purchased of Witten certain real estate to the amount of $5,500, for which Toomy executed his note to Witten. That subsequently thereto the witness and his son-in-law John H. Owens, 322 *purchased real estate from Toomy, for which they executed their notes to him to the amount of $6,450. That to settle the matter between himself and Toomy, it was agreed that Toomy would receive from witness on the indebtedness of Deskins and Owens, any paper that James P. Kelly the plaintiff, who was then the executor of Witten, would receive from Toomy on his indebtedness to Witten. That after three or four months negotiation, witness and Owens purchased and had assigned to him certain judgments against Witten, and among them the judgment in suit in this case, which was assigned by H. F. Peery. This assignment was for value to Deskins, describing the judgment, which is stated then to amount to $2,032.78. That thereupon the witness, Toomy and Kelly the plaintiff met in conference, when witness assigned the judgment to Kelly. The assignment is as follows: For value received I assign the above judgment to James P. Kelly, amounting to $2,032.78. Given under my hand, August 1st 1871. George W. Deskins. And that to the extent of his assignment to Kelly the witness received a credit upon his and Owens' indebtedness to Toomy, and Toomy was credited to a like extent upon his indebtedness to the estate of John M. Witten.

The witness further stated that some time during the negotiations, he did not remember when, something was said about taking a refunding bond, and that Kelly said he would not take such a bond, but would take an assignment.

After Deskins had deposed to the foregoing facts the plaintiff moved the court to exclude the testimony from the jury as improper, because there being only a general plea of payment by the defendant, the said general plea gives no notice to the plaintiff

323 of the special and particular circumstances relied upon as proof *of payment, and that such testimony could only be introduced under a special plea of payment, as required by the 4th section of ch. 172, page 716, of the Code; and there being filed no description of the said matter of payment and no account giving notice of the nature of such payment. But the court overruled the motion to exclude the testimony; to which opinion of the court the plaintiff excepted.

But it appears from the bill that no exception was made to the ruling of the court before the return of the jury with their verdict.

The jury having found a verdict in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff moved the court for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; but the court overruled the motion and the plaintiff excepted. In addition to the facts hereinbefore given there was some other which went only to corroborate the statement of Deskins.

The court having entered a judgment on the verdict, the plaintiff applied to a judge of this court for a writ of error; which was awarded.

J. W. & J. P. Sheffey and Gilmore, for the appellant.

Terry & Pierce and Burns, for the appellee.

Anderson J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to exclude from the jury the testimony of George Deskins, the plea not describing the payment, as the witnesses' testimony tended to prove, so as to give the plaintiff notice of its nature, as required by section 4, chap.

172, of Code of 1860. The motion to 324 exclude was made and overruled *before the cause was given to the jury; but it does not appear from the record, that the point was saved by the plaintiff, or any notification given that it would be saved, until after the verdict was rendered. The rule of practice, which is sanctioned by this court in Wash. & New Orl. Teleg. Co. v. Hobson & Son, 15 Gratt. 122, 138, and by a more recent decision, in the case of Martz's ex'or v. Martz's heirs, 25 Gratt. 361, is that notice must be given at the time of the ruling of the court, or at least before verdict, that the point will be saved, though the bill of exceptions may be drawn up and signed, any time during the term. This case may therefore be considered on its merits, and in connection with the testimony sought to be excluded, as presented by the first bill of exceptions.

And the court is of opinion that the facts proved, did not justify the verdict of the jury. James P. Kelly was executor of John M. Witten, and administrator of H. F. Peery. The latter in his lifetime obtained a judgment for debt, against the former, John M. Witten, and William W. Peery, the defendant here. John M. Witten and H. F. Peery having both died subsequent to the judgment, this proceeding was instituted by James P. Kelly administrator of the latter, to revive the judgment in his name, against Wm. W. Peery the survivor, who pleaded payment.

After the death of John M. Witten, a bond for $4,000, which had been executed to him in his lifetime by one Toomy for land, came into the hands of his executor, the said Kelly, which Toomy was desirous to pay. He held the bonds of George Deskins, and his son-in-law Owens, for $5,500, and agreed that he would receive from Deskins, and credit on his and Owens' debt, any paper that J. P. Kelly, Witten's executor, would receive and credit upon his indebted- 325 ness *to Witten. Deskins obtained an assignment from H. F. Peery for value, of his said judgment against Witten and Wm. W. Peery, amounting then to $2,032.78 cents, which he assigned to Toomy, who, according to this testimony, gave credit on his and Owens' indebtedness to him for the amount thereof. It seems that Kelly as executor of Witten refused to make payment of said judgment; but as an accommodation to the parties, he was willing to credit Toomy's bond to Witten, with the amount of the judgment, whereby he became personally liable to the estate of Witten for that amount, and to take an assignment of the judgment for his indemnity. It does not appear that he was benefited to the amount of one cent by the transaction; his only object seeming to be to facilitate an adjustment between the parties. And to make himself safe, he required that the judgment should be assigned to himself. So that whilst he by crediting Toomy's indebtedness with the amount of the judgment, assumed a liability therefor to the estate of Witten, he held the unsatisfied judgment against J. M. Witten and W. W. Peery both, by the assignment of H. F. Peery, George Deskins, and Toomy, to make him safe.

The court is of opinion that said transaction was unquestionably legitimate, and from aught that appears, is not liable to objection on the ground of any unfairness. The said James P. Kelly thereby became invested with the beneficial interest in the joint judgment against both John M. Witten and Wm. W. Peery. It was therefore competent for him to maintain the writ of scire facias against Wm. W. Peery, survivor, to revive the judgment against him in his name as administrator of H. F. Peery, for whom the original judgment was rendered. And the court is of 326 *opinion that it was not competent for the defendant to rely upon the assignment of said judgment to James P. Kelly, in his defence to this proceeding, as a payment, and that the verdict of the jury is plainly and palpably contrary to the law, and the evidence. The court is therefore of opinion to reverse the judgment without prejudice to any equities between Witten and W. W. Peery, which may hereafter be asserted in a proper proceeding; and to remand the cause, with instructions to set aside the verdict, and to grant the plaintiff a new trial; which shall be proceeded with in conformity to the principles herein declared.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the said judgment and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the transaction on the part of the plaintiff in error set out in his bill of exceptions No. 1, was unquestionably legitimate, and, from aught that appears, is not liable to objection on the ground of unfairness; that the said James P. Kelly thereby became invested with the beneficial interest in the joint judgment against both John M. Witten and William W. Peery; that it was, therefore, competent for him to maintain the writ of scire facias against William W. Peery, survivor, to revive the judgment against him in his name of administrator of H. F. Peery, for whom the original judgment was rendered, and hence it was not competent for the defendant to rely upon the assignment of said judgment to James P. Kelly, in his defence to this proceeding, as a payment; and accordingly that the verdict of the jury is 327 plainly *contrary to the law and the evidence, and the said Circuit court erred in refusing to set the same aside on the motion of said plaintiff.

It is, therefore, considered, that for the error aforesaid, the said judgment of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendant in error pay to the plaintiff in error his costs by him about his said writ in this behalf expended; and the cause is remanded to the said circuit court with instructions to set aside the said verdict and grant a new trial, to be conducted in conformity with the principles herein declared. But this judgment is to be without prejudice to any equities between Witten and William W. Peery, which may hereafter be asserted in a proper proceeding.

Judgment reversed.

3. Facts.—S, a cattle dealer, delivered on the 3d of January 1870, to the Va. & Tenn. R. Co. at M, a station on said railroad, a lot of fat cattle, for transportation to Lynchburg, then the eastern terminus of the road. The cattle were received by the agent of the company, and a paper, in the usual form, signed by the agent, was delivered to and accepted by S. By this paper it was provided, that in consideration of the reduced charge for freight by the company, it was agreed, that S should release the company from all injury, loss and damage or depreciation which the animals, or either of them, may suffer in consequence, &c.—specifying several modes of injury—and from all other damage incidental to railroad transportation, which shall not be established to have been caused by the gross negligence or delinquency of any of the officers or agents of the said railroad company.

329 The cattle of S were all destroyed in consequence of the car in which *they were carried being precipitated over the Otter bridge on said railroad, between M and Lynchburg. Held: Railroads—Liability for Negligence.—That notwithstanding the contract, the company is responsible if the damage was caused by any negligence of the company or its agents.

4. Evidence—Res Gestæ—Hearsay.§—The statements of agents of a railroad company, as to the condition of the brakes on the cars, or as to the condition of the road at the place where the accident occurred, said statements having been made some time before, and some time after the accident, and at some miles from the place, are not a part of the res gestæ, and are not competent evidence for a plaintiff, in a suit against the company, to prove negligence in the company.

This was an action on the case in assumpsit in the circuit court of Wythe county, brought in April 1870, by John T. Sayers Jr. against the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad Company, to recover the value of a lot of fat cattle shipped by the plaintiff on the road of the defendants, and which were killed by the throwing off of the car in which they were carried from the track of the road at Big Otter bridge in the county of Bedford. The declaration contained five counts; and the defendant demurred to the whole declaration and to each count thereof, and also pleaded non assumpsit; on which plea issue was joined.

for negligence. See V. C. § 1296; also, Richmond, etc., Co. v. Payne (supra); Johnson's Adm'r v. Richmond, etc., Co., 86 Va. 975; Norfolk & Western R. R. Co. v. Harman & Crockett, 91 Va. 601; and C. & O. R. R. Co. v. Am. Exchange Bank, 92 Va. 495. The principal case was cited with approval by LUCAS, P., in the case of Zouch v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 36 W. Va. 528, 15 S. E. 193; Martin v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 193.

§Evidence—Res Gestæ—Hearsay.—The decision in the principal case as to the distinction of hearsay evidence from part of the res gestæ is cited and followed in Reusch v. Roanoke, etc., Co., 91 Va. 537; also, in Norfolk & C. R. R. Co. v. Suffolk Lumber Co., 92 Va. 44; Coyle v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 11 W. Va. 108; Hawker v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 637.

Upon the hearing on the demurrer, the court sustained the demurrer to the third count, but overruled it in all other respects: and on the trial there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,344; and the defendant applied to this court for a writ of error and supersedeas; which was awarded. The case is sufficiently stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

Crockett and Blair, for the appellant.

Sheffey and Caldwell, for the appellee.

330 *Christian J. The important and interesting question we have to determine in this case is, whether a railroad company can by express contract limit its liability as a common carrier, so as to protect itself against all injuries received and losses incurred, except by the gross negligence of the company, its agents, servants and employees.

While there are other questions presented in the record which it becomes necessary to pass upon, the main question, which was argued with much ability and learning by the counsel on both sides, is the one above stated, and will be the question first considered.

The plaintiff in error, John T. Sayers, was a cattle dealer. He delivered, on the 3d January 1870, to the said railroad company, at Max Meadows, a station on said railroad, a lot of fat cattle for transportation to the city of Lynchburg, then the eastern terminus of said road. The cattle were received by the agent of said railroad company, and the following paper, signed by said agent, was delivered to and accepted by said Sayers:

“Form No. 38—Transportation Department, Virginia and Tennessee Railroad Company.

Notice.—Live Stock in car loads will not be taken at the special rates indicated by the tariff, but will be charged first class rates on 15,000 pounds per small car, and 20,000 per large car load, unless the shipper and agent execute the following live stock contract:

Received by the Va. and Tenn. Railroad of John T. Sayers, Jr., the following described live stock:

Consignee, Destination &c.	Description of stock.	Weight.
J. T. Sayers, Richmond. Charges $36.80.	1 car load fat cattle	18,000.

331 Consigned as per margin to be transported by the *Va. and Tenn. Railroad Company to its freight station at Lynchburg, Va., ready to be delivered to, and unloaded by the consignee, or upon his order, or to such company or carrier of the same to be forwarded beyond said station whose line may be considered a part of the route to the destination of said stock, it being distinctly understood that the responsibility of the Va. & Tenn. railroad company and connecting lines, as common carriers, shall cease at destination, upon the following conditions, to wit:

That, whereas the Va. & Tenn. railroad and connecting lines transport live stock only at first class rates, except when, on consideration of a reduced rate by the car load, the owner and shipper assumes certain risks specified below. Now, on consideration of the said railroad agreeing to transport the above described live stock at the reduced rate of thirty-six dollars and eighty cents per car load and a free passage to the owner or his agent on the train with the stock, the said owner and shipper do hereby assume and release the said railroad from all injury, loss and damage or depreciation which the animals or either of them may suffer in consequence of either of them being weak, or escaping or injuring themselves or each other, or in consequence of overloading, heat, suffocation, fright, viciousness, or of being injured by fire, or the burning of any material, while in the possession of the company; and from all other damage incidental to railroad or steamboat transportation, which shall not be established to have been caused by the gross negligence or delinquency of any of the officers or agents of the said railroad or steamboat companies.

* * * * And it is further agreed that the owners and shippers or persons in charge of stock assume and release said railroad company and connecting 332 *lines from all risk of personal injury while upon or about the train of the company.

And this agreement further witnesseth, that the said owner or shipper has this day delivered to said company the live stock described above to be transported on the conditions, stipulations and understandings above expressed, which have been explained to and fully understood and duly accepted by the said owner and shipper.” Signed T. J. Hanson, station agent, and endorsed “live stock contract between Va. & Tenn. railroad and John T. Sayers, Jan. 3d, 1870.”

The cattle of the plaintiff (the defendant in error) were all destroyed in consequence of the car in which they were placed for transportation being precipitated over the Otter bridge on said railroad between Max Meadows, where they were shipped, and Lynchburg, the point of destination. Suit was brought by Sayers against the railroad company in the Circuit court of Wythe, the declaration charging, in various forms in several counts, that the injury and loss sustained by the plaintiff, in the destruction of his cattle, was caused by negligence of the agents, employees and servants of said railroad company. In the defence to this action the railroad company mainly relied upon their contract with the plaintiff; and while denying all negligence, insisted that under their contract with the plaintiff they could only be held liable for gross negligence; which the evidence failed to establish.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at one thousand three hundred and fifty-four dollars. Upon this verdict a judgment was entered for the plaintiff; and thereupon the defendant applied for and obtained a writ of error from this court. The instructions offered by 333 both plaintiff *and defendant, those refused and those given, raise the question whether a railroad company can limit its liability as a common carrier by express contract, so as to excuse itself for negligence, unless such negligence amounts to gross negligence; in other words, whether it can by contract excuse itself from negligence at all. The court below held that it could not; that if the loss was occasioned by the negligence of the company or its agents, no contract they could make with the shipper or consignee, however plainly expressed, could release the company. It is this judgment of the circuit court, thus expounding the law, we are first called upon to review.

This question is one of first impression in this state. While it has been the subject of much judicial discussion in England and many of the states of this Union, where the decisions have been to some extent conflicting, the precise question has never been decided by this court. We have, therefore, given to the subject a careful and candid investigation.

Railroad companies are invested with the powers and subject to the liabilities of common carriers. At common law persons and corporations exercising such public employment are, upon grounds of public policy, held to a stringent liability, which is not exacted of ordinary bailees. At common law, they are insurers, to a certain extent, of the goods entrusted to them, and are held responsible for all injuries thereto, except those caused by the act of God or the public enemies. The law which fixed these rights and obligations is of ancient origin and founded upon grounds of public policy. The exclusive possession of the property in the carrier, the ordinarily exclusive possession by him of the means of evidence, the facility of embezzlement, and of collisions with thieves and robbers, and 334 *the entire separation of the owner from his property during the transit, are some of the leading grounds of public policy which gave rise to this extraordinary responsibility.

These rigorous rules of the common law have been modified, sometimes by legislation and more frequently by decisions of the courts, to the extent that the carrier may by express contract limit his liability as an insurer. Thus by an act of Congress passed in 1851 in relation to sea-going vessels, ship-owners are relieved from all responsibility for loss by fire, unless caused by their own design or neglect; and from responsibility for loss of money and other valuables named, unless notified of their character and value. And there is similar legislation in some of the states, as I am informed, but to whose statutes I have not access here. But the common law rules have been relaxed in most of the states by the decision of the courts, to the extent of granting by express contract, or notice brought home to the shipper, a limitation of their liabilities as insurers. Even the policy of such limitation has been doubted by learned judges and eminent writers on this subject. "As the duties and responsibilities of public carriers are prescribed by public policy, it has been seriously doubted," says Mr. Justice Bradley, (17 Wall. U. S. R. 359,) "whether the courts did wisely in allowing that policy to be departed from without legislative interference, by which needed modifications could have been introduced into the law."

It would be an instructive and interesting investigation to trace the causes which led to the relaxation of the rigorous rules of the common law, and to note how strenuously the courts for a long time resisted all attempts of common carriers to limit 335 their common *law liabilities. It is easy to perceive that the modification of the common law grew out of the great hardship incurred by the carrier in certain special cases; for instance, cases where goods of great value, or subject to extra risk, were delivered to him without notice of their character, or where losses happened by sheer accident without any possibility of fraud or collusion on his part, such as accidental fire, collision at sea, &c. Such cases as these led to a relaxation of the rule to the extent of authorizing certain exemption from liability in such cases, to be secured either by public notice brought home to the owner of the goods, or by inserting exemptions from liability in the bill of lading or other contract of carriage.

That a common carrier may limit his common law liability to the extent above indicated, may now be considered as well settled.

But the important question is, how far can he go beyond that? Can he secure by contract an exemption from liability for acts arising out of his own negligence or that of his agents? Can he by contract limit his responsibility only to a case of gross negligence, as is attempted in this case?

In this state, as before observed, these questions have never been the subject of judicial investigation. We must, therefore, look for authority to the works of eminent authors which are the recognized textbooks of the law on this subject, and to the decisions of the Supreme court of the United States and of our sister states, as well as the decisions of the English courts, and from these sources of high authority settle the law upon this important question for this state.

Mr. Justice Story in his work on bailments, § 571, says: "But an inquiry may be made whether the carrier will not be liable also for ordinary negligence, 336 *as well as for gross negligence, notwithstanding such notices—(i. e., such notices as are brought home to the party, and thereby constituting an express contract. There are dicta by various judges indicating that the common rule of ordinary diligence, in common cases of hire, is applicable to the case of carriers under notice. On the other hand there are declarations of judges at nisi prius, as well as their opinions in banc, which seem to put it as a question of gross negligence or not. The question may now be considered at rest, by an adjudication entirely satisfactory in its reasoning, and turning upon the very point, in which it was held that in case of such notice the carrier is liable for losses and injuries occasioned not only by gross negligence, but by ordinary negligence; or in other words, the carrier is bound to ordinary diligence." The author, to sustain this view, refers to Wyld v. Pickford, 8 Mees. & Welb. 442, 461. Referring to that case, I find that Mr. Baron Parke uses the following language: "Upon reviewing the cases on this subject, the decisions and dicta will not be found altogether uniform, and some uncertainty still remains as to the ground on which cases are taken out of the operation of these notices." After reference to a number of cases he says: "The weight of authority, however, seems to be in favor of the doctrine, that in order to render a carrier liable after such notice, it is not necessary to prove a total abandonment of that character, or an act of willful misconduct, but that it is enough to prove an act of ordinary negligence, which is gross negligence in the sense in which it has been understood in the last mentioned cases."

Judge Redfield, in his valuable work on Carriers and other Bailees, § 156, 337 says: "There is certainly *something very incongruous and not little revolting to the moral sense that a bailee for hire should be allowed to stipulate for exemption from the consequences of his own negligence, ordinary or extraordinary. A laborer, domestic, or mechanic, who should propose such a stipulation, would be regarded as altogether unworthy of confidence in any respect, and the employee who should submit to such a condition must be reduced to extreme necessity, one would suppose." After an interesting review of the cases on the subject, and after quoting the general rule of law upon this point as stated by Baron Parke in Wyld v. Pickford (supra), the learned author remarks, § 163: "This seems to be placing the effect of such notices upon a reasonable basis, and most of the American cases will be found to have adopted in the main similar views."

With this reference to, and extracts from, the works of Story and Redfield, I come now to consider the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and of the other states.

The question we are now considering has been more than once determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. The first case to be noticed is the case of The New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. Merchants Bank of Boston, reported in 6 Howard 344, and decided in 1848. The case was this, and grew out of the burning of the steamer Lexington. Certain money belonging to the bank had been intrusted to Harden's express to be carried to Boston, and was on board the steamer when she was destroyed. By agreement between the steamboat company and Harden, the crate of the latter and its contents were to be at his sole risk. The court held this agreement valid so far as to exonerate the steamboat company from the *responsibility imposed by law, but not to excuse them from misconduct or negligence. Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Although he, the carrier, was allowed to exempt himself from losses arising out of events and accidents against which he was a sort of insurer; yet inasmuch as he had undertaken to carry the goods from one place to another, he was deemed to have incurred the same degree of responsibility as that which attaches to a private person engaged casually in the like occupation, and was therefore bound to use ordinary care in the custody of the goods."

The next case which came before the Supreme Court of the United States was Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company v. Derby. That was the case of a free passenger—a stockholder of the company taken over the road by the president to examine its condition—and it was contended in argument that as to him nothing but "gross negligence" would make the company liable. Mr. Justice Grier, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety requires that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence; and whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of passengers should not be left to the sport of chance or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.'" 14 How. U. S. R. 486. In a subsequent case this doctrine was reaffirmed, "as resting not only on public policy, but on sound principles of law." Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. U. S. R. 469–494. In York Company v. Cen'l R. R., 3 Wall. U. S. R. 113, the same court, after conceding that the responsibility *imposed on the carrier of goods by the common law may be restricted and qualified by express stipulation, adds: Where such stipulation is made, and it does not cover losses from negligence and misconduct, we can see no just reason for refusing its recognition and enforcement.

In the case of Express Company v. Ronnelledge Brothers, the carriers were sued for the value of gold dust delivered to them on a bill of lading, excluding liability for any loss or damage by fire, act of God, enemies of the government, or dangers incidental to a time of war. The company was held liable for a robbery by a predatory band of armed men (which was one of the excepted risks), because they negligently and needlessly took a route which was exposed to such incursions. The judge at the trial charged the jury that although the contract was legally sufficient to restrict the liability of the defendants as common carriers, yet if they were guilty of actual negligence, they were responsible; and that they were chargeable with negligence, unless they exercised the care and prudence of a prudent man in his own affairs. The Supreme Court held this to be a correct statement of the law. 8 Wall. U. S. R. 342, 352.

The most recent case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States is the case of Railroad Company v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. U. S. R. 357. This case would seem to be exactly in point. It was a case of injury to a cattle drover traveling on a stock train upon a free pass, and when there was an express contract that he should take all risks of injury to the stock and of personal injury to himself. The unanimous judgment of the court in that case established the following propositions, as laid down by Mr. Justice Bradley: 1. A common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate 340 for exemption *from responsibility, when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law. 2. It is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants. 3. These rules apply both to common carriers of goods and common carriers of passengers. 4. They apply to a case of a drover traveling on a stock train to look after his cattle, and having a free pass for that purpose.

I have thus far given the adjudications of the Supreme court of the United States upon the question under consideration, as well as the opinions of authors of recognized authority, to show that a common carrier cannot by express contract limit his common law liability to the extent of exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants.

I come now to notice the course of decision in the different states of the Union.

First, as to the decisions in the state of New York. Up to the year 1858, the course of decision in that state had been in conformity with the principles announced in the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States above referred to. But in a case decided in 1858—Wells v. N. Y. Central Railroad Company, 26 Barb. R. 641—the Supreme Court of that state seems to have given its assent, for the first time, to the proposition that a common carrier may stipulate against responsibility for the negligence of his servants; and this, contrary to the decisions before that time, may now be taken as the settled law of New York. See opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley, 17 Wall. U. S. R. 369. But this conclusion was reached against the earnest protest of some of the ablest judges of that state. And Judge Davis, in Stimson v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., 32 New York R. 333, 337, 341 *significantly remarks, in commenting on the recent decisions in that state: "The fruits of this rule are already being gathered in increasing accidents through the decreasing care and negligence on the part of these corporations, and they will continue to be reaped until a just sense of public policy shall lead to legislative restriction upon the power to make this kind of contracts."

In Pennsylvania a long course of decisions settles the doctrine that a common carrier cannot, by notice or express contract, limit his liability so as to exonerate him from responsibility for his own negligence or that of his servants.

In Farnham v. Camden R. R. Co., 55 Penn. St. R. 53, Chief Justice Thompson, delivering the opinion of the court, says: The doctrine is firmly settled in this state, that a common carrier cannot limit his liability so as to cover his own or his servants' negligence. In Penn. R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Penn. R. 315, a drover's pass stipulated for immunity of the company in case of injury from negligence of its agents or otherwise. Judge Read, after a careful review of the Pennsylvania decisions, says: This endorsement releases the company from all liability, for any cause whatever, for any loss or injury to the person or property, however it may have been occasioned; and our doctrine, settled by the above decisions, made upon grave deliberation, declares that such a release is no excuse for negligence. See also 8 Penn. R. 479; 16 Id. 67; 30 Id. 242; 63 Id. 14.

In Ohio the cases are very decided on this subject, and reject all attempts of the carrier to stipulate against his own negligence or that of his servants. In Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. R. 131, the court, after conceding the right of the carrier to 342 make special *contracts to a certain extent, says: "He cannot, however, protect himself from losses occasioned by his own fault. He exercises a public employment, and diligence and good faith in the discharge of his duties are essential to his public duties. * * *

And public policy forbids that he should be relieved by special agreement from that degree of diligence and fidelity that the law has exacted in the discharge of his duties." See also Welsh v. Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago R. R., 10 Ohio St. R. 65; Jones v. Vorhees, 10 Ohio R. 145; 21 Id. 722; 19 Id. 1, 221, 260.

The decisions of the Supreme courts of Maine and Massachusetts are to the same effect, by one unbroken current. To the same purport are the decisions of many of the other states, which time and space only permit me to mention passim, but which are well worthy of attentive perusal and more particular notice. See 31 Ind. 394; 2 Rich'd (Sou. Ca.) 286; 28 Georgia 543; 37 Alabama 247; 39 Miss. 822; 20 Louisiana Annual 302.

After this hasty review of the decisions of the American courts on the question before us, I will now make brief reference to the English cases.

Up to the year 1832, the course of the English decisions had been uniformly against permitting a common carrier to contract for exemption of responsibility for loss or injury resulting from his own negligence or that of his servants. And consequently, in Mr. Justice Story's work on Bailments, published in 1832, he correctly gives the state of the English law as stated supra. But between that time and the passage of the railway and canal traffic act, passed in 1854, there was a change of opinion on the subject; and it was held in several cases that carriers could stipulate for exemption from liability, even for their own gross negligence. See Carr v. Lancashire & Yorkshire R. R. Co., 7 Exch. R. 707; Peck v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 10 Ho. Lord Cases 473.

In the last named case, decided in 1862, Mr. Justice Blackburn, after an able and interesting review of the course of decision in England on this subject, and referring to Mr. Justice Story's work on Bailments, published in 1832, quoted in the opinion (supra), says: "In my opinion, the weight of authority was in 1832 in favor of this view of the law; but the cases decided in our courts between 1832 and 1854 establish that this was not the law, and that a carrier might by a special notice make a contract limiting his responsibility even in the cases here mentioned of gross negligence, misconduct, or fraud on the part of his servants; and, as it seems to me, the reason why the legislature intervened, in the railway and canal traffic act of 1854, was because it thought that the companies took advantage of these decisions (in Story's language) "to evade altogether the salutary policy of the common law."

In the same case, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, referring to the case of Carr v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Railroad Co. (supra), in which it was held that a common carrier might by express contract release himself from liability even for gross negligence, says: "In a very short time after the decision of this case was pronounced, the act of Parliament was passed," (known as the railroad and canal act). "It cannot be doubted that the object of the legislature in passing it was to prevent these contracts, in which any liability for negligence is either entirely excluded or made conditional on the payment of a premium."

The railway and canal traffic act, passed in 1864, adopted in consequence of these decisions, provides: "§ 7. Every such company shall be liable for the loss of, or any injury done to, any horses, cattle or other animals, or to any article, goods or things, in the receiving, forwarding or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition or declaration made or given by such company contrary thereto, or in any wise limiting such liability, every such notice, condition or a declaration, being thereby declared to be null and void."

It will thus be seen by this act of Parliament, the salutary rule of public policy, which prohibits a common carrier from limiting his liability so as to exonerate him from the consequences of his own negligence, has been in effect reinstated in England; and the evils growing out of the change in the course of decisions, and the departure from those wise and salutary decisions which had prevailed in the English courts for more than half a century, had at last to be corrected by an act of Parliament, restoring the older and better rule of law.

From this review of the American and English decisions, I am constrained to conclude that the great weight of authority is in favor of declaring that the salutary rule of law and public policy, which forbids a common carrier from exempting himself from liability by express contract or otherwise for his own negligence, whether gross or ordinary, should be firmly adhered to and maintained by the courts of this state.

But it is argued with much force by the learned counsel for the appellants, that parties have a right to make their own contracts; that it is no concern of the public on what terms an individual has his goods carried; that if he chooses to accept all the risks by paying less for the carriage, how does it concern the public, and what public policy does it violate, how are public morals or public interests affected? Is it not a restriction upon trade and commerce, and an invasion of personal rights, for the courts to interfere and to declare such agreements, voluntarily and deliberately made, null and void? Such arguments as these were also urged in the case of Railroad Company v. Lockwood (supra) 378, and were thus conclusively answered by Mr. Justice Bradley; and I cannot do better than to adopt his answer: "Is it true," he says, "that the public interests are not affected by individual contracts of the kind referred to? Is not the whole business community affected by holding such contracts valid? If held valid, the advantageous position of the companies exercising the business of common carriers is such that it places it in their power to change the law of common carriers in effect by introducing new rules of obligation. The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higggle or stand out and seek redress in a court. His business does not admit such a course. He prefers rather to accept every bill of lading or to sign every paper the carrier presents, often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases he has no alternative but to do this or abandon his business." These cogent and just views of Mr. Justice Bradley are as strongly illustrated by the case we have before us as the one he was considering. In this case the railroad company require the drover to pay on his cattle as first class freight, unless he signed the contract. He therefore would have had to pay the enormous sum of $6.60 per head for each animal, or $113 per car load, instead of $36. No drover could afford to pay these rates; and this case is a strong illustration of how completely parties are in the power of the railroad companies, and how necessary it is to stand firmly by those principles of law by which the public interests are protected. The inequality of the parties, the compulsion under which the customer is placed, and the obligations of the carrier to the public, operate with full force to divest such transaction of validity. The business of the common carrier is mostly concentrated in the hands of powerful corporations whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do in fact control it, and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if any were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be adverse (to say the least) to the dictates of public policy and morality. Contracts of common carriers, like those of fiduciaries, giving them a position in which they can take an undue advantage of the persons with whom they contract, must rest upon their fairness and reasonableness. It was for the reason that the limitations of liability, first introduced by common carriers into these notices and bills of lading, were just and reasonable, that the courts sustained them.

It was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for losses happening by sheer accident, or the dangers of navigation, that no human skill could guard against; it was just and reasonable that they should not be not be chargeable for money or other valuable articles liable to be stolen or damaged, unless apprized of their character or value; it was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for articles 347 liable *to rapid decay, or for live animals liable to get unruly from fright, and to injure themselves in that state, when such articles or animals became injured without their fault or negligence. And when any of these just and reasonable excuses were incorporated into notices or special contracts assented to by their customers, the law might well give effect to these without the violation of any important principle, although modifying the strict rules of responsibility imposed by the common law. The improved state of society and the better administration of the laws had diminished the opportunities of collusion and bad faith on the part of the carrier, and rendered less imperative the application of the iron rule that he must be responsible at all events. Hence the exemptions referred to were deemed reasonable and proper to be allowed; but the proposition to allow a public carrier to abandon altogether his obligations to the public, and to stipulate for exemptions that are unreasonable and improper, amounting to an abdication of the essential duties of his employment, ought never to be entertained."

I think, therefore, "that," to use the language of Chief Justice Redfield, "every attempt of carriers by general notices or special contract to excuse themselves from responsibility for losses or damage resulting in any degree from their own want of care and faithfulness is against that good faith which the law requires as the basis of all contracts or employments, and therefore based upon principles and a policy which the law will not uphold."

But the learned counsel for the appellant, in his able argument in behalf of the company, insisted that the law recognized different degrees of negligence, and it was legitimate for a common carrier to limit his liability to losses or damage from all 348 causes, except gross *negligence, as was done in this case by express contract. I think an examination of the authorities will show that the distinctions between "gross" negligence and ordinary negligence are too vague and shadowy to be of any practical importance in the adjudication of questions of this sort.

The tendency of judicial opinion is adverse to any distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. In each case the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands, and hence it is more strictly accurate to call it simply "negligence." The decided preponderance of authority is in favor of abolishing the vague and uncertain distinctions between the different degrees of negligence, and to hold the public carrier bound whenever it is shown that the loss or damage is occasioned by negligence at all, whether gross or ordinary; or, in other words, the carrier is bound to ordinary diligence. See 1 Smith Lead. Cases (7th Am. ed.) 453; Story on Bailments, § 571; Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 442; 11 Id. 115; 2 Queen's Bench 661; 14 Howard 486; 17 Wall. 383.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the circuit court of Wythe county did not err in giving the instructions which it gave the jury, or in refusing those which it refused to give, both sets of instructions presenting in different forms the question we have been discussing, and the said court having decided that the railroad company cannot by express contract exonerate itself from liability for loss or damage occasioned by the negligence (whether gross or ordinary) of its agents, servants or employees.

There are now two other grounds of error assigned which remain to be noticed. First, as to the demurrer to the declaration; second, as to the admissibility of 349 *certain evidence offered by the plaintiff and admitted by the court.

As to the first, it is sufficient to remark that a careful inspection of the declaration shows that each count is a count in assumpsit, and no one of them in tort; so that in fact there is no misjoinder of counts as claimed by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, and the circuit court was right in overruling the demurrer.

The next ground of error assigned presents a more serious question, and requires a more particular notice. It is raised by the third, fourth and fifth bills of exception taken by the defendants, and presents the question whether the evidence therein set forth was competent to go to the jury.

It was proposed by the plaintiff to prove by the witness, Parish, that he heard a negro brakeman, who was on the train with plaintiff's cattle, say, "That had it not been for the brake on the East Tennessee car the train would have run off with them coming down the Alleghany mountains." This remark of the brakeman was made before the accident, and at Salem, a distance of forty-two miles from the scene of the disaster. It was further proposed, on the part of the plaintiff, to prove by the witness Crockett that he heard one Burroughs, who was a section-master on defendants' road, embracing the point where the accident occurred, say that "he (Burroughs) expected an accident on that part of the road where said accident did take place." This conversation took place sometime after the accident happened, and when Crockett and the plaintiff were coming from Lynchburg on a special train back to the point of the accident, the said section-master, Burroughs, being on said special train with them.

The question is, whether these declarations of the *brakeman and section-master were competent to go to the jury. The court below admitted the evidence. Was this error? It is insisted that these declarations were admissible (though hearsay) as the declarations of agents. It is true that where the acts of the agent will bind the principal, there, his declarations, representations, and admissions, respecting the subject-matter, will also bind him, if made at the same time and constituting part of the res gestae. They are of the nature of original evidence and not of hearsay, the representation or statement in such cases being the ultimate fact to be proved, and not an admission of some other fact. The parties own admission, whenever made, may be given in evidence against him; but the admission or declaration of his agent, binds him only when it is made during the continuance of his agency in regard to a transaction then depending et dum fervet opus. It is because it is a verbal act and part of the res gestae that it is admissible at all. It is to be observed that the rule admitting the declarations of the agent is founded upon the legal identity of the agent and the principal, and the declaration of the agent to be admissible, must be part of the res gestae. 1 Greenleaf, Redfield's edition, § 113, 114; Story on Agency, § 134, 137.

But it is argued with some force, that these general rules do not apply to corporations which do their business entirely through agents, and that companies engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers are responsible for the declarations of their agents and employees, through whose instrumentality their whole business is transacted. This is a striking view of the subject, and some few cases it is admitted may be found adopting this view. But Chief Justice Redfield, in his edition of

1 Greenleaf, p. 135, § 114 (a) and 351 *notes, has collected the authorities, and says: "In general such companies are not responsible for the declarations or admissions of any of their servants beyond the immediate sphere of their agency and during the transaction of the business in which they are employed. Thus the declarations of the conductor of a railway train, as to the mode in which an accident occurred, made after its occurrence, or those of an engineer, made under similar circumstances, are not admissible." This is authority exactly in point. See also Griffin v. Montgomery &c. R. R. Co., 26 Geo. R. 111; Robinson v. Fichburg &c. R. R. Co., 7 Gray's R. 92. In Lucy v. Hudson River R. Co., 17 New York Court of Appeals R. 131, it was held that the declaration of the driver of a car, after the car had stopped, assigning the reason why he did not stop the car and thus prevent the injury to the plaintiff while crossing the street, that he could not stop the car because the brakes were out of order, being made after the injury was inflicted and the transaction terminated, is not admissible against the company, in whose employ such driver was, it being mere hearsay. See also to this same effect the Bellefontaine Railway Co. v. Hunter, 5 American R.; Moore v. Meacham, 10 N. Y. R. 207; Lane v. Bryant, 9 Gray's R. 245.

I think, therefore, upon principle and authority, that the declarations of the brakeman and section-master made at the time, and under the circumstances when made, were not a part of the res gestae, but mere hearsay, and ought to have been excluded. There was no reason why the brakeman and section-master should not have been examined as witnesses, and their declarations not being made at such time and under such circumstance as make them a part of the res gestae were mere hearsay.

352 *It is argued, however, that the evidence, if excluded, would not have changed the verdict of the jury, as the case was clearly made out without it. It is impossible for this court to estimate the effect which this evidence had on the minds of the jury, and it would be going beyond our legitimate function to enter upon any such vain speculation.

The court erred in admitting the evidence, and it is our province, without speculating how the evidence might have affected the minds of the jury, simply to declare it inadmissible, and for this error of the court to reverse the judgment, and to remand the cause to the said Circuit court for a new trial, to be had therein in accordance with the principles declared in the foregoing opinion.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel; and the court, having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the said judgment and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that there is no error in the judgment of the said Circuit court in giving the instructions given, or in refusing those refused; this court being of the opinion that the said Circuit court correctly expounded the law of the case, and that there was no error in overruling the demurrer, this court being of opinion that all the counts were counts in assumpsit and none in tort, and consequently there was no misjoinder of counts; but that the said Circuit court erred in admitting the evidence of the witnesses Crockett and Parish as to the declarations made by the brakesman and section master, those declarations not being made at such times and under such circumstances as would have made them *part of the res gestae, but mere hearsay, which ought to have been excluded. Therefore it is considered by the court, that for this error the said judgment of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendant in error pay to the plaintiffs in error their costs by them about the prosecution of their said writ of error in this behalf expended; and the cause is remanded to the said Circuit court, with instructions to set aside the verdict of the jury and try the cause anew, excluding the aforesaid evidence if again offered.

354 *Sayers & als. v. Wall & als.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

Absent, STAPLES J.*

I. Real Estate—Conveyance to Wife.—In November 1855 S made a deed by which he conveyed in fee to his wife E his entire real estate lying in the county of P, his then residence, of about 700 acres, and seven days afterwards acknowledged the deed in the clerk's office of the county. At the time he owed no debts, and had personal property, including slaves, amounting to ten or twelve thousand dollars. He afterwards in the course of business contracted debts; and losing his slaves by the results of the war, his personal property was not sufficient to pay his debts. His wife died in 1864, leaving children. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Effect—Curtesy.†—The conveyance, though void at law, is valid in equity, and vests in the wife both the legal and equitable title to the land, as of her separate estate, in which the husband, the wife being dead, is not entitled to curtesy.

2. Same—Same—Descent of Land.—Upon the death of the wife, her heirs were entitled to the immediate possession of the land.

3. Same—Same—Liability for Grantor's Debts.‡—There being no charge or proof of fraud by S in *JUDGE STAPLES had been counsel in the cause.

†Wife's Separate Estate.—The decision in the principal case, to the effect that a conveyance from husband to wife creates a separate estate in the wife even though there be no words expressing such intention, is cited and followed in Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 419, and in Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 156. These cases also hold with the principal case, that the husband is not entitled to curtesy in an estate thus created. See also, where the principal case was followed in West Virginia in Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 11; McKenzie v. R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 306. The principal case is cited in 21 Am. Rep. 303.

‡Liability for Husband's (Grantor's) Debts.—That an estate thus conveyed from husband to wife is not making the deed, the subsequent creditors of S have no equity against E and her children to entitle them to subject the land to the payment of the debts of S subsequently contracted.

4. Same—Same—Meritorious Consideration.§—Though the conveyance is not founded on a valuable but only on a meritorious consideration in favor of a wife and children, a court of equity will give effect to it against subsequent creditors of S.

II. Creditors' Bills—Parties.—A bill having been filed by the creditors of S to subject the land to the payment of their debts, without alluding to the deed from S to his wife, her children present their petition to the court setting out *the deed and their rights under it, and ask that they may be made defendants in the suit, that they may defend their rights under it; and they are permitted, without objection by the plaintiffs, to file their answers. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Proper Parties.—If they were not necessary parties, they were certainly proper parties; and having been permitted to appear and set up their claim, the plaintiffs cannot afterwards object that they were made parties.

2. Same—Cross-Bill—Petition Treated as Such.—If it would have been more proper to assert their rights by a cross-bill, their petition may be treated as such.

In June 1871 William J. Wall and William J. Jordan, late merchants and partners, who sued for the benefit of William J. Wall, filed their bill in the County court of Pulaski county, in which they alleged that in 1867 they had recovered a judgment against Reuben Sayers for $1,266.52, with interest, &c. That said Sayers had no personal property liable to execution, but that he was seized in fee simple of a tract of land in the county of Pulaski containing seven hundred and fifty acres; and that the rent of this land would not pay their debt in five years, And making Reuben Sayers a party defendant, they pray that so much of the land as is necessary to pay off their judgment may be sold, and for general relief.

In July 1872 two other judgment creditors of Reuben Sayers were, upon their petitions, permitted to come in as plaintiffs, to have satisfaction of their judgments out of the same land.

In January 1871 the court made a decree directing S. W. Poage, one of the commissioners of the court, to ascertain and report the amounts of judgments against the defendant Reuben Sayers, and the priorities of the liens of the said judgments, and the liable for debts of the former subsequently contracted, see Miller v. Blose, 30 Gratt. 761, and Keffer v. Grayson, 76 Va. 523. In Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 553, the principal case is cited, but distinguished; and in Robinson v. Woodford, 37 W. Va. 384, 16 S. E. 604, it is also cited and followed.

§Meritorious Consideration.—See Riggan v. Riggan, 93 Va. 90; Keffer v. Grayson, 76 Va. 523; 2 Minor's Inst. 883. In Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 377, 23 S. E. 560, an important distinction is made between the effect of a meritorious, and an inadequate consideration.

real estate owned by said Sayers, its 356 location, the number *of acres and the condition of the title to it, with any special matter, &c.

In March 1872 Sayers answered the bill. He admits the judgment of Hall & Jordan; but says, that whilst he was at one time the owner of the land mentioned in the bill, he is not now, and has not been the owner thereof for some sixteen years: that he has no right or interest in said property; that the same is in the possession of and under the control of James H. Comer and Margaret M. his wife, A. C. Dunn and Angeletta his wife, J. Howe Sayers and James C. Deaderick and Lizzie his wife, who claim and are entitled to the said property in fee simple as heirs at law of Eleanor A. Sayers deceased.

At the same term of the court Comer and wife, Dunn and wife, and J. Howe Sayers, asked for and obtained leave to file their petition in the cause. In their petition they say that the said Margaret M., Angeletta and J. Howe Sayers with Elizabeth J. the wife of James Deaderick, are the children and heirs at law of Mrs. Eleanor Ann Sayers deceased, and inherited from her at her death, a fee simple estate in a tract of land containing about seven hundred acres, situate near Dublin depot in the county of Pulaski. That the petitioners are owners of three-fourths of said land, and are now and have been for several years, in the possession and enjoyment of the same. That Hall & Jordan who claim as judgment creditors of Reuben Sayers, have filed their bill in this court seeking to subject said land of the petitioners to satisfy their said judgment.

That Reuben Sayers has no title to said land, but the fee simple thereto is vested in the petitioners and said Deaderick and wife; and that the petitioners have not in any manner parted with or conveyed away the title to or interest in said land.

357 They are informed *that a commissioner of the court has filed with his report in the cause, a paper purporting to be the deed of your petitioners for their interest in said land to Reuben Sayers; and they aver that said paper is not their deed, and is wholly inoperative and void. The petitioners are therefore interested in the subject-matter of said suit, and ask that they be made parties defendants in the cause, and that their rights may be protected.

At the May term of the court the plaintiffs amended their bill, and made Deaderick and wife defendants in the suit. In their bill they say they have been informed that these persons claim an interest in the land in the original bill mentioned. Plaintiffs do not admit that they have any interest, and insist; that if they assert any right to the said land or any part thereof, they may be required to make full and satisfactory proof of their title.

At the August term of the court J. Howe Sayers, Comer & wife and Deaderick & wife, by leave of the court, filed their answers, to which the plaintiff replied generally. They aver that the land which the plaintiff seeks to subject to the payment of his debt, was in November 1855 conveyed by Reuben Sayers to his wife Eleanor A. Sayers, and the deed was immediately put upon record. That at that time Reuben Sayers owed very little, and retained property ample to pay his debts. That not more than fifty dollars of the plaintiff's debt was then due. That Mrs. Sayers died in 1864, leaving J. Howe Sayers, Mrs. Comer, Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Deaderick her children and heirs at law. That soon after the war the said heirs agreed to sell the land if $30,000 could be gotten for it; and A. C. Dunn was authorized to make the sale if he could do it at that price. That as the parties were 358 scattered, *it was agreed among them that they would make a deed conveying the land to Reuben Sayers, to be held by a third person as an escrow, to be delivered to Reuben Sayers when the sale was made, that he might convey the land to the purchaser, and thus prevent delay, and remove any cloud upon the title from the fact that Reuben Sayers had conveyed the land directly to his wife. That accordingly a deed was prepared and was executed by J. Howe Sayers, Comer & wife and Dunn & wife; and it was expected that Lizzie, the youngest child who was not quite of age, would execute a like deed on her coming of age. That the deed when executed, was intended to be deposited with Isaac Hudson, their attorney; but remained with the justice who took the acknowledgment of the parties; and Lizzie, on coming of age, declining to execute a deed, and Dunn having failed to sell the land, defendants regarded the deed as of no effect, and supposed it had been destroyed, as instructions to that effect had been given to said attorney. That said deed never was delivered to Reuben Sayers, but remained with the justice who took the acknowledgment of the parties, until about the commencement of this suit, when the plaintiff Wall, with a full knowledge of these facts, obtained said deed from the said justice by paying him his price therefor, and then procured the recordation of the same by affixing the necessary U. S. revenue stamps, and paying the clerk his recording fee and the state tax.

The answer of Deaderick and wife is to the same effect, except as to the deed executed by the other defendants: They were no parties to that deed.

The deed from Reuben Sayers to his wife is as follows: This deed made this the 15th day of November in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, *between Reuben Sayers and Eleanor Ann Sayers, his wife: Witnesseth, that whereas the said Reuben Sayers intending shortly to visit the Western country, and knowing the uncertainty of life, and to provide a permanent home and a future residence for his family, in case he should not be permitted to return in safety home, and seeking to provide against confusion at all events, now this indenture witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the premises, and for the natural love and affection he has for his wife, the said Reuben Sayers doth grant unto the said Eleanor Ann Sayers his entire real estate lying in the county of Pulaski, his present residence, containing seven hundred acres, more or less. Witness the following signature and seal.

Reuben Sayers, [Seal.]

This deed was acknowledged by Reuben Sayers in the clerk's office, on the 21st day of November 1855, and admitted to record.

The deed from Comer & wife and others to Reuben Sayers bears date 22d of November 1867, and says, in consideration of the natural love and affection they have for their father, the said Reuben Sayers, they do grant unto the said Reuben Sayers all their right, title and interest whatsoever, both at law and in equity, to all the land embraced in and conveyed by a deed executed by the said Reuben Sayers to his wife Eleanor A. Sayers on the 15th of November 1855; and the same grantors release all their claims as heirs at law of the said Eleanor A. Sayers to the said grantee, to the said land.

This deed was acknowledged before a justice by Comer and J. Howe Sayers on the day of its date, and by Mrs.

Comer before two justices on the 360 same *day, and it was acknowledged by Dunn before the same justices on the — day of February 1868, and by Mrs. Dunn on the 2d of May 1868. And it was presented in the clerk's office on the 27th of April 1871, and admitted to record on that day.

The evidence shows very clearly, that at the date of the deed from Reuben Sayers to his wife, all the debts he owed did not amount to one hundred dollars, and that he then owned personal property, including eight valuable negroes, worth from ten to twelve thousand dollars. He continued to live on the land, with his wife and children, doing apparently a prosperous business; and at the end of the war he owned thirteen slaves, which were then lost to him. This evidence is sufficiently stated by Judge Anderson in his opinion.

It also clearly appeared from the evidence that the deed from Comer and wife, Dunn, and wife, and J. Howe Sayers, to Reuben Sayers, was made for the purposes stated in their answer; that it had never been delivered to Reuben Sayers, but had been retained by the justice who took the acknowledgments of the grantors until his fees should be paid, and that Wall, the plaintiff, obtained it from him by paying the fees, without authority from any party to the deed, and that he had it put to record.

The commissioner to whom the case was referred made his report in February 1872, in which he stated the judgments against Reuben Sayers as amounting to, of principal $5,028.38, of interest up to the 1st of February 1872 $3,275.35, costs, $68.28, equal to $8,372.01. The interest on all of these debts commenced after the date and record of the deed from Reuben Sayers to his wife.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 8th day of January 1873, when the 361 court decreed that the *deed from Reuben Sayers to his wife was fraudulent and void as to his creditors; and it appearing from the evidence that the judgments, which were liens upon the land, could not be paid out of the rents in five years, it was further decreed that unless Reuben Sayers, or some one for him, should pay off said debts before the 1st day of the next February, a commissioner named, after advertising, &c., should proceed to sell at public auction upon the premises the said land, or so much thereof as would be sufficient to pay off said debts, &c., upon a credit of one, two and three years, in equal instalments, except as to a sum sufficient to pay the costs of suit and expenses of sale, which should be for cash. From this decree Comer and wife and the other heirs of Mrs. Sayers obtained an appeal to the Circuit court of Pulaski county, where the said decree was affirmed; and they then obtained an appeal to this court.

Wade and J. A. Campbell, for the appellants.

This is a bill to subject land to the payment of debts.

1. Nothing is said in the bill about the conveyance from Sayers to his wife, and no charge of fraud is made; but by the decree said conveyance is adjudged to be fraudulent and void, and is set aside and made void. Fraud must be charged specifically. Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 380.

2. The decree is not warranted by the bill. Fowler & wife v. Saunders, 4 Call 361; Sheppard's ex'or v. Starke & wife, 3 Munf. 29 and 40.

The plaintiff will not be permitted to prove, or require proof of, any fact not set forth in his bill. 1 Dan'l Ch. Pra. 424; Sto. Eq. Pl., sections 27, 28 and 257; Crockett v. Lee, 7 Wheat. R. 522.

362 *The admissions in the answer cannot supply the want of a specific averment in the bill. Jackson v. Ashton, 11 Pet. R. 229, 248.

3. The facts disclosed by the record did not warrant the court in subjecting the lands of appellants to the payment of R. Sayers' debts. He was free from debt when he executed the deed to his wife, and had the right to determine upon the reasonableness and propriety of such settlement. See Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. R. 229; Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. R. 181; Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. R. 440; Townsend v. Maynard, 45 Penn. R. 198.

Subsequent creditors will not be allowed to defeat a settlement made on the wife. Cord on the L. and Eq. Rights of Married Women, sections 54 and 75; Schouler on D. R., page 277, and note on 283.

4. The deed from Sayers to his wife, although void at law, is good in a court of equity. Jones & wife v. Obenchain, 10 Gratt. 259; Fox v. Jones, 1 West Virginia R. 205; Mews v. Mews, 21 L. and Eq. R.

(Eng.) 556; Hunt v. Johnston, 4 Amer. R. 632; Sims v. Rickets, supra; Peck v. Brown, 2 Rob. R. (N. Y.) 120.

It is an executed and not an executory contract. Hunt v. Johnson, supra.

The meritorious consideration set out in the deed is sufficient to support it where there are no existing creditors. 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 228 and 230; Sheppard v. Sheppard, 7 John. Ch. R. 57; Darlington v. McCooie, 1 Leigh 36; Hunt v. Johnston, and Jones v. Obenchain.

5. The intervention of a trustee is not indispensable. The husband will be treated as a trustee, for his wife. Bishop on Husband & Wife, sections 117 and 800; 1 Perry on Trusts, sections 95 and 240; 1 Lead.

Cases in Eq., pp. 307 and 309; Story's 363 Eq. Jus. 1380; Wallingsford v. Allen, 10 Pet. R. 583; Peck v. Brown, and Fox v. Jones, supra.

If Sayers could have conveyed his lands in trust for the benefit of his wife, by a deed which would have been valid in law under the circumstances, then his deed will be sustained in a court of equity. Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. R. 181, 183; Schouler on D. R., page 286.

If the deed is insufficient to pass the legal title, because of the relations which existed between the grantor and grantee, this defect should be aided by a court of equity. 1 Lead. Cases in Eq., 330 and 288.

6. A conveyance by husband to his wife creates a separate estate in favor of the wife. 1 Lead. Cases in Eq. 539, 540 and 541; Tyler on Inf. and Cov., pp. 491, 492 and 493; Hill on Trustees, 653, 654, and note; Sims v. Rickets, (supra).

7. The possession by the husband after the conveyance is no badge of fraud. Schouler on D. R., 283 note; 2 Perry on Trusts, page 277, section 678.

It is not pretended that the deed was made with any fraudulent intent, and there is nothing in the case which impeaches the fairness of the transaction, or raises a doubt as to good faith of the grantor in seeking to provide a permanent home for his family against the possible misfortunes of a future day.

Gilmore and Walker, for the appellees.

1. The deed in this cause is a conditional one, and the condition is a condition precedent. The grantor "returning in safety home," no estate ever vested in the grantee. 2 Bl. Comm. 154; Co. Litt. 217; 4 Kent's Comm. 125; 2 Rob. Prac. p. 59; 5 Rob. Prac. p. 679, and note.

2. If the deed be not a conditional 364 one, yet, being a *deed directly from husband to wife, it is void at law, and will only be enforced in a court of equity where it is made on valuable consideration or is a suitable provision for a wife or child; and where it is made as a suitable provision for a wife or child, the court of equity will not enforce the deed if the rights of creditors are interfered with. Sheppard v. Sheppard, 7 John. Ch. R. 57; White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 328; Winans v. Peebles, 332 N. Y. 423; Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. R. 224;

Jones & wife v. Obenchain, 10 Gratt. 269; Ellison v. Ellison, 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. p. 199; Spence's Eq. Juris. 852; Wright v. Wright, 1 Ves. Sr. R. 409.

3. The deed in this case is not a suitable provision for the wife. It gives to her all his real estate, worth, according to the testimony, $30,000. All the property retained by the grantor, according to his own testimony, did not exceed ten or twelve thousand dollars.

4. A court of equity will not enforce a deed from husband to wife if there is any unfairness in it. Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. R. 181; Thompson v. Mills, 39 Ind. R. 528.

5. The deed in this case hindered, delayed and defrauded creditors to the extent of the debts contracted prior to the date of the deed; and for that reason ought not to be upheld in a court of equity. The question in such a case is not whether the debtor retained property enough in his hands to pay his then debts, but the question is were those debts paid, and, if the debts were not paid, it is the same as if he had conveyed away all his property. Spirett v. Willons, 3 De Gex, Jones & Smith, p. 302; approved in Freeman v. Pope, Eng. Law. Rep. 9 Eq. Cases 206.

Anderson J. This controversy is in 365 relation to the *deed executed by Reuben Sayers to his wife, Eleanor Ann Sayers, on the 15th day of November 1855; whether the real estate conveyed by it vested in Mrs. Sayers, and descended to her children and heirs at her death; and whether they can hold it against subsequent creditors of Reuben Sayers.

Before proceeding with this inquiry, it will be well to dispose of a question raised by the record, whether the appellants, or any of them, have, by their deed, reinvested Reuben Sayers with any interest or estate, which he may have passed to his wife by said deed? No such reconveyance or release to Reuben Sayers is alleged by the plaintiffs in their pleadings. But a paper, purporting to be a deed of conveyance or release from three of the four heirs of Mrs. Sayers to Reuben Sayers, having been brought to the notice of the court by the master, and a certified copy of it from the records of the register's office exhibited with his report, it was very properly noticed by the appellants in their petitions to be made parties defendants and in their answers. They aver in their petitions, and in their answers, that said paper was never delivered as their deed. That it was never intended to be delivered as a deed, except only upon a certain contingency which never arose, and that it never was delivered. That one of the plaintiffs got possession of it from the magistrate before whom it had been acknowledged, without the knowledge or consent of either of them, or of Reuben Sayers, to whom it had not been delivered, by paying the magistrate's fees, who delivered it to him without authority. And that the plaintiff, after thus getting unlawful possession of it, without authority, and without their or Reuben Sayers' knowledge or consent, lodged it with the clerk to be recorded, and paid the tax on it and the clerk's fees for recording.

These allegations are fully sustained by evidence.

I am clearly of opinion that said paper cannot operate as a conveyance or release of anything to Reuben Sayers; and that if there was any estate vested in the appellants by the death of Mrs. Eleanor H. Sayers, under the conveyance of November 15th, 1855, it is not divested or impaired by that paper.

I proceed now to inquire, whether any rights vested in Mrs. Sayers, under the said conveyance of her husband, which have descended to her children, and which are not liable to the judgments of subsequent creditors of the grantor against him? This is the important, the main question in the cause.

"There is nothing inequitable or unjust (Mr. Justice Story remarks) in a man's making a voluntary conveyance or gift, either to a wife or to a child, or even to a stranger, if it is not at the time prejudicial to the rights of any other persons, or in furtherance of any meditated design of future fraud or injury to other persons." Stor. Eq. Jur., § 356.

In Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. R. 229, Marshall, Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, assumes that the conveyance in that case "must be considered as a voluntary settlement made on his wife by a man who was indebted at the time." And he inquires, "Can it be sustained against subsequent creditors?" In his answer to that question he says: "It would seem to be a consequence of that absolute power which a man possesses over his own property, that he may make any disposition of it which does not interfere with the existing rights of others; and such disposition, if it be fair and real, will be valid. 'In these few words, that great judge enunciates a principle, upon which all cases of this class may be determined, and upon which their decision may rest.

It is the absolute right of a man to dispose of his own property as he pleases, so that he does no injury to the existing rights of others. The question is, in every case, did the voluntary conveyance interfere with the existing rights of others? If it did not, and was real and bona fide, the grantor having an absolute right to part with his own property, and to bestow it on whom he pleases, his conveyance is valid. There are none who can gainsay it. By his deed of conveyance his grantee is absolutely invested with the title; and the subsequent dealings of the grantor with others, or the liabilities which he may subsequently come under to others, cannot impair or affect the rights which had vested in his grantee. The property which vested in his grantee by a fair and bona fide conveyance, is no longer his, and cannot be made liable for his debts subsequently contracted.

"The limitations to this power (the Chief Justice further says) are those only which are prescribed by law." He then proceeds to consider the statute against fraudulent conveyances. "In construing this statute (he says) the courts have considered every conveyance, not made on consideration deemed valuable in law, as void against previous creditors. With regard to subsequent creditors the application of this statute appears to have admitted of some doubt." After a lucid and extensive review of the cases, he thus concludes: "From these cases it appears that the construction of this statute is completely settled in England. We believe that the same construction has been maintained in the United States. A voluntary settlement in favor of a wife and children is not to be impeached by subsequent creditors on the ground of its being voluntary." I think, in this conclusion, he is sustained by the current of decisions in England and America.

But it may be impeached on the ground that it is fraudulent. The plaintiffs do not charge fraud in their original or amended bill. They take no notice of this deed of conveyance in any way. They altogether ignore it, although they had actual knowledge of its existence before they brought this suit. They did not bring the suit until after they got possession of the paper purporting to be the deed of three of the children and heirs of Eleanor A. Sayers to Reuben Sayers. Mr. Cecil, the justice, testifies that they got possession of it in the spring of 1871, and he thinks before the 1st of June 1871, the date of the institution of this suit; and the certificate of its recordation is dated 27th April 1871. They must have had possession of it prior to that date. This paper refers expressly to the deed from Reuben Sayers, to his wife Eleanor A. Sayers, of the 15th of November 1855, and purports to release all their claims as heirs at law of said Eleanor. The plaintiffs certainly had actual knowledge of the existence of the said deed at that time, if they had not before. The presumption is, they had knowledge of it before. There was no concealment of it. It was written by the clerk, the printed copy states, on the 15th of November. On the 21st of November it was acknowledged before him in his office after it had been delivered to Mrs. Sayers, and was admitted to record. No doubt it was a subject of remark, and was known generally by his neighbors. But the registration was constructive notice to the world, and the presumption is, that these plaintiffs were apprized of it when they afterwards credited him. The only allegation of fraud is made by Hudson, administrator of Hamilton Sayers, in his petition for a rehearing. Yet the final decree for the sale of the lands is founded only upon the ground that the conveyance is fraudulent and void as to creditors. If fraud had been alleged in the pleadings, (and it might have been by an amended bill or by answer to the appellant's petitions to be admitted defendants, if the plaintiffs believed there was any ground for the allegation,) what proof is there to support such a charge, or the assumption of the decree? Mr. Justice Story adds to what I have heretofore quoted from him, and in the same section: "If, indeed, there is any design of fraud or collusion, or intent to deceive third persons in such conveyances, although the party be not then indebted, the conveyance will be held entirely void as to subsequent as well as to present creditors; for it is not bona fide." Cord's Legal and Equitable rights of Married Women, § 54, 75, citing Ld. Townsend v. Windham, 2 Ves. Sen. R. 1; 12 Ves. R. 155. Let the rule, as thus clearly laid down, be applied to the case in hand.

At the date of said deed, Reuben Sayers, the grantor, was the owner of a large personal property, in addition to the real estate he conveyed to his wife, consisting of slaves, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, wagons, farming implements, house furniture, &c., of the value of from ten to twelve thousand dollars. His indebtedness did not exceed $100. After the execution of said deed, he continued to live upon the farm, and had the management of it, supporting his wife, and educating and maintaining their children. He purchased and paid for another tract of land, which he sold again. He dealt liberally in cattle, buying and selling, which seems to have been a source of considerable income; he seems to have been a man of 370 thrift and good credit, and his personal estate was augmented *rather than diminished, until the end of the war. The trifling debt he owed prior to the execution of the deed in question, seems to have been satisfied, and the debts which he now owes, and which are proved in this cause, were contracted by him subsequent to said conveyance. The precise date at which they were severally contracted does not appear, but none of them earlier than 1857 or the latter part of 1856, except two small notes amounting to about $51, which he owed prior to the conveyance, and which were transferred to the plaintiffs, it does not appear when. These notes were incorporated with the debt, subsequently contracted with the debt, subsequently contracted with Wall & Jordan, and embraced in the new obligation, which they took for the whole—upon which he afterwards paid, as appears from the judgment, $75. Whether he had made any payment to those parties upon his indebtedness to them, before the execution of the bond or note upon which the judgment was rendered, does not appear. I think, whether the evidence shows the novation of that small pre-existing debt, or not, it may be assumed, so far as it concerns the question now involved, that it has been satisfied. And I think it may be fairly inferred from the evidence in the record, that there was not a point of time, from the 15th of November 1855 until the close of the war, that a moiety of the personal estate owned by Reuben Sayers, would not have been ample, and more than sufficient, to have paid every debt he owed in the world. The conduct of his creditors shows that they regarded it ample to secure them. It was upon the faith of that they credited him, and forbore to collect their debts—for they must be presumed to have known that the real estate did not belong to him, but was the property of his wife. (It does not appear that they thought of suing *until after they got possession of the suppose deed of release.) And we have seen that his personal estate was ample to give him the credit he had.

What fraudulent motive could he have had to make said conveyance to his wife? He still retained ample property in his own hands to satisfy all the debts which he actually subsequently contracted. It could not, therefore, have been in anticipation of contracting those debts and avoiding the payment of them that he conveyed his real estate to his wife; for they had ample property left to satisfy them. The same fact is a complete answer to the argument of appellee's counsel, that he made the conveyance in contemplation of incurring a debt of $3,000 for the building of a residence on the farm. Why would he have made a conveyance for such a purpose, when he knew that he retained property out of which the cost of the building he contemplated erecting could be made, if it were even threefold or fourfold the actual cost. I am satisfied from the proofs in the cause, that Reuben Sayers, in contracting the subsequent debts, was conscious of his ability to pay them, and had no thought or purpose of not paying them; and that his creditors credited him, and forebore with him, upon the faith of his personal property, which was ample to pay his debts; and that he and they were disappointed by the result of the war, which wrested from him, by the power of the sword, the property which he relied on in the main as affording him the means of paying his debts, and upon the faith of which his creditors credited him. It does not appear that he was sued by any creditor before the close of the war. If all of them had sued and obtained judgments before its termination, he had ample property to have satisfied every dollar he owed; and 372 *if their debts are lost, it is the misfortune of both, rather than the wrong of either.

But it was argued by appellee's counsel, that the conveyance of the whole of his real estate to his wife—so large a proportion of all he was worth—is a badge of fraud. The same argument was urged in Sexton v. Wheaton. It was contended that the house and lot contained in the deed to his wife was the bulk of Wheaton's estate. The chief justice said: "If the fact were proved, it does not follow that the conveyance must be fraudulent. If a man, entirely unincumbered, has a right to make a voluntary settlement of a part of his estate, it is difficult to say how much of it he may settle. In Stephens v. Olive, 2 Bro. Ch. R. 90, the whole real estate appears to have been settled, subject to a mortgage of a debt of $500; but that settlement was sustained. * * A man who makes such a conveyance necessarily impairs his credit (unless he has large personal property, as in this case); and, if openly done, warns those with whom he deals not to trust him too far; but this is not fraud." Nor is the possession by the husband after the conveyance a badge of fraud. Schouler D. R. 283, note; 2 Perry on Trusts p. 277, § 678. I can see no evidence of fraud in this case. On the contrary, I think the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in the record show that Reuben Sayers, in executing the conveyance to his wife, of the 15th of November 1855, acted fairly and in good faith, and that there is no ground even for the suspicion of fraud.

The question now arises as to the validity of the deed to vest the real estate in Eleanor A. Sayers. It is a conveyance directly from a husband to his wife. It seems to be well settled that at law it has no validity, 373 *because of the legal unity between husband and wife, the latter having no legal existence separate from her husband. As a consequence of this old common law doctrine, it is held by courts of law, that a deed directly from a husband to his wife must be inoperative and void; whilst if it had been made to a third person, for the benefit and separate use of the wife, the same courts hold that it is valid, and vests the beneficial estate in the wife. Equity, which looks more to the substance than the form, holds that the conveyance directly from the husband to the wife, if fair and free from the taint of fraud, is just as valid as if the conveyance had been made to a trustee for the benefit of the wife. Equity will interpose a trustee to hold the estate for the benefit of the wife, or will treat the husband as a trustee for the wife, and will give the same effect to the conveyance, as if it had been made to a third person, for the sole and separate use of the wife. Huber v. Huber's adm'ors, 10 Ohio R. 371; Wallingsford v. Allen, 10 Peters R. 583; 24 Verm. R. 375; Deming v. Williams, 26 Conn. R. 226; Putnam v. Bickwell, 18 Wis. R. 333; Sims v. Rickets, 9 Amer. Rep. 681; Shepard v. Shepard, 7 John. C. R. 57; Jones & wife v. Obenchain & als., 10 Gratt. 259. These cases fully sustain the doctrine as I have laid it down. In Deming v. Williams, 26 Conn., supra, the judge, in a very lucid opinion, says the cases found in the books from Slanning v. Style, decided in 1734, 3 P. W'ms 334, to the present time, sustain the principle, "that so far as the form and substance of the gift or alienation are important, that which would be good if made to a third person, is good in a court of equity if made by the husband to his wife." That is sensible.

In the same case it was held, that in order to give the wife a separate use, words 374 indicating such intention *are necessary in a conveyance from a stranger to the wife; but that it seemed to be "well settled that they are not necessary in a conveyance direct from the husband to the wife. The law attaches to absolute deeds, and transfers (says the court) a full alienation of the entire interest or property, so far as the alienation is permitted by the principles of law and equity." Whitten v. Whitten, 3 Cush. R. 191, supports the same doctrine. It is treated as the settled doctrine; and, according to this authority, the deed from Reuben Sayers to his wife, if absolute, vested in his wife a separate estate, though such words are not used; and consequently he is not entitled to curtesy.

As a corollary of the foregoing, whilst as held by the courts of law, the deed of the 15th of November 1855 passed nothing from Reuben Sayers to his wife, and divested from him nothing of his title; by the rules and principles of equity, if the deed, according to its intent and effect, is absolute, it immediately divested the grantor of all title in his own right, legal or equitable, in the property conveyed, and vested an absolute separate estate in it in his wife. The legal, as well as the equitable estate, was vested in her by the terms of the deed, which could not take effect by reason of the legal fiction, that the wife and the husband are one, and she can have no legal existence separate from him; but equity regards the title of the husband in his own right as having passed from him to the wife, vesting in her a separate estate, in which the husband has no interest in his own right, legal or equitable. And courts of equity will exert their powers when necessary, and in a proper care, to give full effect to such conveyances. In order to give the deed of conveyance in question such effect, nothing further is necessary to be done by the grantor. He signed, sealed and delivered 375 *the deed, and acknowledged it to be his act and deed in the mode prescribed by law; and the same has been registered according to the requirements of the statute. Nothing farther is necessary to be done by the husband, or can be done by him, in order to complete and perfect the conveyance. As done, upon the principles and doctrines of equity, the title of the husband is divested, and is vested in the wife, and that, I take it, without any action by a court of equity. Thus, though there had been no action by the court of equity, an absolute separate estate was vested in Eleanor A. Sayers, upon the principles and doctrines of equity, immediately upon the execution of said conveyance. She remained invested with such separate estate until her death, when it descended to her children, just as if it had been an estate recognized at law. And now when it is sought to divest that estate from them, and subject it to the payment of the subsequent debts of the grantor, though courts of law will not recognize the conveyance made to her, under whom they claim, it being a valid conveyance upon the principles of equity, it is competent for them to invoke the aid of equity, to give effect to the deed, and to protect them in their rights; and it is proper for them to invoke that protection in this suit, which seeks, by a court of equity, to subject their property to the payment of the grantor's debts.

It was contended for the appellees, that the appellants were not properly before the court, and ought not to be allowed to assert their claims in this suit: or at least they could only do so, by a cross-bill. James Deaderick and his wife were made defendants by the amended bill, and the other appellants were made defendants upon their petitions, and had leave to file their answers, without objection by the appellees.

376 I *am not sure that they were not necessary parties. They were in the actual enjoyment of the subject-matter of the suit, and had an interest in it which was likely to be defeated or diminished by the plaintiffs' claim; and had an immediate interest in resisting the plaintiffs' demand; and all persons who have such immediate interests are necessary parties to the suit. 1 Daniel's Chy. Plead. & Prac., chap. 5, § 2, p. 246. It is the constant aim of courts of equity to do complete justice, by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit, that further litigation may be prevented. And courts of equity delight to do justice, and not by halves. Stor. Equ. Plead., § 72. If it is true, as contended by the learned counsel, the plaintiffs might have proceeded to enforce their judgment liens, ignoring the appellants' claim of title, subjected the property to sale, and proceeded by ejectment at law to dispossess the appellants, in which they must have succeeded, as the appellants could not have asserted their title in a court of law, and that the decree in this suit for the sale would not be binding on them if they were not parties, the appellants would thereby have been driven to the necessity of bringing a suit in equity to injoin the plaintiffs, and to assert their rights, which might have been litigated and determined in this suit. Why thus multiply suits? The plaintiffs were proceeding in a court of equity to enforce their judgment liens against lands which they knew the appellants claimed to be their property, and denied to be chargeable with their judgments; that their defence could only be made in a court of equity, and that complete justice could be done in this suit, by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit. It seems to me they ought to have been made

377 *parties. How could there have been a fair sale of the lands to satisfy their judgments until the rights of the appellants were determined? They would have of course asserted their claim, and forbid the sale, and who would have felt safe in purchasing until the validity of their claim was determined? It was necessary to make them parties in order to remove a cloud which rested on the title, before a decree for the sale. I am inclined to think they were necessary parties in this suit. But it is not necessary to decide that question now, as they have been made parties, and in many cases a person may be made a party though he is not an indispensable party. Story's Eq. Plead., § 153. In this case they were made parties on their motion, and I think properly so. And although it perhaps would have been more proper to have asserted their claim by cross-bill, I think their claim was a defence to the proceeding by the plaintiffs, and might be made by answer, in which the affirmative matter of defence was set out. But their petition might be treated as a cross-bill. It seems that they were properly before the court, and that the case was before the court, by admitting them parties defendant, in such form as to enable it to decide and settle the rights of all parties interested in the subject, and to do complete justice, and prevent a multiplicity of suits.

But it is contended for the appellees, that a court of equity will not give effect to a conveyance from husband to wife against creditors, though subsequent to the conveyance, upon any consideration which is not valuable. I can perceive no good reason why subsequent creditors should have any superior equity to that of the heir of the grantor, where he had given the property to a second wife, who was not the mother of the heir claiming it. If his deed of 378 gift divested *him of the lands and vested them in another, and the transaction was open and fair and untainted with fraud, the property ceased to be his from the date of the conveyance, and became the property of his wife, to her separate use; and I cannot perceive what equity his subsequent creditors would have, who credited him upon the faith of his own property, to charge his wife's property with the payment of his debts. "It is true," Mr. Justice Story says, "that in regard to the defective execution of powers, &c., courts of equity do not always interfere and grant relief, but grant it only in favor of persons in a moral sense entitled to the same, and viewed with peculiar favor, and where there are no opposing equities on the other side." (1 Stor. Eq. Juris. § 95, cited by appellee's counsel in brief.) Here the author says, the relief will be granted in favor of a person who is in a moral sense entitled to the same; and none are more so than a wife or children. But the author adds, "where there are no opposing equities on the other side." I have said that I cannot perceive the ground of an equity in the subsequent creditor to charge the wife's separate estate with the debt of her husband, for which he obtained credit upon the faith of his own property. I think the circumstances of this case, which I have already detailed, are peculiarly strong against any such claim on the part of these creditors of the husband. Having by their forbearance lost their debts, in consequence of their debtor's losing his property by the result of the war, upon the faith of which their debts were contracted, it seems to me they would have no equity to charge the property of the wife, which was openly and fairly settled upon her as her separate estate long before those debts were contracted. So that in this case there are no opposing equities; and

379 *the authority cited seems to be strongly in support of the interference of a court of equity to give the aid sought. But will a court of equity give effect to the conveyance which is founded not upon valuable, but only meritorious consideration, in favor of a wife or children? Upon this point I will refer to Stor. Eq. Jur., § 169, where he expressly states the assistance will be given to a person standing upon a valuable or meritorious consideration. The authorities upon this point are somewhat conflicting, and as this opinion is already too much extended, I will not undertake to review them, but will content myself with a reference to the opinion of Allen, Judge, in Jones & wife v. Obenchain & als., 10 Gratt. 261, in which he reviews the decisions on the subject. It was held by Judge Allen, and all the judges concurred in his opinion—that where there was a meritorious consideration, meaning thereby a provision for a wife or child, equity would enforce a defective conveyance. In support of that opinion he cites Shepard v. Shepard, 7 John. Ch. R.; and Kekewich v. Manning, 12 Eng. L. & E. R. 120. He refers to the opinions of Lord Thurlow and Lord Eldon as favoring the doctrine, and the remarks of Brooke, J., in Darlington v. McCoole, 1 Leigh 36. He cites two decisions by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, and the remarks of Chief Justice Gibson in Dennison v. Gochring, 4 Barr Pa. R. 175. He also cites and relies on the opinion of Lord Chancellor Sugden in Ellis v. Nimmo; and reviews the decisions, which it is said overrules that decision of the Lord Chancellor, which he was of opinion were decided on other grounds. But suppose he had regarded those subsequent cases as overruling Nimmo & Ellis, would it have changed his opinion and the decision of this court in Jones v. Obenchain? I can hardly think it would. The opinion of Lord Chancellor Sugden was not, nor were the decisions of the courts of Great Britain, authority with this court; but the Lord Chancellor's opinion was regarded with the consideration that its intrinsic merit and the respect due to his great learning entitled it to receive. And the cases which are said to have overruled him were before this court and reviewed by Judge Allen, and did not change the decision. I must regard that case therefore as a decision of this question by the Court of Appeals of Virginia in which all the judges concurred, and am not disposed to disturb it, whether Nimmo & Ellis has been overruled or not. And I find it is sustained by other American decisions, which are entitled to very great respect. I will only refer to a recent decision of the Court of Appeals of Indiana, in Sims v. Rickets, supra, which I think is in point.

It remains now only to inquire whether the deed in question is a real bona fide conveyance, and whether it is absolute or only conditional. We have seen that it was fair and unassailable even upon the suspicion of fraud as to the creditors of the grantor or other persons: was it a real and bona fide conveyance as between the husband and wife? The terms of the deed, and the deliberation and solemnity of the act, the lapse of time for reflection from the writing of the deed until its acknowledgment and recordation, the continued acquiescence of the husband during the lifetime of his wife, for a period of nearly ten years after the execution of the deed, without even an attempt to obtain a release from her (which may be regarded as a confirmation of the conveyance to her), leave no room for doubt that the transaction was real and bona fide between them, and was intended to divest the grantor of his title, and to vest it in his wife, according to the terms of the deed. Is the conveyance absolute, or only conditional?

This inquiry can only be answered by recurring to the instrument itself. It recites, "that whereas the said Reuben Sayers, intending shortly to visit the western country, and knowing the uncertainty of life, and to provide a permanent home and a future residence for his family, in case he should not be permitted to return in safety home, and seeking to provide against confusion at all events, now this indenture witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the premises, and for the natural love and affection he has for his wife, the said Reuben Sayers doth grant unto the said Eleanor Ann Sayers his entire real estate lying in the county of Pulaski, his present residence, containing seven hundred acres, more or less. Witness the following signature and seal." Signed, "Reuben Sayers. Seal."

There are two considerations set out in this deed, which moved the grantor to its execution: first, the providing a permanent home and future residence for his family; second, the love and affection he had for his wife.

Let it be conceded that one consideration of the conveyance was to provide a home for his family in case he did not safely return from the western country, which he expected shortly to visit. If he did return safely, then the conveyance was unnecessary to provide a home for his family on that contingency. But when he executed the deed he did not know that it would so happen, and in consideration of the uncertainty of his safe return he makes an absolute conveyance to his wife. It is not a conveyance to take effect only upon condition that he does not safely return. But the contingency that he may not return is the consideration which moves him to make the conveyance. Is that a conditional conveyance? I think not. The title has passed from him by his own act, upon a consideration which is in part contingent. And the contingency not happening the deed is not void; for it was not made to depend upon the happening of that contingency. It was just because of the uncertainty, the possibility that it might happen, he made an absolute conveyance to his wife.

But the consideration of the conveyance was not merely to provide a home for his family in case he had not a safe return. If he had stopped then it might have been so understood. But seeking to remove all confusion (uncertainty) on that point, he adds, "and" "at all events." That is, as I understand it to comprehend, whether he visited the western country and was not permitted safely to return or not—whether he lived or died, “at all events” he would make the conveyance. And his indenture witnessed that for and in consideration of the premises, and for the love and affection he had for his wife, he granted to her the land in controversy. This latter was a sufficient consideration to support the deed, even if the contingent consideration had failed. Skipwith v. Cabell, 19 Gratt. How could he claim a defeasance? I think it is an absolute conveyance, and not conditional. Upon the whole I am of opinion to reverse the decree of the court below, and to enter here such decree as ought to have been entered by the Circuit court, reversing the decree of the County court, and dismissing the plaintiffs’ bill with costs.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Anderson J.

The decree was as follows:

383 *This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the said decree and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the said Circuit court erred in affirming the said decree of the said County court, instead of reversing the same and dismissing the bill in this cause, as it should have done. Therefore, it is decreed and ordered, that for the said error the said decree of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the appellees pay to the appellants their costs by them about the prosecution of their appeal here expended: and this court proceeding to render such decree in the premises as the Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is further decreed and ordered, that the said decree of the said County court be also reversed and annulled, and that the appellees pay to the appellants their costs by them in this cause expended as well in the said County court as in the said Circuit court.

Decree reversed.

I. Wills—Parol Trusts Contrary to.—S and his wife P had no children, and it was understood and agreed between them that the survivor should have all his property during the life of the survivor, and at his or her death it should be equally divided between his and her heirs and next of kin. S made his will, by which he gave all his property, real and personal, to his wife P absolutely. He died in her lifetime, and she was so shocked at his death, that she was immediately paralyzed, and remained unconscious, until she died the day after he did. She died without having made a will. HELD:

2. Same—Same—Same.—In the absence of fraud on the part of a legatee, a court of equity will not enforce a parol charge upon his legacy.

3. Same—Written Trusts—Effect.—If it appeared from the evidence in the case, that S intended P should have entire control of the whole property during her life, and use as much of it as she chose to use, and that only what remained of it at her death was to be divided between his and her heirs and next of kin, the trust would not be enforced even if it had been in writing.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Smyth county, and afterwards transferred to the Circuit court of Wythe, brought in May 1870 by John T. Sprinkle and others, the heirs at law and next of kin of Archibald B. Sprinkle, deceased, against Nathaniel Hayworth and others, the heirs at law and next of kin of Phoebe Sprinkle, deceased, late wife of Archibald *B.

Sprinkle, to set up and establish an alleged parol agreement between said Archibald B. Sprinkle and Phoebe his wife, that at the death of the survivor of the two, the property of said Archibald should be equally divided between his and her family.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 4th of March 1874, when the court held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything by reason of the matters set out in their bill; but retained the cause to have the rents collected, the property having been rented out under the order of the court during the progress of the cause. From this decree the plaintiffs obtained an appeal to this court. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

Gilmore and J. W. Johnston, for the appellees.

1st. This is simply on its face a bill to enforce a parol agreement between a man and his wife, and two agreements are set forth in bill. One is that he was to devise his whole estate to his wife, and that she at her death would divide the estate equally the Virginia Statute of Wills, see Borst v. Nalle, 28 Gratt. 436, and note; Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 584. As to whether a trust may be created by parol the dictum of JUDGE MONCURE in the principal case has been cited by the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals in Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 581; Murry v. Sell, 23 W. Va. 480; Titchnell v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 468.

between his family and her family; 386 the other is, that his wife was *to have all the property for life, and then it was to be equally divided between the two families, except that the children of Mahlon Sprinkle—one of the testator's brothers—were to have nothing.

Such a contract cannot be enforced in any court. If it could, this contract or agreement is not set forth in such certain and definite terms as is required by the courts. See Wright v. Puckett, 22 Gratt. 370; Pierce's heirs v. Catron's heirs, 23 Gratt. 589; and the authorities cited in the former case.

2d. In such a case parol testimony is not admissible to contradict the written will.

3d. To enable the appellants to avail themselves of parol testimony, fraud must be charged and proven. See McCormick v. Grogan, 4th English and Irish Appeals, 1869-'70, p. 82; Devenish v. Baines, Finch's Prec. in Chancery, case 3, p. 5; Browne on the Statute of Frauds, sec. 94.

4th. The declarations of the testator are not admissible in such a case. See Redfield on Wills, part 1, sec. 39, pl. 6, letter d, top of page 546-7; Ibid, sec. 38, pl. 39, p. 527, 528; Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, sections 289, 290.

5th. If the language of the agreement claimed had been inserted in the will itself, the court would not enforce it against the absolute devise to the wife. See Perry on Trusts, sec. 115, pp. 88-9; May v. Joynes, 20 Gratt. 692.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

On the 19th of November 1835, A. 387 B. Sprinkle, of *the county of Smyth, Virginia, intermarried with Phoebe Hayworth, of the county of Green, Tennessee. They lived together in great happiness during their whole married life, which lasted about thirty-five years, the whole of which was spent in the county of Smyth, and nearly all of it in the town of Marion, in that county. By their joint industry, frugality and economy, they amassed quite a large fortune; and never having had any children, it was their wish and intention, often expressed, that whatever of their property might be left unexpended and undisposed of at the death of the survivor of them, should be divided into moieties, one of which should go to the family or collateral heirs of the husband, and the other to the family or collateral heirs of the wife. The husband died on the 19th day of January 1870. The wife survived him, but only day or two, having died on the 21st of January 1870. She appears to have been in usual health at the time of his death; but was so shocked at that event, she almost at once became wholly paralyzed, and remained so, and generally unconscious, until her death. They were which bears date on the 29th day of January 1869, and was duly admitted to probate in buried in the same grave. He left a will, the County court of Smyth county on the 28th day of March 1870. The will contains three items. The first provides for the payment of his debts, if any. The second and third are in these words:

"Item 2d. I will and bequeath to my beloved wife, Phoebe, all my estate of which I may die possessed, both real and personal, of every description whatsoever, she having aided me in making all that I have. My desire is, that she shall own absolutely everything that I may die possessed of.

"Lastly. As my wife is hereby 388 made my heir and *sole devisee, I hereby constitute and appoint her the executrix of this my last will and testament, and desire that she shall not be required to give any official bond."

The wife died without leaving a will, not having been in a condition to make one in the short interval between his death and hers.

On the 20th day of April 1870, John T. Sprinkle and others, heirs at law and next of kin of the husband A. B. Sprinkle, brought this suit in the Circuit court of Smyth county, against Nathaniel Hayworth and others, heirs at law and next of kin of the wife Phoebe Sprinkle, for the purpose of setting up and enforcing an alleged parol understanding and agreement between the said husband and wife, for the equal division of the estate of the husband, left at the death of the wife, between their two families as aforesaid. In their bill the plaintiffs set out the particulars of their claim.

Some of the defendants filed their answers to the bill; in which they denied that there was any such understanding and agreement between said Sprinkle and wife in regard to the disposition of the property owned by said Sprinkle, as was claimed in the bill; and the said defendants claimed that they and the other heirs at law and next of kin of the said wife held and were entitled to hold the said property as such heirs at law and next of kin.

Sundry depositions were taken in the suit on both sides; and on the 4th day of March 1874 the cause came on to be heard upon the bill of complainants, the demurrer (which had been filed), and answer of N. Hayworth and others, the replication thereto, the exhibits filed, and the depositions of witnesses; and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the *court overruled the 389 demurrer; and proceeding to decide the cause on its merits, decreed that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything by reason of the matters set forth in their bill, and would then have dismissed the bill; but it appearing that the property had been rented out under the order of court, and that the transaction on that account remained unsettled, the cause was retained for the purpose of such settlement.

The plaintiffs applied to a judge of this court for an appeal and supersedeas to the said decree; which were accordingly allowed and awarded. And that is the case which we now have to dispose of.

There never was a will more plainly written, or one on the face of which there was less room for doubt or difficulty in the construction of it, than the one we now have before us. The language of the second clause, as before stated, is: "I will and bequeath to my beloved wife Phoebe all my estate, of which I may die possessed, both real and personal, of every description whatsoever, she having aided me in making all that I have. My desire and will is, that she shall own, absolutely, everything that I may die possessed of." Could language be more comprehensive or emphatic to invest the wife with the largest possible interest in, and power over, the estate of the husband? But to make it still more plain, if possible, the testator proceeds in the last clause to say: "As my wife is hereby made my heir and sole devisee, I hereby constitute and appoint her the executrix of this my last will and testament, and desire that she shall not be required to give any official bond."

And yet, plain as is this written will, the plaintiffs contend that it ought not to be carried into effect as it is written; that there was a parol understanding and 390 *agreement between the husband and wife, in virtue of which the plaintiffs, his heirs at law and next of kin, are entitled to one moiety of the estate left at her death.

There could be no valid and binding agreement between husband and wife, as she was not a competent contracting party. Suppose there was in fact such an understanding between them as the plaintiffs contend for, could effect be given to it, contrary to the plain and express language of the written will?

To give it such effect, would seem to be clearly inadmissible for several reasons: First, because by the common law it is a general rule that a written instrument cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence; and there is nothing in this case to make it an exception to the general rule. Secondly, because such an effect would be contrary to the spirit and true intent and meaning of the statute of frauds. Code, p. 985, ch. 140, section 1. And thirdly, because it would be contrary to the statute of wills. Code, p. 887, ch. 112, section 1; Id., p. 910, ch. 118, section 4, which declares, that "no will shall be valid unless it be in writing, and signed by the testator, or some other person in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature; and moreover, unless it be wholly written by the testator, the signature shall be made, or the will acknowledged, by him in the presence of at least two competent witnesses, present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator; but no form of attestation shall be necessary"—And section 8, which declares, that "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked, unless under the preceding section

(in regard to revocation by marriage,) 391 or by a subsequent will or *codicil, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is required to be executed; or by the testator, or some person in his presence and by his direction, cutting, tearing, burning, obliterating, canceling or destroying the same, or the signature thereto, with the intent to revoke." It would be strange if, after all this care taken by the legislature to prevent fraud in the making and revocation of wills, a will, solemnly made, in strict and literal pursuance of all the requisitions of the statute, could be annulled and destroyed by loose declarations of the testator, testified to chiefly by interested parties.

A great deal was said in the argument about the omission in our statute of the seventh section of the English statute of frauds, which declares, that all declarations or creations of trust and confidence of any lands, &c., shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party, &c.; and it was argued that, while under the English statute, such a trust as is attempted to be set up in this case would be invalid, it is valid in this state for the reason aforesaid.

Certainly a resulting trust is not even within the English statute of frauds, and, of course, is not within ours. Indeed, the eighth section of the English statute, which is also omitted in ours, expressly excludes resulting trusts from the operation of the statute. The case of the Bank of the United States v. Carrington &c., 7 Leigh 566, referred to in the argument, was a case of resulting trust. There are other trusts not strictly coming under the denomination of resulting trusts, which are not within the statute. Tucker, P. enumerates many of them in his opinion in the case just cited; and in 1 Lomax's Dig., top page 233, all these trusts are considered under the 392 denomination *of "implied, resulting and constructive trusts." For peculiar reasons they are excluded from the operation of the statute.

But without attempting to define these several trusts, or to give the reason why they are not embraced within the statute of frauds, or to state the effect, if any, of the omission in our statute of the 7th section of the English statute of frauds, we think we can safely say that under our statute of frauds, if there were no other statute or law to prevent it, such a parol understanding or agreement as is set up in the bill, however well proved it may have been, would be insufficient to contradict or invalidate a will so plainly written as the will in this case. It could not have that effect as a parol declaration or creation of trust, for to give it that effect would be to subvert the statute. The most solemn wills and deeds could then be annulled by loose parol declarations under the name of trust. The danger of admitting such declarations, for such a purpose, was demonstrated in Cox, &c., v. Cox, decided by this court a few days ago. Even in the case of a resulting trust the proofs ought to be very clear if the trust does not arise on the face of the deed itself. Opinion of Brockenbrough, J., in the Bank of U. S. v. Carrington, &c., 7 Leigh 576, and the cases cited by him. We do not mean to admit, however, that there is any difference in effect between the English statute of frauds and ours arising from the omission in the latter of the seventh and eighth sections of the former. That is a question which is unnecessary, and not intended to be discussed in this case.

However that may be, we think the statute of wills, as before shown, plainly forbids that a parol will, whether in the form of a trust or otherwise, shall be set up and established, especially when there is a 393 written will to the contrary which has been executed and established in strict pursuance of the statute.

To be sure fraud may have the effect of setting aside a deed or will, or converting a grantee or devisee into a trustee for the benefit of others. "The fraud which suffices to lay a foundation for such a trust is not simply that fraud which is involved in every deliberate breach of contract. The true rule seems to be that there must have been an original misrepresentation, by means of which the legal title was obtained; an original intention to circumvent, and get a better bargain by the confidence reposed. Thus, as has been held in many cases, if a man procure a certain devise to be made to himself by representing to the testator that he will see it applied to the trust purposes contemplated by the latter, he will be held a trustee for those purposes." Brown on the Statute of Frauds, § 94. See also Gilbert's Forum Romanum, p. 328, 329. There is a very recent case of the very highest authority, in the English books, which was referred to in the argument of this case by the counsel for the appellees, and which very strongly illustrates the law on the branch of the subject we are now considering. We mean McCormick v. Grogar, decided by the House of Lords in 1869, and reported in the law reports, English and Irish Appeal Cases, vol. 4, p. 82. The court of appeal in Ireland had reversed a decretal order of the Lord Chancellor there, and the House of Lords affirmed the decision of the court of appeal. It does not appear that there was any dissent to that decision of the House of Lords. Lord Chancellor Hatherley and Lord Westbury delivered seriatim opinions in the case, and Lord Cairns expressed his entire concurrence in their opinions. We will have occa-394 sion to refer to that case again.

We will now notice only so much of it as relates to the branch of the subject we are now considering. Lord Chancellor Hatherley, after stating several cases in which a devisee had been held to be a trustee upon parol proof of a fraud committed by him in procuring the devise, thus proceeds: "But this doctrine evidently requires to be carefully restricted within proper limits. It is in itself a doctrine which involves a wide departure from the policy which induced the legislature to pass the statute of frauds, and it is only in clear cases of fraud that this doctrine has been applied—cases in which the court has been persuaded that there has been a fraudulent inducement held out by the apparent beneficiary, in order to lead the testator to confide to him the duty which he so undertook to perform." And Lord Westbury said: "The jurisdiction which is invoked here by the appellant is founded altogether on personal fraud. It is a jurisdiction by which a court of equity, proceeding on the ground of fraud, converts the party who has committed it into a trustee for the party who is injured by that fraud. Now being a jurisdiction founded on personal fraud, it is incumbent on the court to see that a fraud, a malus animus is proved by the clearest and most indisputable evidence." Much more was said by his lordship which bears upon the subject under consideration, but for the present we will quote no more from the case.

In this case, certainly, then, there is not a particle of proof, nor is it pretended that there was any fraud on the part of the devisee to induce the devise; nor that she would not, if she had lived long enough, have made such a disposition of the property as is now claimed by the appellants; not in discharge of an obligation which could 395 be enforced in a court of law or equity, but as a voluntary act in pursuance of what she no doubt believed were the wishes of her husband.

We are therefore of opinion that the parol evidence in this case was inadmissible to alter or contradict the will, or set up a trust under the same.

We are also of opinion, 'that even if the evidence were admissible, it would be insufficient to prove such a trust as is claimed in this cause. The will itself certainly shows the intention of the testator more plainly than the parol declarations made by the testator and his wife, testified to, as they chiefly are, by interested parties. The will, as we have seen, is very plainly expressed, as if the testator was careful to exclude the idea that his wife should be considered as holding the property for the benefit, ultimately, of the heirs of the two families respectively, according to the claim set up in this suit, and not for her own exclusive and absolute use. If really the testator had intended to give those two families, or either of them, any interest in remainder in his estate, he would have done so expressly in his will. He would, for example, have given a moiety of his estate to his wife absolutely, and the other moiety to her for life, with remainder to his own right heirs and next of kin. That he did not plainly do so, which he could so easily have done, is strong, if not conclusive evidence to show that he did not intend to do so. He was not taken by surprise by death. His will was well and carefully prepared, obviously by a lawyer, more than a year before his death, and is, in substance, the same with a will which he executed seventeen or eighteen years before. It was his deliberate and cherished purpose to make it as he did; and he meant what he said, whatever may have been his wishes in regard to the distribution of any of the *property which might remain unexpended or undisposed of at her death. Those wishes were altogether subordinate to his main intention to leave all his estate of which he might die possessed, both real and personal, of every description whatsoever, to his wife; and that she should own absolutely everything that he might die possessed of. Though sometimes advised to name in his will his wishes in regard to the ultimate distribution of the property which might be left at his wife's death, he carefully avoided doing so, lest his wife might thereby be restrained in some degree in the use and enjoyment of the property. If he had survived her, the property would certainly have been his absolutely, to dispose of as he pleased, and he could not have been restrained in such disposition by his heirs at law or those of his wife, upon the ground of any trust in their favor, arising from the loose conversations between him and his wife, or otherwise. As she survived him, he intended to leave her in his place, and to give her the property and all power over it to the same absolute extent as he would have held and enjoyed it had he been the survivor. He did not know how long she would live, nor what occasion she might have for the use of the property after his death; and therefore he gave it to her absolutely. He had perfect confidence in her, and was willing to give it to her absolutely, trusting and believing that she would do what was right when she came to dispose of what property might remain undisposed of at her death. George W. Jones, a witness for the plaintiffs, says, that it was the understanding between A. B. Sprinkle and wife, "that whichever outlived the other was to have the benefit of the whole property during their life; and then the property was to be divided, whatever may be left, equally between his family 397 and the family of *his wife." Wade

D. Strother, another witness for the plaintiffs, says: "I suggested to him the propriety of putting this specific arrangement (for the ultimate division of the property between the two families) beyond any contingency. He replied that he did not desire to do so, as he had the fullest confidence in Mrs. Sprinkle; that as soon as he was laid away, and it was proper to do so, she would make a will that would carry out certainly this agreement; furthermore, that he desired it to be in her power to use as much of his property as would be necessary to her comfort, should she be afflicted." This witness is a lawyer, had written the testator's will, and he would no doubt have been called on to write the declaration of trust, if the testator had taken his advice and been willing to make one; but he was not, obviously for the reasons above stated. Mrs. Strother, another witness for the plaintiffs, says: "I heard Mr. Sprinkle say once that he had perfect confidence in his wife, that she would carry out their agreement; that he did not want to tie his property up. My impression was, that he did not want to leave his property to his wife for life and then to others, so that she would feel that any one else had any claim to it. He said that in so many words. He said he had perfect confidence in his wife, that if she survived him, she would make a will and divide the property according to their agreement; that he would give it to her absolutely with that agreement."

Now if the testator intended to give his wife the right to dispose of the property, or any part of it at her pleasure, to her own use, he gave her the absolute estate; and even if he had engrafted on the will an express limitation over of the property which might remain undisposed of at her death, the absolute devise would have been good, and the limitation over repugnant 398 *thereto and void. A fortiori, a parol limitation over of such residue, directly contrary to such an absolute devise on the face of the will as exists in this case, would be void, even supposing that a parol limitation could be engrafted on a will in any case, except in a case of fraud as before mentioned.

That the testator did intend to give his wife the right to dispose of the property at her pleasure during her life, is, we think, perfectly certain, even according to the parol evidence itself.

We will refer to two cases only on this last branch of the case, both of which were referred to in the argument of the case, one an English and the other a Virginia case, although many other cases might be cited to the same effect.

The English case is the one from which we have already quoted so largely in another branch of this case. McCormick v. Grogan, supra. There, as here, the will was absolute in form. But there the testator gave his instructions to his devisee and legatee, not by parol declarations, but in a letter addressed to the latter. The marginal abstract of the case is as follows: "C. made a will, leaving his whole property, real and personal, to G., whom he also appointed his executor. When about to die, C. sent for G., and in a private interview told him of the will, and on G.'s asking whether that was right, said he would not have it otherwise. C. then told G. where the will was to be found, and that with it would be found a letter. This was all that was known to have passed between the parties. The letter named a great many persons, to whom C. wished sums of money to be given, and annuities to be paid; but it contained several expressions as to G. carrying into effect the intentions of the testator as he might think best;" and this sentence: "I do not

399 wish you to act strictly on the *foregoing instructions, but leave it entirely to your own good judgment, to do as you think I would if living, and as the parties are deserving, and as it is not my wish that you should say anything about this document, there cannot be any fault found with you by any of the parties, should you not act in strict accordance with it.' G. paid money to some of the persons mentioned in the letter, but not to all: Held, that in this case there was not any trust created binding on G." Lord Chancellor Hatherley in his opinion said: "The instructions on their very face appear to bear this interpretation, that it was the testator's intention to leave Mr. Grogar sole and complete master of his property. Now, in the first place, what other theory is there that can give any account of his taking this singular mode of disposing of his property, except that he did not intend the instructions to have legal effect? There was no charitable trust concealed, nor any other trust of any sort which the testator was desirous of keeping back, because either the trust might be illegal or he might have doubts of its legality. There was no question of perpetuity, or anything else which could render it in any way more desirable for him, instead of effecting his intentions in a proper and legal manner, by expressing them in a regular instrument, to do it in this strange and circuitous mode of giving the whole property to one man, and leaving an instrument utterly inoperative in law for carrying his intentions into effect."

Now, for the very same reason, we may enquire in this case, why the testator did not expressly limit his wife's estate to her life, and give it in remainder to his heirs and her heirs in equal moieties, if he had so intended? Why did he give the estate to her absolutely, and carefully abstain 400 from making any allusion *to any of those heirs in his will, though advised by his counsel to do so? There is, in truth, but one reasonable answer; and that is, he intended what he said in his will.

There are expressions of a like kind in the opinion of Lord Westbury, but it is unnecessary to quote them.

The Virginia case to which I refer is that of May v. Joynes &c., 20 Gratt. 692, decided by this court in 1857, but not reported until 1871. The following is the marginal abstract of the case by the reporter: "Testator says, I give to my beloved and excellent wife, subject to the provisions hereafter declared, my whole estate, real and personal, and especially all real estate which I may hereafter acquire, to have during her life, but with full power to make sale of any part of the said estate, and to convey absolute title to the purchasers, and use the purchase money for investment, or any purpose that she pleases, with only this restriction, that whatever remains at her death shall, after paying any debts she may owe, or any legacies she may leave, be divided as follows: There are then limitations to his children and grand children—Held: The wife takes a fee simple in the real, and an absolute property in the personal, estate; and the limitation over, of whatever remains at her death, is inconsistent with, and repugnant to, such fee simple, and absolute property in said real and personal estate, and fails for uncertainty." Allen, P. delivered the opinion of the court, in which all the other judges, but Samuels, J. concurred. The case was very ably argued by distinguished counsel, and their arguments are fully reported. They refer to all the material authorities bearing on the interesting question involved in the case, which was, whether a remainder over, limited on an express estate for life, was rendered invalid by a 401 power of disposition given *to the tenant for life for her own use over the principal of the estate, or any part of it.

We think that case was a much stronger one in favor of the limitation over than this case is, for there the estate, on which the limitation depended, was an express estate for life, while here it is a fee simple and absolute estate. There, the limitation over was expressed in the will. Here, there is no allusion whatever to it in the will. If the limitation over in that case was repugnant to the estate given to the wife, a fortiori, the limitation over in this case was repugnant to the estate given to the wife.

If the testator had foreseen the death of his wife so soon after his own death, without having time or opportunity, or being in a condition to make a will, or had thought of such a contingency as likely to take place, he would no doubt have provided for it by his will, and disposed of the property among the heirs of both parties, according to what he knew to be the wishes of both in such an event. But he made no such provision, and whatever may have been the cause of the omission, this court cannot supply it. To do so would be to make a will for the testator, and not to construe and give effect to the will as made by himself. The latter is our only legitimate office. The former is beyond our power.

In every view of the case, therefore, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and that it ought to be affirmed.

Staples, J. I understand the president's opinion as holding that in order to establish the trust, it is necessary to show a fraudulent intent on the part of the devisee or legatee in obtaining the will. I am not prepared to concur in that view.

402 *If, for example (in the familiar instance), the testator communicates his intention to the devisee of charging a legacy on his estate, and the devisee should tell him it is unnecessary, and he will pay it, the legacy being thus prevented, the devisee will be required to make it good. In such case it does not matter whether the devisee made the representation fraudulently or not. The fraud is in the refusal to pay the legacy; not in the promise, but in the breach.

I concur fully in the rest of the opinion.

Decree affirmed.

403 *Bush v. Campbell.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

1. Pleading—Non-Joiner of Parties—Failure to Make Objection—Waiver.*—In an action of debt upon a bond against five persons, the plaintiff indorses on the process, "Not to be served on G," who was one of the five; and he is not brought before the court. There having been two continuances of the cause, and a verdict and judgment for plaintiff against B, one of the defendants, and he having moved for a new trial, and also in arrest of judgment, without at any time objecting to the failure of plaintiff to make G a party; and it appearing further from the motion in arrest of judgment, that G had absconded and left the state before the suit was brought, B must be held in the appellate court, to have waived the objection; and it is too late to make it in that court.

2. Practice—Judgment for Some and against Other of the Defendants.†—In an action of debt upon a bond against five persons, upon one of whom the process is not served by direction of the plaintiff, the four plead usury in the bond, and three of them plead severally non est factum. On the trial the jury find in favor of the three defendants, on the plea of non est factum; but cannot agree on the plea of usury. There is a judgment in favor of the three, and the case is continued as to the fourth. Afterwards there is a verdict against the fourth; and he moves in arrest of judgment. HOLD: Under the statute, Code of 1849, ch. 177, § 19, there may be judgment in favor of the three at one time, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the fourth defendant at another time.

3. Same—Under Code of 1849.—The act, Code of 1849, ch. 177, § 19, applies to actions on contract against two or more defendants, where the defense of some of the defendants is personal to themselves, though that defense is, that they never were parties to the contract sued on, as non est factum.

4. Same—Plaintiff's Right to Proceed against Non-Resident Defendants, after Judgment Rendered in Favor of Other Defendants.—Though in such action the parties sued live in different counties, and the only parties who live in the county where the suit is brought, have a verdict and judgment in their favor on their plea of non est factum, the plaintiff may still proceed in that suit against the other parties who do not reside in the county.

404 *5. Same—Fraudulent Attempt of Plaintiff to Give Jurisdiction to the Court.—If a plaintiff, in order to give jurisdiction to the court, in a case where defendants live in another county unites in the action, a party who he knows is no party to the contract, the court will on motion dismiss the suit with costs.

On the 24th of April 1858 Leroy Campbell sued out of the clerk's office of the Circuit court of Roanoke county summons against Wm. Gish, George Gish, Wm. H. Fleshman, David H. Gish and Robert Bush, jointly in debt for $3,000, which were directed severally to the sheriffs of the counties of Roanoke, Bedford and Franklin; that directed to Roanoke was endorsed, "Serve only on George Gish and David H. Gish," and was returned executed; that directed to Bedford was endorsed, "Serve only on William H. Fleshman," and was returned executed on him; that directed to Franklin was endorsed, "Serve only on Robert Bush," and not being executed, an alias summons was directed to the sheriff of Franklin, endorsed in the same way, and returned executed on Bush. There was no other summons issued in the case; none was served on William Gish; nor was any return of any kind made as to him on any process. The declaration filed in the case avers that the said William Gish, George Gish, William H. Fleshman, David H. Gish, and Robert Bush had, by their writing obligatory, sealed with their seals, and dated the 22d of November 1857, bound themselves, &c., to pay the plaintiff, one day after date, the sum of $3,000; and the paper of which profert is made, purports to be the writing obligatory of said parties, sealed with their seals, and is in the form of what is commonly called a single bill. Office judgments were entered and confirmed at rules against all the parties on whom process had been executed; but no order was ever made as to William Gish, or any further step taken against him.

405 *At the subsequent term of the court, after the office judgment was confirmed, George Gish, William H. Fleshman and David H. Gish, severally filed pleas of non est factum; and they jointly with Bush filed a plea of usury; to which several pleas the plaintiff replied generally; and issues were joined. At the ensuing term of the court a jury was empanelled to try all the issues joined in the case; and, after retiring, returned into court with a verdict for the defendants, George Gish, William H. Fleshman and David H. Gish, on their pleas of non est factum; which was received and entered by the court; and the jury declaring their inability to agree upon a verdict on the plea of usury, a juror was withdrawn, the jury discharged, and the case continued as to Bush; and a judgment was rendered for George Gish, William H. Fleshman and David H. Gish, on the verdict in their favor on the plea of non est factum.

At the August term 1859, on the motion of the defendant Bush, the cause was continued, and at the March term 1860 it was continued generally. At the August term 1860 another jury was empanelled to try the "issue joined," which returned a general verdict for the plaintiff for $3,000, the debt in the declaration mentioned, with interest from the 23d of November 1860. Bush thereupon moved to set aside this verdict; which motion was overruled. He then assigned errors in arrest of judgment, and moved to arrest the judgment on the said verdict, on the following grounds:

1st. The action is joint against William Gish, George Gish, William H. Fleshman, Robert Bush and David H. Gish; and upon pleas of non est factum, filed by George Gish, William H. Fleshman and David H.

Gish, by the verdict of the jury, it has been established *that it is not the bond of said defendants; and as the declaration alleges a joint contract, no judgment can be given against the defendant, Robert Bush.

2d. Neither Robert Bush or William Gish, at the time of the institution of the suit, were residents of the county of Roanoke, or since have been residents of said county; but at that time William Gish had fled from the country, having previously to his flight resided in the county of Bedford; and Robert Bush then was, and still is, a resident of the county of Franklin. And the process was not served on Robert Bush, in the county of Roanoke; so that the court has no jurisdiction of the action on the bond, since it has been ascertained that it is not the bond of the other defendants; and this objection could not have been taken by plea in abatement, as George Gish and David H. Gish, who were sued along with the other parties, were, at the time of the institution of the suit, residents of the county of Roanoke.

But the court overruled the motion to arrest the judgment, and rendered a judgment according to the verdict. Bush thereupon applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

Early, for the appellant.

I maintain that the judgment in this case was erroneous: First, because it was error in the court to have received a verdict as to a portion of the defendants, on a part of the issues joined. The general rule is, that the verdict must respond to all the issues. This rule is laid down very clearly in Robinson's old Practice, vol. 1, page 355, and the cases there cited; and it results from the very theory of jury trials. As is said by Judge Green, in the case of Gardner's adm'r v. *Vidal, 6 Rand. 106,

"there is no example of a verdict being set aside as to one issue, and suffered to stand as to others, and trying a cause by piecemeal;" and the converse of this proposition is equally true: there is no example of a jury being allowed to render a verdict on one issue when they cannot agree as to the others, and thus trying the case by piecemeal. This holds good, whether the several issues are made on different pleas by the same party, or separate pleas by different parties. I defy the production of a solitary case in which a jury has been allowed to render a verdict on the issues joined on the part of a portion of the defendants, when they could not agree as to the issues joined on the part of the other defendants in a civil case. Even in criminal cases it required the special enactment, to be found in sec. 35, chap. 208, of the Code of 1849, page 778, to authorize a verdict as to one or more of several parties charged and tried jointly, and a trial as to the others by another jury, though it was never the law that, in criminal prosecutions, when several parties were jointly charged and tried, the acquittal of one was good cause to arrest judgment against the others who were found guilty. Suppose that in this case there had been a verdict against the three parties who pleaded non est factum, on that plea, would that verdict have been received, or, if received, have been allowed to stand, if there was no verdict on the issue joined on the plea of usury? Yet, if the jury could have rendered a separate verdict for the said defendants on the plea of non est factum, why could they not have rendered it against them on that plea as well?

The position taken by the counsel for the defendant in error, that the plaintiff in error gave his assent to the withdrawal of a juror, after the partial *verdict was rendered, is no answer to the point above made. The verdict had been received and entered, and when the jury declared their inability to agree on the other issue, the withdrawal was agreed to in order to relieve the jury from a useless and harrassing confinement until the adjournment of the court. That did not amount to an assent to or release of the error committed in receiving a partial verdict, nor did the subsequent continuance, on the motion of the plaintiff in error, amount to such assent or release, any more than a motion for a continuance after an erroneous ruling of a court in a case would amount to a release of the error. It may be contended with far greater force, that the withdrawal of a juror and the discharge of the rest with the consent of the plaintiff in the court below, without insisting upon a verdict upon all the issues joined, when he had the undoubted right to resist the reception of a partial verdict against him, amounted to such a sanction of the error committed as to waive all right to a judgment upon any subsequent verdict that might be rendered on the other issue. He had a right to a writ of error on the judgment on that verdict, while the defendant, Bush, had no such right, and he is not now asking for a new trial as to his codefendants, Fleshman and the two Gishes, but he insists that such an error was committed in the reception of that verdict by the court, with the sanction of the plaintiff below, as to debar him from any judgment on the subsequent verdict. His remedy, if any, after submitting to the first verdict, was to dismiss his suit as to Bush and bring a new suit against him individually, or against him and William Gish jointly. The cases of Boswell & al. v. Jones, 1 Wash. 322, and Guerrant v. Tinder, Gilm. 36, cited by counsel for the defendant in 409 error, are not at all in *point. In each of those cases there was a verdict on all the issues joined, and as to all the parties, and they were actions for tort. If they had been actions on contract, unquestionably, as the law then stood, the defendants against whom the verdicts were rendered would have had a certain and sure remedy, by motion in arrest of judgment.

I maintain that, according to the description of the writing obligatory on which suit was brought contained in the declaration, it was a joint obligation, and not joint and several. Without, however, entering into the learning on that subject, it is sufficient to say that the legal consequences are the same in this case as if the obligation sued on were purely a joint obligation. The plaintiff in the court below has thought proper to treat it as a joint obligation, and has brought a joint suit on it, and not several suits against each of the parties whose names appear to be signed to the obligation. In Parson on Contracts, vol. ii, page 12, it is said that "when the obligation is joint and several, an ancient and familiar rule of law forbids it to be treated as several as to some of the obligors, and joint as to the rest. The obligee has the right of choice between the two methods of proceeding; but he must resort to one or the other exclusively, and cannot combine both; he must proceed either severally against each, or jointly against all." The same doctrine is laid down in Chitty on Contracts, vol. ii, page 1352, 11th American edition, in the following words: "On a joint and several covenant or contract the plaintiff must elect to proceed, either as if the contract or obligatory part of the instrument were joint, or as if it were several; so that the parties chargeable must be sued jointly or individually." See also Bacon's Abridgment, Obligation D.

410 *Now the plaintiff below undertook to treat the obligation sued on as the joint obligation of the parties whose names were signed thereto, and yet on each one of the summons which issued, an endorsement was made which forbade its service on William Gish, whose name appears as signed first in order to the obligation. This, I maintain, was a fatal error, and would have afforded sufficient ground for arresting the judgment, even if the verdict had been against all the defendants who appeared and pleaded. In the case of Shields v. Oney, 5 Munf. 550, which was the case of an action against two partners, but the writ was directed to be served on one alone, it was held that the judgment must be arrested, though there had been no plea in abatement. See the opinion of Judge Roane in the case. It is submitted that this is a similar case, and that the same rule should hold in it that was applied in that case.

There it was held that no plea in abatement was necessary, because the plaintiff showed by his declaration that he knew who the parties were, and it was held that as the writ was against two, but was served on one only, and the declaration was against both, the judgment must be arrested, though the Court of Appeals was inclined to the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to support the action. So here, where the summons was against five, and the declaration against all, but by the direction of the plaintiff the summons was served on four alone, it is submitted that the judgment ought also to have been arrested. If this is not so, then, notwithstanding the ancient and well established rule of law, that suit on a joint and several obligation must be jointly against all, or severally against each, a plaintiff might treat such an obligation as joint as to some, and several as to 411 others, by simply endorsing *on the summons that it should not be served on a part of the obligors.

The portions of the statute of Jeofails bearing on this question are as old certainly as the Code of 1792. See that Code, chap. 76, section 26, page 111, and the Revised Code of 1819, page 511, section 104. The other provisions incorporated into the Code, since the decision in Shields v. Oney, have no bearing whatever on the question. Nor does the provision, contained in the Code of 1849, chap. 172, sec. 49, page 653, affect it. That section is intended merely to give the plaintiff the right to proceed to judgment against one or more of several defendants jointly sued, when the process has not been served on a portion for causes beyond the control of the plaintiff. It could not have been intended to permit him to select which of several parties jointly bound he should proceed against, for such a permission to him would, in many cases, enable him to perpetrate the grossest injustice.

I come now to the consideration of another question arising in the case, and that is as to the effect of the verdict on the plea of non est factum, as to a portion of the defendants, on the right of the plaintiff to a judgment against one of the defendants, sued along with the others. I presume it is useless to refer to the well established doctrine, as the law unquestionably stood before the provisions contained in the Code of 1849, chap. 177, sec. 19, page 674, were adopted; but I propose to consider how far that law has been modified by the said section. That section has never been construed by our Court of Appeals, though it has been referred to in the cases of Steptoe v. Read, 19 Gratt. 1, and Moffett v. Bickle, 21 Gratt. 280. In the first case the question was raised in the argument, but not decided, as it was not necessary to do so. It was contended in the 412

*argument, that in an action of assumpsit against two, under the provisions of sec. 19, chap. 177 of the Code, a separate judgment might be rendered against one only on proof that the other did not assume; and hence that the defendant, who was willing to withdraw his plea or confess judgment, was a competent witness to prove that he alone assumed the debt, and that the other did not assume. In his opinion Judge Joynes, to meet this view, undertook to show that when a witness was admitted for one purpose, he was competent for all purposes, and that he might be examined, to show that the debt was illegal and void for reasons going to the foundation of the action; and that thus a party might be admitted to give testimony which would defeat the action, not only as to his co-defendant, but as to himself. His doctrines on that point were entirely sound, and sustained by abundant authority, and if in delivering his opinion he seemed to admit that, in an action on contract against two, there might be a judgment on a contract made by one only, it was merely a concession for the sake of the argument. The sole question in the case was as to the admissibility of the testimony of the co-defendant of Steptoe, and Judge Joynes demonstrated the inadmissibility of the witness by showing that, if admitted for one purpose, he was admitted for all purposes. This left the question, arising under the section of the Code referred to, untouched.

The case of Moffett v. Bickle was a joint action, under section 11, chapter 144 of the Code of 1849, page 582, against the maker and indorsers of a negotiable instrument, in which the undertaking of each party was several; and the court very properly held that there might be a judgment in favor of the holder against the endorser to him 413 for a *valuable and legal consideration, though the other parties might be discharged for an illegal consideration that applied to them alone. Before the passage of the act of 1838, containing provisions similar to those of section 19, chapter 177, of the Code of 1849, it had been held that, in such actions, the well established rule that, in joint actions on contract a failure as to one was a failure as to all, was applicable; and it cannot be questioned that the case of Moffett v. Bickle came within the mischief intended to be remedied by the provisions of the act of 1838, as well of section 19 of chapter 177 of the Code of 1849; for the application of those provisions to such a case involves no departure from the well established rule that, in all actions the allegata and probata must agree. In delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Moffett v. Bickle, Judge Moncure, referring to the opinion of Judge Joynes in the case of Steptoe v. Read, said: "That view of the case seems to concede that if it had been proved by competent evidence that Steptoe was not a party to the contract, there might have been a judgment in his favor and against the other defendant; which certainly would have been going further than it is necessary to go in this case to maintain the correctness of the judgment of the County court. In that case there would have been an apparent difficulty, though it may have been merely technical, on the ground of variance. A judgment would have been rendered against one of the defendants upon a several contract, in an action upon a joint contract. But here there is no room even for such a technical objection. There is no variance in the case. The case proved is precisely the case stated in the declaration. The note was in fact drawn and endorsed as therein charged."

If Judge Joynes does appear to con-
414 cede the proposition *that there might be a judgment for one defendant and against another on proof of a several contract in an action on a joint contract, it was a mere concession in the argument, and not a judicial settlement of the proposition as a rule of practice. So far then as the two cases mentioned are concerned, the construction of the section of the Code referred to as applicable to this case is not settled, and I know of no other case in which the subject has been discussed or referred to; and the question comes up now to be settled whether, in a joint action on a contract averred to have been made by several, there can be a judgment against one on proof of a contract made by him alone. To hold that there can be such a judgment would not only set aside the decisions made in a number of cases, of which the cases of Rohr v. Davis, 9 Leigh 30, and Baber v. Cook, 11 Leigh 606, are conspicuous, but would involve a departure from rules of pleading and practice which have not only the sanction of the sages of the law, but are of daily application in our courts. One of those rules is that whatever is alleged in pleading must be alleged with certainty, and another is that the proof must correspond with the case made in the pleadings.

What degree of certainty is required in the pleadings, and of conformity of the proofs to the pleadings, it is not necessary to discuss, it being sufficient to say, that in all cases the certainty must be to a reasonable intendment, and that in no case is a variance in any material particular admissible; and that in pleadings setting forth written contracts or agreements (especially if under seal), the highest degree of certainty is required in their description, and the most accurate correspondence of the documents offered in evidence with those set forth in the pleadings is necessary. Hence, in an

415 ance *in the names of the parties, the sums specified, the date, and other particulars, may be objected. It is to be presumed that no court would hold that, in an action of debt against John Smith, in which it was alleged that he had signed and sealed his individual bond for $1,000, dated on the 1st of January, the plaintiff could introduce a bond or single bill signed with the name of John Jones alone, or by John Smith and John Jones jointly, or one signed by him for $100, or one dated the 1st day of July; and neither in a suit against John Smith and John Jones jointly, averring a joint obligation by them, would it be admissible to introduce in evidence the individual obligation of either.

The reason of these rules is very obvious. When party is sued he must be informed of the character of the claim against him, so that he may come prepared to make his defence; and so a plaintiff must be informed of the defence, in order that he may be prepared to meet it. If, when a party is sued on one contract, judgment can be obtained against him on another, the grossest injustice may be perpetrated. Lord Coke has said that the law is the perfection of reason. This, of course, is to be understood as applicable to the common law, and not to the multifarious forms which the statute law has assumed in these days, for certainly the maxim "Ratio est anima legis" is not applicable to that, or if it is, our present statute law must have many souls. In the construction of section 19 of chapter 177, we must take into consideration the mischief which was intended to be remedied; for it is to be presumed that the object of the enactment was to remedy and not create mischief.

In the application of the old common law rule, that in a joint action on a contract there must be a recovery 416 against all, and that a failure as to one was a failure as to all, much wrong was done in many cases, as for instance where one of the parties sued proved to be an infant, a bankrupt, or laboring under some disability to contract, or was entitled to a discharge for reasons personal to himself. This rule came to be modified very considerably by the courts, especially in cases where one of the parties proved to be an infant or a bankrupt, and no violence was done to the rules of pleading and practice mentioned above. These decisions proceeded on sound principles, but there was not uniformity in them, and in our court they were very indefinite; and it is to be presumed that the object of the legislature was to confirm the modifications in the rule made by the courts and to extend them to cases where the reason was the same, without, however, doing violence to the general principle that the plaintiff must prove a joint contract when he brings a joint suit. If it was the purpose of the legislature to go farther, and permit a plaintiff to obtain judgment on a several contract, when he had brought a joint action averring a joint contract, and the language used is sufficient to accomplish that object, then indeed has it opened wide the door to innumerable mischiefs.

The court should not presume that it was the intention of the legislature to abolish the rule of pleading requiring certainty in the allegations and a conformity of the evidence to those allegations. The language used in the act of 1838, or in the Code of 1849, does not necessarily import an intention to extend their provisions beyond the principle adopted by the courts in making the exceptions, where the discharge of one defendant is on some ground personal to himself and not applicable to the others. In the first (the act of 1838) the language is, "acquitted or discharged," and

417 *in the Code it is, "may be barred." The courts, in making the exceptions, had used the words "discharged" and

"barred" as importing the same idea—that is, when one defendant was discharged, the plaintiff was said to be barred as to him. Mr. Robinson, in citing the case of Hartness &c. v. Thompson and others, 5 John. R. 160, on page 401, vol. 1, of his old Practice, says: "It seemed to the court that where a suit is commenced against several joint debtors upon a joint contract, and one of them pleads or gives in evidence a matter which is a bar to the action as against him only, and of which the others could not take advantage as it respected them, there could be no good reason why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to take judgment against them." In a further notice of the same case, on the same page and volume, Mr. Robinson says: "The general principle that the plaintiff must prove a joint contract when he brings a joint suit, the court remark, is not intended to be shaken by the rule laid down in that case. The operation of that rule, the court say, is to be confined exclusively to the case of a defence insisted on by one of several joint debtors, which is personal to him, and which does not go to the discharge of all." The italics in these citations are my own, and are intended to call attention to the language of the court in laying down the rule as to the exceptions of the general principle.

Can it be presumed that the legislature, in establishing the rule it adopted, used the same language in a broader sense than was given to it by the courts? It is well known that Mr. Robinson bore a very conspicuous part in the compilation of the Code of 1849, and he was probably the author of the section in that Code referred to. Having cited the cases on the subject in his Practice, it is to be inferred that in using 418 the word "barred" he used it in no broader sense than was given to it in the cases he cites.

It is admitted that it is proper to apply the principle to all cases where the reasons are similar, and its application in the case of Moffett v. Bickle was just, and does not violate any established rule of pleading or practice; but it cannot be admitted that it is a legitimate construction of the enactment, to so extend its provisions as to enable a plaintiff to sue on one contract and recover on another. What must be the consequence of such a construction? If applicable to actions on sealed instruments, it must be applicable, of course, to actions on simple contract. A defendant may be sued with another on a joint assumpsit which he knows he has made, but from which he has been discharged by payment or otherwise, and he has also assumed individually another debt to the same plaintiff which he has likewise discharged—he goes to trial prepared to prove his defence in the case on which he is sued, but the plaintiff proves the individual assumpsit against him, as to which he is not prepared. Again, as the law stood when the enactment was made, no party could testify in his own case. A person to whom another has assumed a debt, knowing that it had been paid or discharged, and that the payment or discharge can be proved by certain witnesses, to cut off their testimony, sues them along with the party who has been his debtor, and is thus enabled to obtain judgment against him on a satisfied debt. Again, a person having a claim against a resident in a distant county, and wishing to give jurisdiction to the courts of his own county in the case, sues his debtor along with some neighbor or friend of his own, and is thus enabled to draw the jurisdiction to the court at his own home;

419 *for when the plea to the jurisdiction is put in, if the distant party is able to get to the clerk's office in time, the reply is that one of the defendants sued along with him is a resident within the jurisdiction of the court.

Is it possible that the legislature ever passed a law from which such consequences might result, or that the court will so construe the enactment in question as to permit such consequences? It will not do to say that it is impossible or improbable that any such cases can occur. I have actually had a case of the latter kind to occur against a client of mine in a chancery suit before the war, in which suit was brought against him and another party in a city sixty or seventy miles distant from his residence, when there was no privity whatever between them. I was put to a demurrer for misjoinder of parties and multifariousness, and when my demurrer was sustained, the plaintiffs were permitted to dismiss the bill as to the resident defendant, and I immediately tendered a plea to the jurisdiction, but it was not received, because not filed at the rule day. Again, a man signs a bond as surety because the names of other parties are on it whom he knows are entirely solvent, and he signs with the understanding that other parties are also to unite in it, and their names are forged. When suit is brought against all the parties, he cannot plead non est factum as to them, because that is a plea which they alone can put in. He does not know whether it is really their bond or not, and cannot know until the question is settled by a jury. He therefore either puts in a formal plea of payment or permits the office judgment to stand against him; but the other parties, however, do plead non est factum; and upon the trial the issue is found

420 for them on that plea, and against *him on the plea of payment, if he has put it in. What remedy has he if not on motion in arrest of judgment? Does the act of the legislature permit such flagrant wrongs? If there had been a verdict against Bush in the first trial on the plea of usury, his case would have borne precisely that aspect. It will not do to say that, by consenting to the withdrawal of a juror and subsequently moving for a continuance, he waived all objections. The decisions go to the effect that the motion in arrest of judgment will lie, even where one defendant has confessed judgment, and there is a subsequent judgment for the others. And if it lies in any case, it lies in this, for the court can make no exceptions but those authorized by the legitimate import of the language of the Code. In Bush's case, also, by joining him with parties resident in Roanoke, who were really not bound by the obligation sued on, the court of that county has taken jurisdiction against him when he was resident in another county, to which process against him was sent to be served; and it is respectfully submitted whether the court ought not to have arrested the judgment because of this abuse of its process.

I have thus submitted some views in regard to the proper construction of section 19 of chapter 177 of the Code of 1849, and given some instances of the very great mischiefs which may result if such a construction is given to that section as the counsel for the defendant in error asks may be given to it. There are many other views which might be taken, and other mischiefs depicted, but, I think, those given are sufficient to warrant the construction for which I contend. It is to be hoped that the court will definitely decide the three main questions raised:

1st. Whether, in a civil action, there
421 can be a verdict *as to a portion of the parties on one of the issues joined, without a verdict as to the other issues and parties.

2d. Whether, in a joint action against several, where the plaintiff endorses summons so as to require service on a portion of the parties only, there can be a judgment against those on whom the summons is served. And here I will say that the case of Moss v. Moss's adm'or, 4 Hen. & Mun. 293, referred to by counsel for the defendant in error, has no application to this question. There being no appearance or plea by William Gish, and his name appearing in the declaration as one of the defendants, the court had a right to look at the orders at rules and the process in the case, to see what steps had been taken as to him. That was done in the case of Shields v. Oney, before cited.

3d. Whether, under section 19 of chapter 177 of the Code of 1849, there can be a judgment against one on a several contract who is sued along with others on a joint and several contract.

These questions are of great importance, and should be judicially settled.

Edmonson & Blair, for the appellee.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of debt brought in the Circuit court of Roanoke county, upon a writing obligatory. The instrument is joint and several, and purports to have been executed by five persons; process was issued against all the parties; but by direction of the plaintiff it was not served upon William Gish, whose name is first upon the bond as obligee. The declaration was filed, common order entered, and regularly confirmed 422 *at rules. At the next term thereafter, all the defendants pleaded usury, and three of them severally filed pleas of non est factum. Upon these latter pleas verdict and judgment were rendered for the three defendants. The jury not agreeing upon the issue made upon the plea of usury, were discharged, and the cause was continued as to the defendant Bush. At a subsequent term of the court a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff against Bush, upon the plea of usury, for the entire debt claimed in the declaration. A motion was thereupon made by him for a new trial, which was overruled. He then moved in arrest of judgment, which motion was also overruled, and judgment given upon the verdict.

The correctness of that judgment is now to be considered. The errors assigned will be examined in the order in which they are presented in the proceedings. And first, it is insisted that upon a joint and several obligation the plaintiff may proceed jointly against all the parties, or severally against each. If he elects to sue more than one, he must proceed against all, and not any intermediate number. That here the plaintiff having elected to sue more than one, was bound to proceed against all; and yet by his direction one of the defendants was not served with process; and it is claimed that this precludes a judgment against any.

In support of this objection the case of Shields v. Oney, 5 Munf. 550, is much relied on. That was a suit against two partners, and by the direction of the plaintiff process was served upon one only. On the trial the defendant demurred to the evidence; and his demurrer being overruled he moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground of the non-joinder; which motion was also overruled. This court held that the proceedings were all erroneous; that the plaintiff 423 himself *having directed the writ not to be served upon one of the defendants, a plea in abatement by the other was unnecessary.

This is a very strong authority, and if the facts in the two cases were the same, it would, of course, be conclusive of this. In the present case, it appears, however, that the defendant, Bush, appeared and pleaded in bar at the August term—the jury not agreeing, the case was continued as to him. At the next succeeding term it was continued on his motion, and at the next term it was again continued. During all this time the defendant was as well aware of the alleged irregularity as he is now; for it plainly appeared on the face of the proceedings. He did not move to remand the case to the rules; he did not complain of the defect in any form. After the rendition of the verdict against him, he moved in arrest of judgment, assigning various grounds of error; but this objection was not made or even distantly intimated. It was first suggested in the petition for an appeal, when the defect was without remedy by the plaintiff, or by the court which tried the case.

According to a well settled rule of pleading, an objection for the non-joinder of a co-obligor must be taken by plea in abatement. If not so taken, the objection is considered as waived. Such a plea is unnecessary where the plaintiff directs the process not to be served upon one of the parties; but the defendant may, if he pleases, waive all objection to this irregularity. He may for good reasons prefer to waive it; and I think he should be held to have done so when he wholly fails to raise the point in the court in which the error can be explained or corrected. Had this objection been made in the Circuit court, the plaintiff might readily have answered it. The de-424 fendant has *himself furnished the answer. In his motion in arrest of judgment, entered upon the record, he states that “neither he nor William Gish, at the time of the institution of the suit, were residents of the county of Roanoke, or since have been residents of said county; but at that time William Gish had fled from the country, having previously to his flight resided in the county of Bedford.”

This fact was no doubt well known to the court, to the counsel, and to all the parties. It fully explains why the direction was given by the plaintiff not to serve the process upon William Gish, and why the objection was not taken at the time by the defendant. If no such direction had been given, the process would have been returned, “No inhabitant” as to Gish, and the suit would have abated as to him. And this perhaps would have been the more regular course: but we are now considering the question in an appellate court. We are now asked to reverse the judgment and all the proceedings, because, by the direction of the plaintiff, process was not served upon one of the defendants, when it appears by the defendant’s own showing that this direction was wholly immaterial, and no such service could by possibility have been had. Three of the defendants were discharged upon the pleas of non est factum. This occurred fifteen years ago. Where these parties now are, whether living or dead, it is impossible to tell. If we sustain this objection, we cannot enter judgment for the defendant Bush, as is contended. All that we could do under the circumstances would be to set aside all the proceedings as to all the defendants, and remand the cause, in order to afford the plaintiff an opportunity of issuing new process against William Gish, or of showing why the original process was not served upon him. That he 425 *would show this very clearly, that he would make it appear that Gish had fled the country, and was not an inhabitant of the state when the suit was instituted, it is impossible for a moment to doubt. And after all this further expense and litigation the case would be in the precise condition it is now with respect to the pleadings, and was in fifteen years ago.

These considerations serve abundantly to show the wisdom of the rule requiring objections of this character to be taken certainly at some stage of the proceedings in the court below. And if no such rule existed, we are fortunately furnished by the defendant himself with the facts as they doubtless appeared in the court below, and which remove all objections to the alleged irregularity.

The next assignment of error to be considered presents the main question in the case. It is, whether in a joint action ex contractu against several defendants, some of whom are discharged by the verdict of the jury, upon grounds which show they were not parties to the contract, the plaintiff can have judgment against those who are parties. It is conceded that such a recovery is not authorized by the rules of the common law. The almost universally recognized doctrine is, that in an action against several defendants on a joint contract plaintiff cannot recover judgment against part of them; he must have a joint judgment against all, or he cannot have it against any. If the contract be several as well as joint, the action must be against all the obligees jointly or against one of them singly, and not against any intermediate number. If the plaintiff elects to proceed against all, the same consequences ensue as in an action on a joint contract; he must have judgment against all or none. Taylor v. Beck, 426 3 *Rand. 316; Baber v. Cook, 11 Leigh 606; 3 Rob. Prac. 100.

If these rules of the common law are in force in Virginia, it is conceded that the plaintiffs cannot have judgment in this case against the defendant. It is claimed however, that they have been changed by statute. The provision relied upon is the following: "In an action founded on contract, against two or more defendants, although the plaintiff may be barred as to one or more of them, yet he may have judgment against any other or others of the defendants against whom he would have been entitled to recover if he had sued them only." Code of 1860, chap. 177, sec. 19.

This section was first enacted at the revision of 1849-'50. It is claimed by the counsel for the plaintiff, that under the operation of this provision, the plaintiff in a joint action on contract against several defendants, may have judgment against part of them although the others are acquitted upon grounds which go to the denial of the joint contract stated in the declaration.

On the other hand, it is insisted for the defendant that the statute does not apply to a case in which the right of action never existed as to a part of the defendants; that the legislature could never have intended to authorize the plaintiff to declare upon one contract and recover upon another; that the sole design of the enactment was to reach those cases in which the contract is proved as laid, but by reason of some personal disability, such as infancy, or some subsequent discharge, such as bankruptcy, personal to him who pleads it, the plaintiff's action is barred as to part of the defendants. In these and like cases it is said that the statute applies, and although the 427 action *is barred as to part, judgment may be rendered against the others.

The provision now under consideration has been before this court in two cases; and although the precise question arising here was not decided in either of them, the language of the judges indicates a manifest disposition to give the statute an enlarged and liberal interpretation. The first case is that of Steptoe v. Read, 19 Gratt. 1. That was an action of assumpsit against two as partners, alleging a joint contract. One of the defendants, Quarles, was offered as a witness to prove that he alone was liable, and that Steptoe, the other defendant, was no party to the contract. It was very clear that at common law Quarles was incompetent, because, in defeating a recovery as to Steptoe, he defeated it as to himself, upon the plain principle that in a joint action against several there can be but one final judgment, which must be for or against all the defendants. It was insisted, however, that the statute removed this difficulty in authorizing a judgment against some of the defendants, although the plaintiffs may be barred as to others. Judge Joynes conceded that under the statute Quarles was competent to prove that Steptoe was no party to the contract, "which was a defense personal to him," Steptoe. The learned counsel says this was a mere concession made by Judge Joynes for the sake of the argument. This may be so. But if, as contended by the learned counsel, the rule of the common law which requires the joint contract to be proved as laid is not changed by the statute, it is very clear that Quarles was not a competent witness, even under the statute, to prove that Steptoe was no party to the contract, and the learned judge would have so said, without taking a circuitous route to 428 *prove that Quarles was incompetent upon other grounds.

However this may be, the opinion in that case shows the distinction between a defense which goes to the foundation of the entire contract, and a defense which is merely personal to him who pleads it, and does not touch the liability of the other defendants. The former necessarily defeats the action as to all, and is therefore not within the influence of the statute. Such is the defense of illegality or failure of consideration, or a release to one of several joint contractors, and the like.

On the other hand, the latter bars the action only as to him who pleads it; as for example the plea of infancy, bankruptcy, non est factum, and the like. These pleas operate to the discharge of the party pleading them; but do not necessarily affect the liability of the other defendants. Whenever the defence of one of several defendants is of such a character that the plaintiff might recover against the other, if the suit was against that other only, there the statute applies. In other words, if notwithstanding the discharge or acquittal of one of the defendants, the plaintiff might at common law commence a new action and recover against him who is liable, he is entitled under the statute to a judgment against that defendant in the pending action. As, in the present case, three of the defendants were discharged upon grounds personal to them; and as the plaintiff might thereupon discontinue and commence a new action against the defendant Bush, he is entitled under the statute to proceed against the latter in the present action without a discontinuance and a new suit. This, I think, is substantially the construction given to the 429 statute in Stephoe v. Read. This construction is not only just and sound, but it would seem to furnish a very reasonable test for determining what cases are within the influence of the statute.

In Moffett v. Bickle, 21 Gratt. 280, the action was upon a negotiable note against the maker and four endorsers. The jury found that the note and all the endorsements but the last were usurious, but that the last was free from usury. The question was whether judgment could be given against this last endorser; and this depended solely upon the statute; for it was clear that no such judgment could be rendered at common law. The president of this court speaking for all the judges said: "If the statute does not apply to such a case, it is difficult to conceive of one to which it will apply, and the statute will be of no value. There is no need to apply it to the case of a joint action or contract against several defendants, one of whom is entitled to his personal discharge on the ground of infancy, bankruptcy, &c. Cases of this sort we have seen, constitute exceptions to the general rule requiring judgment to be rendered against all or none in joint actions ex contractu." It will thus be seen that this case does not decide the precise question now before us, because in point of fact, all the defendants did make the contract as averred, while it was valid as to part of them only. The case is only mentioned as showing the leaning of this court to give to the statute a liberal interpretation.

A careful examination of the statute will show there is nothing in its language warranting the construction given it by the learned counsel for the defendant. It has been already quoted, but it may with advantage be repeated. "In an action founded on contract against two or more de- 430 fendants, although the plaintiff *may be barred as to one or more of them, yet he may have judgment against any other or others of the defendants against whom he would have been entitled to recover if he had sued them only."

Upon what principle are these words to be confined to cases in which the plea of the defendant admits the contract alleged, but sets up some matter in discharge of the obligation. The word "barred" gives countenance to no such idea. Non assumpsit is a plea "in bar" of the action; so is non est factum. If the defendant makes good his defence under either of these pleas, plaintiff is "barred of his action" as to him. If the defence does not affect the obligation of the other defendants—if the plaintiff would be entitled to recover against such other defendants had he sued them only—he is by the express terms of the statute entitled to judgment against them in the pending action.

The counsel for the defendant, in a very elaborate note of argument, presents very strongly some of the mischiefs which he supposes will result from this construction of the statute. For example, he suggests that the same rule must apply to actions on simple contract. A defendant may be sued with another on a joint assumpsit, which he knows he has made, but from which he has been discharged by payment or otherwise, and he has also assumed individually another debt to the same plaintiff, which he has likewise discharged; he goes to trial prepared to prove his defence on the joint contract, but the plaintiff proves his individual assumpsit as to which he is not prepared.

This argument, it must be admitted, assumes the existence of a very unusual transaction. It assumes the defendant has made two simple contracts with the plaintiff, one joint and the other several; that both have been performed; that the 431 plaintiff brings his suit *on the joint contract; and with a fraudulent intent he and his counsel on the trial abandon the joint contract, and elect to proceed for that which is several.

Now, conceding that this may sometimes happen, the same difficulty may occur in an action of trespass, trover, assault and battery, false imprisonment against several: the defendant may come prepared to defend himself on the joint charge, and the plaintiff may elect to proceed for a several trespass. And yet it is well settled that in actions of tort against several, one of the defendants may be convicted by the jury, while others are acquitted.

But it is difficult to see how a case, such as that suggested, can ever occur, if the parties observe the ordinary rules of pleading. The declaration must always so state the cause of action, as to give the defendant notice of the precise nature of the complaint. In assumpsit the plaintiff is required to file an account setting forth the several items, unless they are plainly described in the declaration. The defendant thus plainly sees what he is charged with. He knows what he is required to defend, whether he is sued singly or jointly with others. The rule in question authorizes the plaintiff to declare against several as upon a joint contract, and to recover against a part of the defendants. But this is the only variance. The proofs must correspond with the allegations in every other respect, and the plaintiff must prove his case as laid. Unless therefore the defendant has made two contracts with the same plaintiff, one joint and the other several, both identically the same in all the essential elements of consideration, subject-matter and promise of performance, it is impossible that the plaintiff can surprise the defendant by abandoning the contract laid in the declaration, and proving another on the trial.

432 *The learned counsel further insists, that under this construction of the statute a person may be joined as a defendant, merely to exclude him as a witness, or for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the court of a particular county against a non-resident defendant.

It is sufficient to say, that conduct of this kind would be treated as a fraud upon the non-resident, and an abuse of the process of the court. The exposure would be easy, and the punishment immediate, in the dismissal of the suit as to such non-resident, or in the prompt discharge of the defendant, whose testimony is thus sought to be excluded. Laws are passed, and rules of practice adopted by the courts, suited to the general convenience of parties and the due administration of justice among men. Any rule that may be adopted will sometimes lead to abuse and injustice. The remedy is not in the repeal of the rule or statute, but in the corrective power of the courts.

Again, the counsel argues that the defendant may have set-offs against the debt, but he is not allowed to file them, because they are due him individually, whereas the debt claimed is sued as a joint obligation; or the defendant may have signed the bond sued on with express condition that the other parties were also to sign,—how can he avail himself of this plea until it is ascertained whether the other parties are bound?

The difficulty last mentioned would equally occur if the defendants relying upon the pleas of non est factum, should die before suit brought, or even afterwards and before the pleas were tried. The action being against the survivor only, how could he plead that his contract was conditional. In this very case, the bond being several as well as joint, the suit might have been first against the defendant Bush, omitting the others; and thus, according to the 433 argument of the learned counsel, *his client would have been precluded from pleading that his contract was conditional. The argument unfortunately proves too much.

But the answer to all this reasoning is, that the defendant knows at least the tenor of his own contract. When he sees his co-defendants thus denying the execution of the bond, if he meant to rely upon the fact that he signed the instrument conditionally upon their executing it also, he ought to put that matter in issue by proper averments, and he clearly has the right to do so. His success will depend in a great measure upon their success in making good their defence. If they fail he will also fail, and the burden will fall upon all.

In regard to the question of set-offs, the difficulty suggested by counsel equally arises where the action is several and one of the defendants relies upon the plea of bankruptcy, infancy, or any other matter which goes to the personal discharge of such defendant.

In all this class of cases it is conceded that although one of the defendants may be acquitted, the plaintiff may nevertheless have judgment against him who is liable; and yet the latter may be deprived of his set-offs by a joinder with him who is not liable. How does the learned counsel propose to get rid of this difficulty; one, no doubt, of frequent occurrence in the administration of justice. All the defendant can do under such circumstances, is to bring his cross-action, obtain his judgment, and at the proper time apply to the proper court to have the judgments set off one against the other. The practice of setting off one judgment against another is derived from the general authority of the common law courts over sureties, and is said to be the exercise of an equitable jurisdiction

434 *in those courts; a jurisdiction liberally exerted, and not confined to debts due to and from the same number of persons. The law of set-offs is almost exclusively a creature of statutory regulation. At common law it was never permitted unless the debts were mutual and grew out of one and the same transaction. If the effect of the statute is to restore that rule in a few exceptional cases—no doubt of rare occurrence—and to put a defendant to his separate action, it is difficult to see that any great hardship or injustice is thereby inflicted. Clearly there is no just cause of complaint where the defendant by his form of contract, deliberately executed, places it in the power of the creditor to sue one or all the obligors to the bond.

In regard to all the views presented by the counsel for the defendant, it may with perfect truth be said, that none of them apply to his client. The defendant Bush was not precluded from relying upon any set-off he might claim, or of offering his plea of a conditional obligation. He had the fullest opportunity after the case was tried on the pleas of non est factum, of making any defence he could have made if the action had been against him only. It was never pretended or even suggested that he had any defence other than that of usury.

It is very true that Bush resided in Franklin, and that jurisdiction was given to the Roanoke court as to him by joining the three defendants who are acquitted. But it has never been even intimated that the plaintiff was guilty of bad faith in so doing. He no doubt honestly believed that all the parties had executed the bond. The statute declares that the suit may be brought in any county wherein either of the defendants resides, and it authorizes process to be sent to the distant counties for the co-defendants.

435 *It could scarcely have been the design of the legislature that a plaintiff who pursues the statute does so at his peril; and that whenever a resident co-defendant is acquitted by the verdict, the action must abate as to him who resides in another county. If the plaintiff honestly believes that both defendants are liable, and has reasonable grounds for so believing, he is entitled to proceed as though all were in fact liable. The jurisdiction of the court having once attached, will not be ousted because it turns out that the resident de-defendants are not liable. In such case, a prima facie defendant is a proper defendant for all the purposes of jurisdiction. As already said, if the process of the court is abused, and a mere pretext made to give a color of jurisdiction, the corrective power of the court will be used in punishing the offence by a prompt dismissal of the suit at the cost of the offending party.

I have thus attempted to notice some of the more prominent objections of the counsel for the defendant to the statute, according to our interpretation. These objections might have been more properly addressed to the legislature, in as much as the courts must execute the law as they find it, and not as they would have it. It may not be amiss, however, to consider briefly some of the mischiefs which will result from a contrary interpretation. These may throw some light upon the design of the legislature in passing the statute.

In the first place, the rule requiring a plaintiff in an action ex contractu against several defendants to prove the contract as to all, is a mere rule of the common law. Like many other of the common law rules, it is purely technical in its nature, in many instances producing great delay and much inconvenience without any corresponding advantages. The defendants *very rarely derive any real substantial benefit from it. Whether one or many be sued, the parties soon understand by the pleadings the real matter of controversy, and come prepared to meet it.

On the other hand, the plaintiff often encounters difficulties, not only as to the form of action, but also in determining the proper parties defendant. A person in possession of a written obligation as obligee or assignee, signed, or purporting to have been signed by several, and honestly believing they are all liable, brings his suit against all. He is met on the trial with a plea of non est factum by one or more of the defendants. A verdict is rendered in his favor, bills of exception are taken, writ of error allowed, a reversal by the appellate court; other trials are had, and finally a verdict for the defendants upon these pleas. And then, after years of fruitless litigation and expense, the plaintiff is compelled to start out upon a new expedition against the other defendants who are confessedly liable, and who never had a shadow of defence. And all this because the plaintiff had sued five defendants, when he ought to have sued four or a less number. But why go in pursuit of imaginary cases, when the one before us furnishes a most apt illustration. The plaintiff was in possession of a bond probably brought to him by the principle obligor. He doubtless believed that all the signatures were genuine. The presumption is, he would not have taken it if he had not so believed. Upon the trial he is met with pleas of non est factum by three of the defendants. What was he to do under such circumstances—dismiss his suit and commence a new one against the others? That will scarce be contended. He was not bound to give up the security furnished by these three apparent obligors. It was his right and his duty to try the *question.

Until the case was actually decided by a jury, it was impossible to say whether the defence would be successful or not. The defendant Bush was himself materially interested in the issue; for if the plaintiff succeeded, the burden which otherwise must be borne by him singly would be shared by others equally with him. It is not pretended that the defendant Bush is discharged from his obligation by the acquittal of the other defendants. All that is claimed is that the plaintiff ought to discontinue and commence a new suit against him. But why bring a new suit? All the facts necessary to enable the defendant to make his defence are already in the record. Why turn the plaintiff around to another action, when perfect justice can be done and was done to the parties in this? I am justified in saying that justice was done, because it does not appear—no complaint is made—that any damage or loss was sustained by this defendant in the present action which might have been avoided in a separate suit against him. The objections made by his counsel are purely technical, and do not affect the real merits of the controversy. And now, after the lapse of fifteen years, we are called upon to reverse the present judgment, not because injustice has been done this defendant, but because the plaintiff brought a joint action against all, instead of a separate action against each. This simple statement is of itself sufficient to vindicate the wisdom of the statute. If the legislature had never passed such a provision, the common voice of the profession would say that such an enactment is demanded by the highest considerations of justice and sound policy.

The only remaining assignment of error to be considered is, that the jury being sworn to try all the issues joined, it was improper to permit them to render *a verdict in favor of a part of the defendants on some of those issues. The learned counsel for the defendant, in his note of argument, quotes a remark made by Judge Green in Gardner's adm'r v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106, that there is no example of a verdict being set aside as to one issue and suffered to stand as to others, and trying a cause by piece-meal; and the learned counsel insists that the converse of the proposition is equally true, that "there is no example of a jury being allowed to render a verdict on one issue when they cannot agree as to others, and thus trying the cause by piece-meal." As has been already seen, at common law if the plaintiff elected to treat the contract as joint, and sued all the contracting parties, his judgment must have been jointly against all or none. There could, of course, be but one final judgment. As a necessary consequence the jury could never find part of the issues for a portion of the defendants.

But if our construction of the statute be correct, if notwithstanding the acquittal of a part of the defendants upon grounds personal to them, the plaintiff may still have judgment against the others, no good reason suggests itself why such judgment may not be had at a subsequent term of the court. If the jury are agreed as to some of the defendants upon issues personal to them, why should they be prohibited from rendering a verdict as to such defendants merely because they are not agreed as to others who make a wholly different defence? Why should the plaintiff be precluded from assenting to such a verdict if he is satisfied it is justified by the evidence? Is he to go on from term to term summoning witnesses, empanelling juries, and incurring increased expense, in support of an issue he knows must always be decided against 439 *him? Is one defendant to incur the trouble and expense of successive trials because the jury are not agreed upon other issues as to other defendants, with whom he is in no manner connected? If such a rule be adopted, the result will be that the plaintiff will always bring several actions against the obligors, of which they must bear the costs, when a single action would answer but for the rule.

The plaintiff is authorized by statute to take judgment from time to time against the defendants as they are served with process. Long before this enactment it was the constant practice, where some of the defendants had not been arrested, for the plaintiff to take judgment against those who were, although those not arrested had not been proceeded against as far as the law authorized. 1 Rob. Prac. 258-'9; Moss v. Moss's adm'r, 4 Hen. & Mun. 293. This was in effect allowing several judgments against several defendants at different times, in a joint action on contract. And I can see no good reason why, under the influence of the statute, there may not be separate verdicts as to different defendants, where the issues are entirely distinct, and the plaintiff is barred as to part of them upon grounds which do not affect the liability of the others.

I have had no access to any reported cases in states where statutes similar to ours are in force; but in Hilliard on New Trials, 145, note a, reference is made to the case of Sprague v. Childs, 16 Ohio St. R. 107. It is said to have been decided in this case, where there are several defendants, each of whom pleads a separate defence, upon which issues are joined, and a second trial is taken (under the Ohio Code) by one of the defendants, the only issues then to be tried are those between plaintiff and defendant.
 440 If the defendant's *plea goes to the plaintiff's right to recover against any of the defendants, it will, so far as it is established, enure to the benefit of the other defendants as fully as it would have done upon the first trial. But if the defence of the defendant goes no farther than to exonerate himself from liability, the liabilities of the others will remain unaffected by the result of the second trial. This is substantially the proposition involved in the case before us—several verdicts at different terms as to different defendants, whose defences are not connected.

It has been urged that the defendant, Bush, was vitally interested in the trial of the pleas of non est factum, and a verdict thereon ought not to have been received without his consent.

The defendant had the fullest opportunity of taking part in the trial of the pleas of non est factum. How long was the case to be continued upon those issues? How many trials to be had until the defendant himself was convinced of the hopelessness of the struggle?

If the defendant was interested, so was the plaintiff, in showing that all the signatures to the bond were genuine. The latter seems to have been satisfied that the defence was well founded. If the jury had, at the same term of the court, rendered a verdict upon the plea of usury as to the defendant, Bush, he would have had no just cause of complaint; and yet his condition, in that event, would have been no better than it is now. Suppose after the verdict was rendered in favor of the three defendants the plaintiff had discontinued and commenced a new action against the present defendant, in what respect would his position have been improved? So soon as those defendants were out of the way, the defendant, Bush, could make any defence he might have made had they been omitted in the first 441 *instance. So far from being prejudiced, he was actually benefited by the rendition of the separate verdict. He made no objection to it. It seems to have been acquiesced in on all sides, no doubt from a consciousness that the result was inevitable, and could not be varied upon any future trial. The jury being unable to agree upon the question of usury were discharged by consent of all parties. This was at the April term 1859. More than a year thereafter the verdict was rendered against the defendant, Bush. His motion, in arrest of judgment, did not embrace this objection. It was made for the first time in the petition for an appeal. If there was any weight in the objection at any time, it was one the defendant might prefer to waive, and one he had the right to waive. Having seen without objection the return of the separate verdict, having agreed to the discharge of the jury upon the other issue, having subsequently moved for a continuance of the case, and having taken his chances before another jury, where his defence was fully investigated, the defendant cannot be permitted for the first time in this court to make the point in this court, but must be held to have waived the irregularity, if indeed it could be regarded as an irregularity.

Upon the whole, I am of the opinion the judgment of the Circuit court is right, and should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

*Hoback v. Kilgores.

June Term, 1875, Wytheville.

1. Mistake—Mutual—Compensation.*—K sells to H a tract of land, expressing the belief, which he no doubt entertained, that there were 127 acres in the tract, and H relying on that belief purchased, and paid the purchase money. There were in fact but 81 acres. K having sold, and H having purchased under a mutual mistake, H is entitled to compensation for the deficiency.
2. Same—Same—Same—Measure.†—Although in cases of mere deficiency in quantity, within the boundaries of a tract sold, the general rule of compensation is according to the average value of the whole tract, yet where, as in this case, there are valuable improvements upon the land, the value of which bears a very large proportion to the value of the land, the just and true measure of compensation is according to the average value of the land without the improvements, considering both together with the price for which it was sold, estimating the quantity of the land, as the parties did, at 127 acres.
3. Sales of Land—Warranty—General—Special.—A vendor of land in his own right is bound to convey it with general warranty, unless it be otherwise agreed between the parties. But a party who had sold to the vendor, and had retained the legal title, or had some interest in the land, is only required to convey with special warranty.

This was suit in equity in the Circuit court of Wise county, brought in August 1872, by Levi Hoback against Isaac and Hiram Kilgore, to enforce a contract for the sale of a tract of land by Isaac Kilgore to Hoback.

*Mistake—Mutual—Compensation.—As to the necessity for mutuality in order to allow relief, see citation of the principal case in French v. Chapman, 88 Va. 322; Massie v. Heiskell, 80 Va. 801. See also, as to equitable relief, Manzy v. Sellars, 26 Gratt. 641. In Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 550, the court says: "The case of Hoback v. Kilgores is very imperfectly reported, the contract between vendor and vendee not being stated, nor its contents even alluded to by the court. The vendee was relieved in part from the payment of the purchase-money because of a deficiency. JUDGE MONCURE, on page 444 states, that 'the vendor represented to the vendee, that the quantity of the land was one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres; and the vendee made the purchase on the faith of that representation. Whereas in truth and in fact there were but eighty-one acres of land in the tract.' If this be a correct statement of the case, on the principles, which we have laid down, an abatement should have been made on account of the deficiency, as was done. But the reporter states a case essentially different, as does the syllabus; and if the reporter is right in his statement of the case, on correct principles no such relief could have been granted the vendee."

†Same—Same—Same—Measure.—The mode of ascertaining the compensation, as laid down in the principal case, is followed in Yost v. Mallicote, 77 Va. 614; Trinkle v. Jackson, 86 Va. 241; Nichols v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 847; Triplett v. Allen, 26 Gratt. 721; Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287. See especially, Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 718, and note. The principal case is cited in 21 Am. Rep. 317.

The plaintiff in his bill charged that Isaac Kilgore had sold him the land, and assured him that the tract contained one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres, for which he was to pay him $1,400; which he had paid. That he had since had the land surveyed, and the tract in fact contained but eighty-one acres and a fraction. He therefore claimed compensation for the deficiency.

The defendant, Isaac Kilgore, in his answer, insisted that he sold the land by the boundaries, and denied that he gave assurance of any particular quantity.

It appears from the evidence, that Isaac Kilgore had purchased the land from his brother Hiram Kilgore, in 1856, and they estimated that there was in the tract one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres; and that he expressed strongly to Hoback, at the time of the sale to him, that he believed, as he no doubt did believe, that there was that quantity of land; and that Hoback purchased supposing there was that quantity.

It appeared further, that Isaac Kilgore had, after his purchase of the land, put improvements on it, consisting of a dwelling-house, a barn and other outhouses, also a tan-yard and a grist-mill.

And it also appeared, that at the time of the sale to Hoback, the title to the land was in the Commonwealth.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 4th day of April 1874, when the court held that the sale to the plaintiff was a sale in gross, and that Isaac Kilgore was not liable to account for any deficiency in the estimated number of acres of the land; and decreeing that Isaac and Hiram Kilgore should convey to the plaintiff all their right, interest and claim to the land, with special warranty, gave them their costs. From this decree Hoback applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Burns, for the appellant.

Gilmore, for the appellees.

444 *Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that there was a mutual mistake between the vendor and vendee in this case as to the quantity of land included in the boundaries of the tract sold by Isaac Kilgore to Levi Hoback, as in the proceedings mentioned; the vendor having represented to the vendee that the said quantity was one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres, and the vendee having made the purchase on the faith of that representation; whereas, in truth and in fact, there were but eighty-one acres of land in the said tract.

The court is further of opinion, that the vendee, having fully paid the purchase money of the said tract according to the contract of the parties, is entitled to be compensated for the said deficiency in the quantity of land in the said tract, according to the principles laid down in Blessing's adm'rs v. Beatty, 1 Rob. R. 287, and the cases therein cited.

The court is further of opinion, that although, in the case of a mere deficiency in quantity within the boundaries of a tract of land conveyed or contracted to be conveyed, the general rule of compensation is according to the average value of the whole tract—Id. p. 305; yet there will be a departure from that rule when particular circumstances require it—Id. And the court is of opinion, that there are such circumstances in this case, arising from the fact that there are valuable improvements upon the land, consisting of a dwelling-house, barn, and other outhouses, a tan-yard, and a grist-mill, the value of which improvements bears a very large proportion to the value of the land. And the court is therefore of opinion, that in this case the just and true

 445 measure of compensation *is according to the average value of the land without the improvements, considering both together to be worth the contract price of fourteen hundred dollars, estimating the quantity of the land, as the parties did, at one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres.

The court is further of opinion, that a vendor of real estate in his own right is bound to convey the same with general warranty, unless it be otherwise agreed between the parties; and there having been no such other agreement between these parties, the vendor, Isaac Kilgore, is bound to convey the said tract of land to the vendee, Levi Hoback, with general warranty. But though it is necessary for the appellee, Hiram H. Kilgore, who seems to have the legal title to or some interest in the land, to join in the said conveyance; yet as he was not the vendor, he is bound to convey only with special warranty.

And the court is therefore of opinion, that the Circuit court, instead of making the final decree which it did, ought to have decreed that the said vendee, Hoback, is entitled to a specific execution of the said contract for the purchase of the said tract of land, and to be compensated for the deficiency in the quantity of the said tract which was sold to him as containing one hundred and twenty-seven and a half acres, the said compensation to be ascertained in the manner aforesaid. And the court ought to have ascertained the extent of the deficiency and the amount of compensation to which the said vendee is entitled therefor, by a reference to a commissioner of the court, unless such reference had been rendered unnecessary by an agreement of the parties as to such extent and amount; and ought to have decreed the payment of the said amount with interest from the time at which it was due by the vendor to the 446 vendee, and the conveyance *of the said tract of land in fee simple to the vendee by the vendor Isaac Kilgore with general warranty, and by the said Hiram H. Kilgore with special warranty, and the payment by the said Isaac Kilgore of the costs of the plaintiff in this suit in the said Circuit court.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the decree appealed from is erroneous; and it is decreed and ordered that the same be reversed and annulled, that the appellee Isaac Kilgore pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here, and that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein to a final decree, in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

Which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Wise county.

Decree reversed.

Mechanics' Liens—Conveyance of Property Subject to.

—In March 1866 F entered into a written contract with H to erect for H on land in the country, certain buildings. The buildings were completed, and on a settlement H owed him $1,321.17, for which he gave to F his two notes dated the 4th of July 1867, one payable one day after date, and the other by the 1st of November 1867. On the 10th of January 1868 F had the contract recorded in the clerk's office of the county. In May 1868 F filed his bill against H, claiming a mechanics' lien on the land and buildings under his contract; and on the 8th of October the bill was taken for confessed, and a decree made that H should pay the amount due F; and if this was not done by the 15th of November, then the land and buildings should be sold &c. No sale was made under this decree, and before it was rendered, viz: on the 1st of October 1868, H conveyed the land to S, with general warranty, and other covenants of title. And S thereupon, in the name of H, moved the court to set aside the decree, as being erroneous. This motion was heard and overruled on the 31st of May 1873. And from this decree, and also the decree of the 8th of October 1868, S, in the name of H, obtained an appeal to this court. The cause came on here upon a motion by the appellee to dismiss the appeal, and also on the merits. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Appeal—Right of Assignee to Sue in Name of Assignor.—S is entitled to prosecute an appeal in the name of H, for the benefit of S, for the purpose of having the decree of the 8th of October reversed, and the said land discharged of the claim to said lien.

2. Decrees—Interlocutory—Statute of Limitations.—The decree of the 8th of October 1868 is not a final decree, and therefore, though it was rendered more than two years before the petition for the appeal was presented, yet the said
 448 petition *was not barred by the limitation prescribed by the Code, ch. 178, § 3, p. 1136.

3. Mechanics' Lien—Under Code of 1860—Construction.—On the 1st of March 1866, when the contract between H and F was entered into, the only

This case has never been cited or in any way referred to in subsequent cases in either Virginia or West Virginia, apparently, because of the fact that its decision was based solely upon statutory enactments which were soon after amended or abolished.

*JUDGE STAPLES had been counsel in the cause.

mechanics' lien was that provided for in the Code of 1860, p. 567, ch. 119, § 2, which provided for such lien only where the land on which the buildings were erected or repaired, was situate in a city or town; and that not being the fact in this case, F was not entitled to a mechanics' lien under that law for the money due him for erecting the buildings.

4. Same — Same — Application — Retrospection. —

Though said § 2, of ch. 119, was amended by the act of the 13th of April 1867, Sess. Acts 1866-'67, p. 805, ch. 88, and by that amendment gave a lien on land whether situate in a city or town or in the country, yet that act operates prospectively only, and not retrospectively also; and therefore does not give a mechanics' lien to F for the money due him on the contract.

5. Novation of Contract by Recordation. — Even if the said contract was duly admitted to record, the effect of said act was not to produce a novation of the contract, or to bring it down to the date of the recordation, so as to subject the said contract to the operation of the said act of April 13, 1867, and to give to F, under and by virtue of the same, the benefit of a mechanics' lien thereunder.

In May 1868 James Fields brought a suit in the Circuit court of Russell county against A. L. Hendricks, to enforce a mechanics' lien. In the bill filed in the suit, the complainant represented that on the 1st of March 1866 he and the defendant entered into a written contract, by which said Fields agreed to build certain brick houses for said Hendricks, upon the land of the latter in the county of Russell, on certain terms set out in said contract, which is marked A and exhibited with the bill; that the said contract was duly admitted to record in the clerk's office of Russell County court, on the 10th day of January 1868, as will appear by the official certificate of the clerk endorsed on the contract; that said Fields completed the work *according to the contract, and upon a settlement between the parties there was found to be due for said work a balance of $1321.17, for which said Hendricks executed his two notes to said Fields, one for $672.75, dated on the 1st day of July 1867, and due one day after date, and the other for $648.42, dated on the 4th day of July 1867, due by the 1st of November 1867; that the notes were still unpaid and due to the plaintiff, subject to the various credits endorsed on one of them; that six months had elapsed since the last instalment of the money to be paid under the contract became payable; and that he, the plaintiff, was advised that he had a lien upon the land on which said buildings were erected for the amounts still due him upon the notes aforesaid. (See acts 1866 and 1867, pages 805 to 806.) He therefore prayed that Hendricks might be made defendant to the bill, and be decreed to pay the money due as aforesaid, with interest and costs; that to secure such payment the specific lien aforesaid might be enforced, and for general relief.

On the contract marked A, and exhibited with the bill, is an endorsement in these words:

"This agreement between A. L. Hendricks and James Fields, bearing date the 1st day of March 1866, was delivered to me in the clerk's office of Russell County court, on the 10th day of January 1868, and admitted to record. Teste, J. C. Gent, D. C."

There is no other certificate endorsed on, or annexed to the agreement, and nothing to show it was acknowledged before the clerk or his deputy unless that fact can be properly inferred from the certificate endorsed thereon as aforesaid.

On the 8th of October 1868 the bill was taken for confessed, and the court being of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled 450 to the lien which he claimed, *decreed that he recover of the defendant the sum of $1321.17, with interest as aforesaid, and subject to the credits aforesaid; and that unless payment thereof was made by the 15th day of November 1868, then the land and buildings in the bill mentioned, or so much thereof as might be necessary, should be sold on the terms and in the manner mentioned in the decree, by a commissioner therein named, who was directed to report his proceedings to the court.

No sale was ever made under the said decree, and before it was rendered, to wit: on the 1st day of October 1868, the said Hendricks and wife, by deed executed by himself and wife, and bearing date and duly recorded on that day in the clerk's office of the County court of Russell, conveyed to William A. Stuart, in fee simple and with general warranty and other covenants of title, a tract of land in said county, including the land on which the said Fields claimed a mechanics' lien as aforesaid. And the said Stuart contending that there was error in the proceedings in the suit of Fields v. Hendricks, in which it had been decreed that the former had a mechanics' lien on the land of the latter as aforesaid, and that he was entitled as assignee of said Hendricks, and in the name of said Hendricks, to have said decree set aside and reversed, he, the said Stuart, accordingly, in the name of said Hendricks, moved the Circuit court of Russell, in pursuance of a written notice to that effect, to set aside and annul the said decree, as being erroneous and contrary to law and equity; assigning as error that there was no law giving such lien, and because the contract, on which said lien was claimed, had never been duly acknowledged and admitted to record. After sundry proceedings were had on the motion, it was finally heard on the 31st day of May 1873, when it was overruled with costs by the court.

451 *From the said decree overruling the said motion, as well as from the said decree of the 8th day of October 1868, the said Hendricks, or the said Stuart in the name of the said Hendricks, applied to a judge of this court for an appeal, which was accordingly allowed.

While the appeal was pending, the appellee submitted a motion to dismiss it on two grounds: 1st, that the appellant had given an order for that purpose, which was duly authenticated and filed with the record; and that the said Stuart had no right to prosecute the said appeal in the name of the said Hendricks; and, 2dly, that more than two years having elapsed after the said decree of the 8th day of October 1868 was rendered, and before the petition for an appeal therefrom was presented, the said appeal was barred by the act of limitations. Evidence was taken and filed by both parties; that is, the said Fields and the said Stuart, in regard to the first of these two grounds, and the cause came on to be heard by the Court of Appeals, both upon the motion to dismiss the appeal and upon the appeal itself at the same time.

Terry & Pierce, for the appellant.

Cummings and J. A. Campbell, for the appellee.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the appellant A. L. Hendricks having by deed executed by himself and wife, bearing date and duly recorded in the clerk's office of the County court of Russell on the first day of October 1868, conveyed to William A. Stuart, in fee simple and with general warranty and other covenants of title, a tract of land in said county, including 452 *the land on which the appellee James Fields claims in this case a mechanics' lien, the said Stuart is entitled, as assignee of the said Hendricks, to prosecute in his name and for the benefit of the said Stuart this appeal, for the purpose of having the decree of the Circuit court in this case reversed and the said land relieved and discharged of the claim to the said lien. And the court doth therefore overrule the motion of the appellee to dismiss this appeal upon the ground that the said Stuart has no right to prosecute the same in the name of the said Hendricks.

The court is further of opinion, that the decree appealed from in this case is not a final decree; and therefore, though it was rendered more than two years before the petition for the said appeal was presented, yet the said petition was not barred by the limitation prescribed by the Code, chapter 178, section 3, page 1136. The court doth therefore overrule the motion to dismiss the said appeal upon the ground that the said petition was barred by the said limitation.

The court is further of opinion, that as on the 1st day of March 1866, when the contract between said Hendricks and Fields was entered into for the erection of certain buildings by the said Fields for the said Hendricks, as mentioned and set forth in the agreement marked A and filed with the bill, and as for a long time thereafter, and until the work contracted for as aforesaid had been fully executed, the only law of this state which provided for a mechanics' lien was that laid down in the Code of 1860, page 567, chapter 119, section 2, which provided for such lien only where the land on which the buildings were to be erected or repaired was situated in a city or town; and as the land on which the buildings were contracted to be erected in the agreement aforesaid 453 was situate not in *a city or town but in the country; therefore the said Fields was not entitled to a mechanic's lien under the said law for the money due to him for erecting the said buildings.

The court is further of opinion, that although by an act passed afterwards, to-wit: on the 13th day of April 1867, Acts of Assembly 1866-'67, page 805, chap. 36, the said second section of the Code of 1860 was amended by omitting the words "in a city or town," in the first line of the said section, the effect of which amendment was to give a lien on the land whether it be situate in a city or town or in the country; yet that act operates prospectively only, and not retrospectively also, and therefore does not give a mechanics' lien to the said Fields for the money due to him as aforesaid.

The court is further of opinion, that even if it be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the said agreement was duly admitted to record, the effect of that act was not to produce a novation of the contract or to bring it down to the date of such recordation, so as to subject the said agreement to the operation of the said act of assembly, and to give to the said Fields, under and by virtue of the same, the benefit of a mechanics' lien as aforesaid.

The court therefore, without deciding whether the said agreement was duly admitted to record or not (a question not necessary to be decided in this case), is of opinion that the appellee is not entitled to the lien which he claims, and that the decree of the Circuit court is therefore erroneous, and ought to be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again as well the said
454 appellant as *the said appellee by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the said motion together with the depositions, affidavits and exhibits, and the arguments of counsel touching the same, doth, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, overrule the said motion to dismiss the appeal; and having further maturely considered the transcript of the said decree and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the said decree is erroneous; therefore it is decreed and ordered that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the appellee pay to William A. Stuart (for whom and at whose expense the appeal is prosecuted) the costs of the appellant in the prosecution of the same. And this court proceeding to render such decree as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is further decreed and ordered that the appellee's bill be dismissed, and that the appellee pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the said Circuit court.

Motion to dismiss the appeal overruled.

Decree reversed.

455 *Ashby's adm'or & als. v. Porter & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Absent, BOULDIN, J.*

Notes—Confederate Currency.—The note of A & Sons, partners, given in renewal of notes due before the war, was discounted at the bank in Winchester on the 30th of January 1862, and fell due on the 3d of April, when it was protested for non-payment. On the 7th of March, before the note was due, the bank removed to Farmville, and there did business until the end of the war. A & Sons wishing to take up this note, agreed with P, whose business frequently carried him to Richmond, to take up the note for them, they agreeing to give him their note for the amount; and his agent Y having been sent to Richmond on the business of P, by his directions went on to Farmville and took up the note, paying the bank in Confederate money at par. On his return he took the note of A & Sons for $7723.24, dated the 19th of April 1862, payable in one year, which included principal, interest and charges, and their note was delivered to them. Nothing was said either when the arrangement was made with P, or when the note was given to him, as to the kind of currency in which it was to be paid. HELD:

1. Same—Same.†—The debt of A & Sons to P is a Confederate debt.

2. Same—Time When Scale Is to Be Applied.—It is to be scaled as of the date of the note, and not as of the date of its maturity.

3. Partnership Debts—Liability of Real Estate for.‡—Though A is dead, and he is largely indebted individually as well as a partner, his real estate is equally liable for this partnership debt, as for his individual debts. See Code of 1849, ch. 144, § 18.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Clarke county, brought in 456 August 1866 by Colin C.*Porter against the administrator with the will annexed of Buckner Ashby, deceased, and others claiming under him, to subject the estate of said Ashby to pay a debt due to the plaintiff from Buckner Ashby & Sons, who had been partners. In the progress of the cause, under an order of the court, a commissioner reported an account of debts due from Buckner Ashby individually, and also of debts due from Buckner Ashby & Sons as partners. It does not appear that there was any dispute about any of the debts reported, except that of the plaintiff. As to that, the questions were whether it was or was not a Confederate debt; and if a Confederate debt whether it should be scaled as of the date of the note, or as of the time it fell due. There was also a further question, whether being a partnership debt it could be decreed to be paid out of the estate of Buckner Ashby, until his individual debts were paid.

The case came on to be heard on the 11th of November 1872, when the court held that the plaintiff's debt was to be scaled as of the day of the date of the note, and made a decree in favor of him and of many other creditors of both classes. From this decree Buckner Ashby's adm'ors, and the other parties in the same interest, obtained an appeal from a judge of this court. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

McDonald and A. Moore, for the appellants.

Andrew Hunter, S. J. C. Moore and D. B. Lucas, for the appellee.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The principal questions involved in
457 the case are, *whether the debt in controversy was a good money debt, or a Confederate money debt, and if the latter, whether it should be scaled, and if so, in reference to what time the scale should be applied, whether to the time of the date of the note, or to the time of its maturity? The court below decided that the debt was a Confederate money debt, that it ought to be scaled, and that the scale should be applied in reference to the time of the date of the note, and not the time of its maturity. Another question arose, and was decided in the case, which will sufficiently appear in the opinion about to be delivered.

The note in question was made by B. Ashby & Sons; was dated the 19th day of April 1862; was payable twelve months after date to Colin C. Porter, and was for the sum of $7,723.24. The origin of the note was as follows:

B. Ashby & Sons at that time resided and were engaged as partners in the manufacture of flour in the county of Clarke. They were indebted before the war in various notes to the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Winchester, which were renewed from time to time, and afterwards consolidated into one note. This note was discounted on the 30th of January 1862, was payable at said bank sixty days after date, and was due March 31st and April 3d, 1862, when it was protested for non-payment. On the 7th of March 1862 the bank removed from Winchester to Farmville, and there continued open and doing business till the close of the war. Ashby & Sons were anxious to take up their note, thus being under protest at the bank in Farmville, but not finding it convenient to do so, or to go to Farmville for that purpose, they made an arrangement with Porter to take it up for them. He was at that time
458 a resident of the adjacent county of Jefferson, *in West Virginia, and was largely engaged in manufacturing and †Notes—Confederate Currency.—The rules in the principal case for the kind of currency in which such notes are to be paid and the time when they are to be scaled, are followed in Burton v. Slaughter, 26 Gratt. 921; Jarrett v. Nickell, 9 W. Va. 353. See also, Fultz v. Davis, 26 Gratt. 903.

‡Partnership Debts—Liability of Real Estate for.—The proposition, that the separate estate of a deceased partner is liable pari passu for both his individual and social debts, is applied in Robinson v. Allen, 85 Va. 731; Pettyjohn v. Woodruff, 86 Va. 480. See also, V. C. § 2855, which is a verbatim re-enactment of the statute cited in the principal case on this subject.

selling woollen goods, and his business frequently required him to go or send to Richmond; in fact he was engaged in the business of blockade running, as it was called. He had money to invest, and did not know what to do with it. Ashby & Sons said to him they had a note at the bank in Farmville under protest, and were anxious to pay it. Porter told them that his agent, Young, had to go to Richmond to sell some goods, and might go on to Farmville and pay it for them. Ashby & Sons then said they would give their note with security to Porter for the amount. He said he did not require security, and it was agreed between them that if he demanded a return of the money, when they could not rise it, he would take flour for it, at a price which was then agreed upon them. There was no agreement or understanding between the parties about the currency in which the debt was to be paid by Porter to the bank. Nothing was said on that subject. Almost the only currency which then existed in Winchester or in Farmville, or elsewhere in the state, not in the hands of the enemy, was Confederate currency, and the said bank, and all other banks in the state, where that currency existed, received it in payment of debts due to them. Young, the agent of Porter, in pursuance of the arrangement aforesaid, went on from Richmond to Farmville, paid the note of Ashby & Sons to the bank, received it, and brought it to them, took from them another note, payable to Porter at twelve months, for the amount of the debt, including interest and charges of protest, being the note for $7,723.24 aforesaid, and returned to them their note to the bank. The payment was made by Young to the bank in Confederate currency. Nothing was 459 said by the parties, or *either of them, as to the currency in which the new note was to be paid. That note was not paid at maturity, nor was any payment made on account of it during the war. After the close of the war the controversy involved in this suit arose between the parties, and the court below decreed in the suit as before stated; and from that decree this appeal was taken. My opinion upon the several points presented by the appeal is as follows:

First. I am of opinion that the debt due by Buckner Ashby & Sons to the Farmers Bank of Virginia at Winchester, which was paid by Colin C. Porter for said Ashby & Sons in April 1862, after the removal of said bank from Winchester to Farmville, during, and in consequence of the war, was, at the time of such payment, a specie or good money debt. It was due by a note dated the 30th day of January 1862, payable sixty days after date, for $7,700, and discounted on the day of its date by said bank for said firm. It was made and discounted as a renewal of notes before made and discounted at the said bank, which notes were in their origin ante-war debts, and of course payable in specie or good money, and the presumption in the absence of any evidence to the contrary is, that the said note, made in continuation of the same loan and accommodation, was intended to be payable in the same currency.

The said note, being at the time of its payment a good money debt, it would have been competent for the bank, the holder of the note, instead of receiving payment in Confederate money at par, to have demanded payment in good money. And it would have been competent for the bank, instead of receiving payment of the note in Confederate money from the debtor, to have sold and assigned it to Porter or any 460 *other person, in consideration of the same amount of Confederate money received from such assignee. And in that case it would have been competent for the assignee to have demanded payment of the note in good money. He would have been invested, by virtue of the assignment, with all the rights and remedies of the assignor in regard to the note. But,

Secondly. I am of opinion that Porter did not become the assignee of the note by paying the amount of it to the bank. There was no privity of contract between him and the bank in regard to the note. Its payment by him had the same effect in regard to the bank, and in regard to the continued existence of the note, as its payment by Ashby & Sons would have had. It was in effect paid by them, so far as the bank was concerned. So that Porter could not have maintained an action at all upon the note, either in his own name or in that of the bank, much less could he have recovered in such an action the amount of the note in good money. In the absence of any express contract between him and Ashby & Sons, his only right of action against them, arising from such payment, was an action of indebitatus assumpsit for so much money paid to their use, and the measure of his right of recovery in such action would have been the precise amount so paid. Having paid the par amount of the note in Confederate money, he would have been entitled to recover the value of such amount, at the time of such payment, with interest thereon from that time.

Thirdly. I am of opinion that the circumstances under which the payment was made by Porter, for Ashby & Sons, did not render the latter liable to him for any greater amount than they would have been liable for had the payment been made at their mere request. There was certainly no 461 express promise by *Ashby & Sons to pay to him any greater amount in value than it was necessary for him to pay in discharge of the note, even supposing that such a promise would have been free from the taint of usury; a point which need not be decided in this case, according to my view of it. It is not at all improbable, nay, it is probable, that Porter expected to receive good money from Ashby & Sons in payment of the amount he had paid for them in Confederate money in discharge of the note. His object was to make a good investment of his Confederate money, and we cannot see how he could have done so by receiving the same amount of the same kind of money at some future period. His going or sending to Farmville, to make the payment, was attended with trouble and expense, for which it seems no charge was made by him to them. He might have made profit on his Confederate money by trading upon it in the business of blockade running, in which he was engaged, or in buying land. He no doubt thought he would do better by investing it in a specie debt, which he probably supposed he was doing. He might perhaps have effected his object by negotiating with the bank, and obtaining from it an assignment of the note, instead of negotiating with Ashby & Sons, and making payment of the debt for them.

But while such was probably the expectation of Porter, the circumstances of the case do not warrant us in saying that such was the expectation or intention of Ashby & Sons, or that they intended to make any other contract than that which was implied in the payment of the money by him for their use and at their request. They may well have supposed that Porter, having perhaps more Confederate money than he needed, might have been willing to accommodate them by taking up *their 462 note to the bank, which he could hold at less risk than the same amount of Confederate money. They may have supposed that Porter had other business at Farmville, as he certainly had at Richmond, and would have incurred no additional expense in taking up the note for them, or that he would charge them any additional expense incurred by him in so doing; which they would no doubt readily have paid, if notified of the fact that such expense was incurred. They no doubt knew that the banks were receiving Confederate money at par in payment of debts due to them, and therefore knew that this debt to the bank could be paid in the same way. It is not to be presumed, in the absence of any evidence tending to prove the fact, that they would have given up the advantage of making payment in that way. I think, therefore, that there is not sufficient evidence in this case that there was any agreement of the parties, express or implied, that Ashby & Sons should be liable to Porter for any greater amount than that which Porter paid in discharge of their debt to the bank.

Fourthly. I am of opinion that the execution of the note by B. Ashby Sons to C. C. Porter for $7,723.24, with interest from date, dated the 19th day of April, 1862, payable twelve months after date, the said principal sum being the amount paid on the day of its date by the said Porter to the bank in discharge of a debt due to it by said Ashby & Sons, makes no difference in regard to the extent and amount of the liability of said Ashby & Sons to said Porter; and that the debt due by the former to the latter is to be scaled as of the 19th day of April 1862, precisely as if the said new note had not been executed. That note was not an extinguishment of the 463 pre-existing liability of Ashby & *Sons to Porter for the same debt arising from his having paid the debt to the bank for them and at their request; and though it postponed the right of action by Porter against Ashby & Sons until the note became payable, yet that note not having been paid, it was competent for Porter to sue at his election either upon the original right of action or upon the new note. Whether he sued upon the one or the other, the measure of liability and the time for scaling the debt was precisely the same. The new note was given, not to change the amount of the debt, but to extend the time for its payment, in consideration of which Ashby & Sons were to pay legal interest on the amount during the period of the extension. But certainly Porter had no idea of agreeing to receive less than the principal of his debt, and that, too, after waiting twelve months for its payment. Confederate money had already depreciated, and was continuing to depreciate; and it must have been morally certain, that at the end of twelve months the depreciation would be much greater, as actually turned out to be the case. Porter no doubt believed that the debt was due him in good money, and according to that view the new note was solvable only in good money. But if we suppose that he believed the debt to be due to him in Confederate money, we cannot suppose that he intended by the new note to agree to receive in its payment Confederate money at par, though much more depreciated at the maturity of the note than at its date. We must suppose in that case that he expected and intended to receive in payment of the note the value of the Confederate money paid by him for Ashby & Sons, with interest on that value from the date of the note till payment. That 464 even Ashby & Sons contemplated the date of the note, *and not its maturity, as the period at which the debt, if due in Confederate money, was to be scaled, is shown by the fact, that they stipulated for the right to pay it in flour at an agreed price, if when payment of the money was demanded they should not be ready to make such payment. Of course, the price of the flour was fixed in reference to its market value at the time of the date of the note. The act passed March 3, 1866, (Acts of Assembly 1865-'6, p. 185,) authorizes a contract in such cases "to be liquidated and settled by reducing the nominal amount due or payable under such contract in Confederate States Treasury notes to its true value at the time they were respectively made and entered into, or at such other time as may to the court seem right in the particular case." It seems to me to be right in this particular case, according to all the circumstances, most but not all of which I have detailed, that the debt, supposing it to be a Confederate debt, should be scaled as at the time the contract was made and entered into, to wit: the date of the note, (as was done by the court below,) and not at the time of its maturity, nor at any other time. The difficulty I have had in this case has been in determining whether the debt was a good money debt or a Confederate debt. Considering it to be a Confederate debt, I have none in determining that the date of the note and not its maturity is the proper period for applying the scale. Certainly that determination does full justice to Ashby & Sons, and places them precisely where they would have stood if they had paid their own Confederate money in discharge of their debt to the bank, instead of requesting Porter to pay it for them. To apply the scale, as at the time of the maturity of the note, would do gross injustice to Porter. I am therefore for applying it as at the date of the note.

465 *The only other objection made to the decree of the court below is, "that it was error upon any application of the scale to decree the payment of a debt due from B. Ashby & Sons out of lands belonging to the estate of B. Ashby, deceased, late one of the members of said firm, after the dissolution of the partnership, and until the individual creditors of said B. Ashby, deceased, had been provided for."

This objection seems not to be at all relied on, and little or no notice was taken of it in the argument. At all events it is wholly unsustainable. The liability of partners for a partnership debt is joint and several, even after the death of one or more of the partners. This has been the case, even at law, ever since the enactment of the Code of 1849, chapter 144, section 13, which provided that "the representative of one bound with another, either jointly or as a partner, by judgment, bond, note or otherwise, for the payment of a debt, or the performance or forbearance of an act, or for any other thing, and dying in the lifetime of the latter, may be charged in the same manner as such representative might have been charged, if those bound jointly or as partners had been bound severally as well as jointly, otherwise than as partners." See the note of the revisors to this section in their report, page 724. The amendment of the law was made after the decision of the case of Morris's adm'or v. Morris's adm'or &c., 4 Gratt. 293, in which there was much conflict of opinion among the judges. Had the case occurred after, and been governed by the amended law, it is presumed there would have been no such conflict. For all the judges in that case concurred in holding, that "two partners having given their joint and several bond to a creditor of the

466 firm, for a partnership *debt, the creditor is entitled to share with the separate creditors the separate estate of the deceased partner."

I am of opinion that there is no error in the decree complained of to the prejudice of the appellants, and I am therefore for affirming it.

Decree affirmed.

partners, give two notes to R. They both die. A being the survivor. At the death of A both notes are barred by the statute of limitations. After the death of A, R knowing that the notes were barred by the statute, fraudulently, or under a mistake of the law, represents to B, his administratrix, that said notes are unpaid, and are valid and in full force in law against the estates of A & J, and proposes that if B will give her bond to R for one-half the amount of the notes, R will settle the other half with J's representative, who is R's daughter: and thereupon B trusting to these representations, executes her bond to R for the amount of one-half of the notes. Held:

1. Same—Same—Of Law—Equitable Relief.—If this was a misrepresentation of the law, still it is a case in which equity will relieve B; and the defence may be made at law by plea under the statute setting out the facts.

2. Same—Same—Of Fact—As Matter of Defence.—But it was in truth a misrepresentation of a fact: and the facts set out in a plea is a good defence to an action on the bond by R's adm'x against B.

This is an action of debt in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, brought by William R. Warren, adm'r c. t. a. of Milly Rice, deceased, against Mary B. Brown, upon two bonds executed by said Mary B. Brown to said Milly Rice. The defendant filed two special pleas, to which the plaintiff demurred, and the demurrer was sustained; and there was judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Mrs. Brown thereupon applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed. The case is sufficiently stated by Judge Anderson, in his opinion.

468 *Berlin and Harnsberger, for the appellant.

G. G. Grattan, Woodson & Compton, for the appellee.

Anderson, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of debt by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error upon two bonds—one for $1,900, payable one day after date, and the other for $491.55, payable on or before the 1st of July 1869, both bearing the same date, the 24th of February 1869. They are executed to Milly Rice, the intestate of plaintiff below, and signed "Mary B. Brown, adm'x of A. B. Brown," with a (seal) annexed.

The defendant tendered two special pleas under the statute in bar of the action, both of which were rejected by the court. The second plea is substantially a plea to this effect. That the said Milly Rice, plaintiff's intestate, in her lifetime "fraudulently procured the execution of the said writings obligatory in the declaration mentioned by the defendant, as administratrix of A. W. Brown, for and in consideration of the one-half of two notes not under seal, which had been executed to her in her lifetime by defendant's intestate, and J. G. Brown as partners, in their firm name of A. W. & J. G. Brown, by falsely and fraudulently representing to her, the said defendant, that the said notes were still "unpaid, valid, and in full force in law against the estate of A. W. & J. G. Brown, when, in truth and in fact, both of the said notes were then barred by the statute of limitations; which fact was well known to the said Milly Rice, but was fraudulently concealed from the defendant.

Co.*, 34 W. Va. 218, 12 S. E. 507. These authorities make an exception to the general rule of law that equity will not relieve against a mistake of law.

The averments by the first plea are more in detail. It sets out the dates of the notes of A. W. & J. G. Brown, and when payable; the death of J. G. Brown, and the subsequent death of A. W. Brown, from which it appears that the latter, as surviving partner, was entitled to the possession of the social effects, and was bound for the debts of the firm; and from which it also appears that the said notes were barred by the statute of limitations in the lifetime of A. W. Brown, the defendant's intestate. It also appears from the said plea, that the defendant never saw the said notes; but that representations were made to her by the plaintiff, then acting as the agent of Milly Rice, through defendant's brother, that the said notes were lawful debts, outstanding against the estate of A. W. & J. G. Brown; and a proposition, that if she, as administratrix of A. W. Brown, would give her bonds for one-half of said notes, she, Milly Rice, would arrange the other half with the widow of said J. G. Brown, who was her daughter, and that the estate of A. W. Brown would be benefited, as it would thereby be released from one-half of the debt for which it was then bound. And that she, the defendant, was induced by these representations to assent to the proposition. That afterwards the plaintiff, as agent of the said Milly Rice, had the bonds, which are the writings obligatory in the declaration mentioned, drawn and sent to her by her brother, and she executed them as administratrix, and not in her own right, not knowing until afterwards the fraud which had been practiced on her in procuring the execution of her bonds for notes which were barred by the statute of limitations, and which she had never seen. Such are in effect the averments of the first plea, stripping it of much that is immaterial and surplusage.

Both pleas are, that the bonds were executed by her in her character as administratrix, and not in her individual right, or as her personal obligations, as she had no assets. Though the legal effect of the obligations be different, and she is bound personally, the averment to the contrary cannot vitiate the pleas, if they constitute a good equitable defence against the bonds, considering them as her personal obligations. And it cannot be doubted that the facts averred in the pleas present as good a defence against the bonds, regarding them as personal, as if they only bound the assets; because, whether personal or not, it was an obligation to pay the debt of the intestate; and if personal and binding upon her, it constitutes a stronger defence for her, because the debt being extinguished as a debt of the intestate by the statutory bar, she could have no recourse upon the estate if she paid it. The question remains, are these pleas a bar to the plaintiff's action?

It is contended for the defendant in error, that the misrepresentation alleged by the pleas is a misrepresentation as to matters of law, and that such misrepresentation does not constitute fraud, because the law is presumed to be equally within the knowledge of all the parties. But whilst the legal proposition is in general true, it is also true that, "if a man dealing with another misleads him, and takes advantage of his ignorance respecting his legal position and rights, though there be no legal fraud, the case may come within the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, p. 90-1.

Mistake also, as well as fraud, is a ground for relief in equity. And whilst mistake, in matter of law, cannot in general be admitted as ground of relief, the maxim juris ignorantia non excusat is not universally applicable in equity. "Mistake in law, to be a ground of relief in equity, must be of a material nature, and the determining ground of the transaction." It was precisely so in this case. It may be a misapprehension of the law, or of their rights, by both parties, "or it may be a misapprehension of the law, or of his private right, by one of the parties alone." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake 399.

If the mistake of law, or as to his private right, be that of one party only to the transaction, though the other party was not aware of it, a court of equity may, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, grant relief. "But if it appear that the mistake was induced or encouraged by the other party to the transaction, or was perceived by him and taken advantage of, the court will be more disposed to grant relief than in cases where it does not appear that he was aware of the mistake." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, p. 400.

In support of this position the author cites various adjudged cases. He cites Broughton v. Hutt, where the heir at law of a shareholder in a company, the shares in which were personal estate, supposing himself, through ignorance of law, to be liable in respect of the shares, had executed a deed, taking the liability on himself, it was held that he was entitled to have the deed cancelled. Also, when a man having a legal security, gave it up in exchange for another security, upon the faith that the right which he gave up would be secured to him by the substituted security but the substituted security proved a mere nullity, relief was given; also, where a woman renewed a note, believing that she was liable on the original note, relief was given. Ibid, p. 401. And other cases are cited. This last case is strikingly analogous to the case in hand if the defendant below executed her bonds under a mistake of law, that her intestate's estate was liable upon the notes, for the one-half of which her bonds were given. But it is unnecessary now to decide how far courts of equity may go to relieve 472 against a mistake of law, as we regard the misrepresentations alleged were with regard to a matter of fact.

It was represented (2nd plea) that the notes in the possession of Milly Rice, or her agent, the plaintiff below, were subsisting debts, "unpaid"—that they were "valid" debts, being "in full force in law against the estate." By the first plea, that they were "lawful debts," outstanding against the estate. "Lawful," "outstanding," still in force. These representations implied that they were under seal, or, that sufficient time had not elapsed since right of action had accrued on them to bar a recovery. The question was not as to the law of limitation. If the notes were not under seal, there was no doubt that the law of limitation was five years. The point about which the defendant was not informed, and about which she had not the means of information, (the notes being in possession of Milly Rice, or her agent, and not even surrendered upon the execution of the bonds by defendant, but retained in her possession, and only credited by her with the amount of the bonds when delivered to her or her agent,) was whether they were of such a character as to be subject to the limitation? or at what time right of action had accrued upon them? and whether they were barred by the lapse of time since?—facts which would appear from the inspection of the notes. But these difficulties were anticipated, and all met and removed by the assurances which were given by the plaintiff, acting as the agent of Milly Rice, through the brother of the defendant, as averred in the pleas. It is not necessary that the fact which does not exist should be expressly stated. It is laid down by the eminent writer, already referred to in his book, p. 91, and supported by a citation of numerous authorities, that "to constitute a fraudulent representation the 473 *representation need not be made in terms expressly stating the existence of some fact which does not exist. If a statement be made by a man in such terms as would naturally lead the person to whom it was made to suppose the existence of a certain state of facts, and if such statement be so made designedly, and fraudulently, it is as much a fraudulent representation as if the statement of an untrue fact were made in express terms."

The statements alleged to have been made by the pleas in this case, would naturally lead the defendant, to whom they were made, to conclude that the notes were under seal, or that five years had not elapsed since right of action had accrued on them. If they were lawful outstanding debts against the estate, they could not have been barred by the statute of limitations.

But it is argued, that the representations alleged by the pleas were not untrue; that a debt was not unlawful because it was barred by the statute of limitations. The allegation in one of the pleas is, that the debt was represented to be "a lawful outstanding (that is subsisting) debt against the estate;" in the other, "an unpaid" (that is subsisting) "valid" debt, being "in full force in law against the estate." The fact is, the debt was barred by the statute of limitations in the lifetime of the intestate, and therefore could in no way be revived against the estate. Seig, adm'or v. Acord's ex'or, 21 Gratt. 369, 371.) It was not therefore a lawful outstanding debt against the estate, or a subsisting, valid debt, in full force against the estate. The representation was therefore untrue in fact.

Again, it is argued that the defendant should not have relied upon these representations. She ought to have made further inquiry—she had the same means 474 *of information that the other party had. That she had the same means of information does not appear from the averments of the pleas. But if she might have had access to accurate information it was not incumbent on her to make further inquiry. "A man to whom a particular and distinct representation has been made is entitled to rely on the representation, and need not make any further inquiry." "No man can complain that another has relied too implicitly on the truth of what he himself stated." (Same book, p. 80, 81.)

These false representations induced the defendant to execute the bonds, as is substantially averred in the first plea. The second plea avers, that by these false and fraudulent representations the execution of the bonds by the defendant were fraudulently procured by the plaintiff's intestate. We are of opinion that both pleas, though imperfectly and informally drawn, set out sufficient matters of equitable defence under the statute to bar the plaintiff's action. We are of opinion that the court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the declaration, but that it erred in rejecting the special pleas, and therefore that the judgment must be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded.

The judgment is as follows:

This day came again the parties by their attorneys, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the judgment aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that the court below erred in rejecting the defendant's special pleas. It is therefore considered that the judgment be reversed, the 475 verdict be set aside, and the cause remanded *to the Circuit court of Rockingham county, to be proceeded with in conformity with the principles declared in the foregoing opinion, with instructions to said Circuit court, that if the defendant shall again offer her said special pleas that they be received, and the plaintiff be required to take issue thereon. And it is further considered that the plaintiff in error recover her costs of the defendant in error expended in the prosecution of her writ of error here, which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham.

Judgment reversed.

476 *McBride & als. v. McBride & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Wills—Form—Intention.—It is not necessary to the validity of a will that it should have a testamentary form, or that the decedent should know that he had performed a testamentary act, or that he should intend to perform such act. If the paper contains a disposition of the property to take effect after the death of the testator, though it was not intended to be a will, but an instrument of a different shape, yet if it cannot operate in the character intended, it may operate as a testamentary act.

2. Same—Same—Same.—It is not necessary that the paper should be the identical one intended by the testator for his last will. If the instrument has once received the sanction of the testator as the final disposition of his property, it will so remain until revoked or cancelled in a way prescribed by the statute, though he may have always intended to make another will.

3. Same—Same—Same.—It is necessary, however, that the instrument, whatever it may be, whether note, deed, letter, or settlement, should have been designed to operate as a disposition of his property. That identical paper must have been intended to take effect in some form. It must have been written animo testandi.

4. Same—Same—Notes as Testamentary Papers.—But where the draft or notes of a will embody the provisions actually designed by the testator with reference to his property, and declare the settled purposes of the testator, they will be established as his will, although his purpose may have been to extend the notes or draft into a more regular form. This, however, is only permitted where the testator is prevented by the act of God from completing the instrument in the form in which he designed it. And even in such a case it is essential that the paper shall contain the final determination of the testator with regard to the disposition of his property.

5. Same—Same—Intention Controlling Principle.—In all other cases, the paper offered for probate must have been designed thereby to dispose of his property. He must have looked to that paper as the means by which an object was to be accomplished, *and that object the disposition of his estate after his death. Unless he intended this, the paper is not his will, whatever he may have called it. If he did so intend, it is his will whatever he may have called it. The intention is the controlling principle in such cases.

*Wills—Form—Intention.—The principal case is nowhere cited in Virginia, but in West Virginia it is approved in French v. French, 14 W. Va. 473, and in Lauck v. Logan, 45 W. Va. 251, 81 S. W. 987. In Virginia, however, the cases of Perkins v. Jones, 84 Va. 358, and Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 506, lay down rules similar to those expounded in the principal case.

6. Facts.—M has a will prepared by his counsel, which he examines and approves, and says he will meet the counsel in B, a village near, and execute it. A few days after this he writes to a brother in Texas, and after giving him a detailed account of his domestic troubles, which he suggests to him to burn, he states that he has made a will, and states the bequests in it, and that he has appointed this brother and his counsel his executors. He says it is not such a will as he expects to make. The letter is signed with the initial of his Christian name J—. Two months after seeing the will prepared for him he is accidentally killed, not having executed the paper. HELD:

1. The letter is not a testamentary paper, either alone or as connected with the unexecuted will.

2. Signature.—Quære: If the signing the paper with the initial of his name is a sufficient signing by a testator.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Circuit court of Rockbridge county, rejecting certain papers which had been propounded as the will of J. Jackson McBride. It appears from the evidence, that some time before the death of J. Jackson McBride, his counsel, David P. Curry, prepared a will for him; but the counsel had mistaken his directions as to the shares in which his property was to be divided, and it became necessary therefore to prepare another. This second paper was prepared about two months before McBride's death. This paper the counsel carried in his pocket, expecting to meet with him, so that he could execute it, as he said he would, when they should meet, and it became so much worn that the counsel copied it. Eight or ten days before McBride's death, he went to the house of the counsel to have another paper drawn, and whilst there examined the will, and said he had no changes to make in it, and 478 that they *would meet in Brownsburg in a day or two, and get two men he named, to witness it. The paper remained in the hands of the counsel, who did not see McBride again until he was thrown from his horse, and was so badly injured as to be unconscious, and died in a day or two afterwards without having executed the paper. This paper is marked C.

After his last interview with his counsel, J. Jackson McBride wrote to his brother, who lived in Texas; and this is the paper which, in connection with the unexecuted paper, was propounded for probate. It bears date May 20th, 1872, and commences—Capt. John J. McBride—Dear Brother.

After saying why he had not procured some orchard grass seed for his brother, he proceeds:

“You want to know more about Maggie and our separation. Well, I do not talk about the mater, and to write is worse. So you had better burn all I say about it.”

He then proceeds to give an account of the separation of himself and his wife, and the terms, and how they were carried out. He then says: "Margaret had a daughter on the 14th of December 1871. I do not recognize it as mine, and want nothing to do with it." And after something more on the same subject he says: "For fear of the child coming in for my property, in case anything might happen to me, I have made my will, leaving my property to be equally divided between John J. McBride, Zach'y McChesney, Jackson and Amy McBride (each one-fourth), and leave yourself and Capt. D. P. Curry my executors. Capt. Curry has been my counsel all through my trouble, and knows and can give you more efficient aid than any one I could associate with you. I expect him to do the business, but you see it is properly done. It is not 479 such a will as I expect to make, but *do it at present to cut out the child, in case I should die without making any other arrangements. What I leave you, I expect you to leave at your death to the three, if you should not need to use it yourself. Margaret swears that it is my child, and they are trying to make the public think so, but I do not think they believe her. I say nothing, and allow no one to talk to me about it." And then after speaking of his mother's health, and of other members of the family, he says: "I don't know where to direct this letter, and don't like such to send it on uncertainties, and will not sign it. You know who it is from if you get

This paper was marked A.

This letter was put into the post-office at Brownsburg, Rockbridge county, by the writer, and was directed to Capt. John J. McBride, Palestine, Anderson county, Texas. The writer knew that his brother had property near Palestine, but that was not his place of business. What it states as to the disposition of his property among the four persons named is the same in the unexecuted will, except that this last does not say anything about what he expects John J. McBride to do with what was given to him at his death.

There was full proof that the whole letter, including the signature J, was in the handwriting of J. Jackson McBride, and that he was competent to make a will up to the time of the accident which caused his death. And it was further proved that he was a decided man, and prompt to do whatever he determined upon. The persons mentioned in both papers as his devisees, are a brother and the children of a deceased brother and sister.

John J. McBride and McChesney, the 480 propounders *of the paper, excepted to the opinion of the court rejecting the paper; and obtained an appeal to this court.

Tucker and Wm. J. Robertson, for the appellants.

Wm. A. Anderson and H. Sheffey, for the appellees.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The only question presented for our decision in this case is, whether the papers offered for probate in the court below are valid testamentary instruments. This question has been very ably argued on both sides, and the whole law of the case examined and discussed. Before considering the papers which are the subject of controversy, it may be well to state very briefly the principles which will control our decision.

All the authorities hold, indeed it is very clear, it is not necessary to the validity of a will that it should have a testamentary form, or that the decedent should know that he had performed a testamentary act, or that he should intend to perform such act. A deed poll, or an indenture, a bond, a marriage settlement, a letter, a promissory note, and the like, have been held valid as a will. If the paper contains a disposition of the property, to take effect after the death of the testator, though it was not intended to be a will, but an instrument of a different shape, yet if it cannot operate in the character in which it was intended, it may operate as a testamentary act. 1 Lomax on Ex'rs, pages 33, 34.

It is not necessary that the paper should be the identical one intended by the testator for his last will and testament. If the instrument has once received the sanction of the testator as the final disposition of his property, it will so remain until 481 revoked or cancelled *in some one of the modes required by the statute. He may have always intended to make another will, but until that intention is consummated by the execution of a posterior instrument, the first will stand as the last will and testament, however little may reflect the wishes of the testator.

It is necessary, however, that the instrument, whatever it may be, whether a note, settlement or deed, should have been designed to operate as a disposition of the testator's property. That identical paper must have been intended to take effect in some form. It must have been written animo testandi. In the language of Judge Cabell, "A paper is not to be established as a man's will merely by proving that he intended to make a disposition of his property similar to or even identically the same with that contained in the paper. It must satisfactorily appear that he intended the very paper to be his will. Unless it does so appear, the paper must be rejected, however correct it may be in its form, however comprehensive in its details, however conformable to the otherwise declared intentions of the party, and although it may have been signed by him with all due solemnity."

This doctrine is sound in principle, is commended by its intrinsic justice and wisdom, and is fully sustained by the authorities. Sharp v. Sharp, 2 Leigh 249; Hocker v. Hocker, 4 Gratt. 277; Walke v. Walke, 1 Gratt. 454; Pollok & wife v. Glassel, 2 Gratt. 439.

To this rule there, is, however, one apparent exception, or rather a modification of it. It is where the draft or notes of a will embody the provisions actually designed by the testator with reference to his property. If such notes or draft declare the settled purposes of the testator, they will be established as his will, although his purpose
482 may have been to extend the *notes or draft into a more regular form. This, however, is only permitted where the testator is prevented by the act of God from completing the instrument in the form in which he designed it. Even here it is essential that the paper shall contain the final determination of the testator with regard to the disposition of his estate.

With this single exception, for I know of no other, the paper offered for probate must have been intended by the testator as an operative instrument. He must have designed thereby to dispose of his property. He must have looked to that paper as the means by which an object was to be accomplished, and that object the distribution of his estate after his death. Unless he intended this, the paper is not his will, whatever he may have called it. If he did so intend, it is his will, whatever he may have called it. The intention is the controlling principle in such cases. The courts will not force a man into the performance of a testamentary act against his deliberate intentions.

Applying these principles to the case before us, the result is a matter of no serious difficulty. The papers offered for probate in this case, consist, 1st, of a letter written by James J. McBride, the decedent, to his brother, John J. McBride, dated May 20th, 1872. This letter is signed only with the initial letter J. It was mailed at Brownsburg, Rockbridge county, Va., and was directed to Palestine, Anderson county, Texas. The person to whom it was addressed did not reside in Palestine, but in Galveston, Texas. It seems that the writer did not know where his brother resided. It is supposed that he directed the letter to Palestine because he knew that John J. McBride owned property in that place.

The other paper offered for probate
483 is the draft of a *will, prepared in due form by an attorney, with a regular attestation clause for witnesses, but never executed by the decedent. It is not pretended that this paper is a valid testamentary act. It is probably offered in connection with and as explanatory of the letter, and as showing that the dispositions of the property, as expressed in the letter, are identical with those in a paper carefully prepared by counsel, by the instructions of the decedent. The main and the only reliance of the appellant's counsel is upon the letter already mentioned. The first part of this letter is upon a matter of business having no connection with the subject of controversy. The writer then gives a somewhat detailed account of his domestic troubles, his want of confidence in his wife, his thorough conviction of her infidelity, the negotiations between them for a separation and divorce, the settlement to be made upon her, and his suspicions that she was attempting to defraud him in this settlement. He also states the birth of his wife's child in the month of December previous, his belief that the child was not his, and his fixed purpose that it should never inherit any part of his estate. He then states: "For fear of the child coming in for my property, I have made my will, leaving my property to be equally divided between John J. McBride, Zach'y McChesney, Jackson and Amy McBride (each one-fourth), and leave yourself and Capt. D. P. Curry my executors." Further on he says: "It is not such a will as I expect to make, but do it at present to cut out the child in case I should die without making any other arrangements."

At the time this letter was written, the draft of the will already mentioned had been prepared and was in the possession of the attorney who had written it. The reference made in the letter was 484 doubtless to this draft, *as there is no evidence showing or tending to show the existence of any other testamentary paper executed by the decedent. As already stated, the letter is dated 20 May 1872; the decedent was thrown from his horse on the 28th of May, and died on the 30th. The draft of the will was prepared about two months before; was handed to him by the attorney, and then returned to the latter, with the remark that he would execute it; but no day was appointed for the purpose. It was again shown to the decedent some eight or ten days before his death, and, as would seem, about the time the letter was written. He said he would meet the attorney in a few days, and execute the paper; and he named the attesting witnesses; but he fixed no day, nor did he even indicate the time for the execution of the paper. He never expressed, says the witness, any doubt or vacillation as to his purpose. That he was fully aware of the importance of immediate action, there cannot be a question. He was frequently told by his attorney that it was very important for him to attend to the matter; that he had his purposes to carry out, and they could not be effected without the execution of the instrument. During the two months immediately preceding his death, the decedent was in good health, in possession of his faculties, mental and physical, with ample leisure and the fullest opportunity for signing the paper. He is represented by all the witnesses as a man of decided character, decisive in his purposes, and prompt in their execution.

Why, then, did he not attach his signature to the instrument; why did he postpone it from day to day, and even for months? Who, looking to this record, can comprehend his motives? It may have been that spirit of procrastination and delay in regard to the execution of last wills and testaments not fully satisfied of the illegitimacy of the child, that he still had doubts and hopes upon that subject, and was therefore reluctant to take the final step of disinheriting it. Supposing that his purposes on this point were fixed, it may be that still he was not satisfied with the dispositions he had made, that there were other objects of his bounty having equal claims upon him who were not provided for in this draft of his will. With the lights before us, how are we to say which of these theories is correct, or whether either is correct. In his letter he is careful to say, it is not such a will as he expected to make. He says it more than once, and that it was only done to exclude the child in case he should die without making other arrangements.
485 which so often *springs from youth and health and the confidence in a long life. It may have been that he was

What were those other arrangements? We have no means of determining. Whatever they may have been, it is very certain that the dispositions of his estate, as made in the draft and mentioned in the letter, were not satisfactory to the decedent. They were not such as he desired or expected finally to make; they were to be merely temporary. But, temporary as they were, as anxious as he was to cut off the child, he still hesitated, and at last failed to sign the paper by which the persons therein named were to take his entire estate to the exclusion of all others. His unwillingness that they should so take may have been the cause of this otherwise inexplicable delay. He no doubt thought that he had ample time to make a will such as would carry out his final intentions with reference to his property. With this positive knowledge that he declined, or at least failed, so long, without any satisfactory reason suggested, to execute the draft of the will, how can we consistently set 486 up a *mere letter as a testamentary act, identical in its provisions with the unexecuted draft. If he was unwilling to sign the draft prepared for him, could he have ever intended, or even imagined, that the letter would be used to establish his final disposition of his property? A letter not testamentary in form, written with no testamentary intent, and containing upon its face the strongest evidence that the dispositions now claimed were not satisfactory, and were not such as he designed finally to make.

In striking confirmation of the view that this paper was never intended as a will, was never designed to operate in any form, is the direction given by the writer to his brother to burn the letter. The learned counsel for the petitioners says that this direction applies only to the domestic portion of the letter, and not to its testamentary purposes. But the letter is all domestic; it is a narrative of domestic matters, written apparently in answer to inquiries made by the brother residing in Texas; and the testamentary dispositions, if they may be so termed, are so blended with the story of his domestic troubles that the destruction of so much of the letter as relates to the latter necessarily involves the destruction of the entire paper.

It is very true that when a will is once properly executed, a mere direction by the testator to destroy it, and a belief on his part that it has been in fact destroyed, will not operate as a revocation. The direction must be followed by a substantive act of destruction. But when an attempt is made to establish a mere letter as a testamentary act, a request of the writer to destroy the letter leads irresistibly to the conclusion, his purpose was that that paper at least 487 should not be his will. To treat it as such because *the writer has mentioned his views and purposes with regard to his estate, is palpably to violate his intentions, and to make that effectual which he intended should have no effect whatever.

It is impossible to foresee the mischiefs that will result, if a doctrine of this sort is established as the law of the land. The mischief of converting private letters into wills—of clothing loose and unguarded expressions with the solemnities of testamentary acts—is too obvious to require comment or discussion.

Looking at the letter in this aspect alone, it lacks one of the main essentials of a testamentary act.

In determining whether this letter constitutes a valid testamentary act, there is one other view which ought not to be omitted. It has been held in England that a will is valid if signed with the initials of the testator's name, or even his mark without any signature. It must be borne in mind, however, that under the English statute every will, even though written wholly by the testator, must be attested by witnesses. When, therefore, in England, an initial is used only, the attestation of the witnesses very clearly indicates that the testator designed that this form of signature should be a signing. Under our statute, an autograph will is valid without witnesses. Whether we can recognize an initial as sufficient, to the same extent as the English courts, may not be so clear. Upon that question we express no opinion. Its decision is not necessary for any of the purposes of this case.

Our statute, it will be observed, contains an important provision not found in the English statute. It requires that "the will shall be signed by the testator, or in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature." In the con-
488 struction of this provision it *has been held that no will is sufficiently signed unless it appears affirmatively, from the position of the signature, or from some other internal evidence equally convincing, that the testator designed by the use of the signature to authenticate the instrument. Waller v. Waller, 1 Gratt. 454; Ramsey et als. v. Ramsey's ex'or, 13 Gratt. 664; Roy et als., v. Roy's ex'or, 16 Gratt. 418. It is true that these cases turned upon the question of the finality of the testamentary intent, the question being whether the paper was to be regarded as a final and concluded act. The principle is the same, however, and is equally applicable in the present case. The signing must be such as upon the face and from the frame of the instrument appears to have been intended to give it authority. It is said that the design of our statute is probably the same in effect as that which the English statute requires when it says that it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator and be attested by witnesses. Under both statutes, the identity of the instrument is ascertained and its finality and authenticity established without resort to extrinsic evidence.

In the case before us, the letter is signed only with the initial of the writer's christian name. In the concluding part he says: "I don't know where to direct this letter, and don't like much to send it on uncertainties, and will not sign it; you know who it is from if you get it;" and then follows the letter J. The paper does not show where it was written or mailed; neither state, county nor post-office is given. So far from the signature being intended to give it authenticity, it is very apparent that this form of signing was adopted to conceal the name of the writer. His purpose was not to identify himself with the paper, but to prevent even a suspicion of his connection with it in any form. *And no one, unacquainted with the history of the man and his family, could by possibility tell where or by whom the letter was written. The brother to whom it was addressed was expected to understand the allusion from his own independent knowledge of the writer and the transactions to which he refers. If the letter reached its destination, it would be immediately destroyed; if it did not, the name of the writer, and even his residence, would be unknown, and his narrative without interest to strangers. The conclusion is irresistible, that he did not intend this "initial" letter as a signing within the true intent and meaning of the statute.

Upon the whole we are of opinion there is no error in the decree, and that it must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Fiduciaries—Neglect—Liability.*—About 1849 M executed his bond to E for a debt he owed him, without security. E died in 1852, and A qualified as his administrator, and as guardian of his children. On the 1st of January 1853, M and K, as his surety, executed to A, guardian of the legatees of E, a paper, intended to be a bond, payable on demand for $936.63, for the debt of M to E. A settled his accounts as guardian, charging himself with this bond. He died in 1867 or 1868, when the bond went into the hands of his administrators, one of whom offered it to the wards, but they declined to receive it, when he brought suit upon it against M and K, recovered judgment, and issued execution in December 1869, which was unproductive. From the date of the bond to the end of the war M and K were in independent circumstances. At the end of the war M was very much injured, but still owned valuable land. K was injured by the war, but he was able to pay his debts until 1869, when his land was greatly injured by a flood. HELD: The estate of A is liable to the wards for the debt.

This was a suit instituted in October 1870, in the County court of Rockingham, by Christina J. Ergenbright against the surviving administrator and heirs of Jacob Ammon, deceased, to have a settlement of the accounts of said Jacob Ammon, as guardian of herself and her three brothers and sister, and that his lands might be subjected, if necessary, to pay what might be found due to them. The cause was referred to a commissioner to take the accounts; and the only question was as to a single bill or note executed to the guardian by Henry Miller and Joseph H. Kite. The County court held that Ammon's estate was not liable *for that debt; and upon appeal to the Circuit court of the county the decree of the County court was affirmed. Thereupon, Christina J. Ergenbright and her brothers and sister applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed. The case is fully stated by Judge Moncure, in his opinion.

Berlin and Harnsbarger, for the appellants.

Woodson and Compton, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The controversy in this case is about a bond or note in these words:

"On demand we promise and oblige ourselves, heirs, &c., to pay Jacob Ammon, guardian for legatees of Jacob B. Argenbright, the sum of nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and sixty-three cents for value received, as witness my hand this 1st January 1853.

Henry Miller, [Seal.]
Jas. H. Kite, [Seal.]"

The controversy is between the wards, or late wards, of said Jacob Ammon, five in number, to wit: Christina J. Ergenbright, alias Argenbright, and others, children, described in said bond or note as "legatees of Jacob B. Argenbright," and the said guardian's representatives, he being dead; and the question is, whether the loss of the money due upon the bond or note should fall on the said wards, or on the estate or representative of the said guardian; the debtors in said bond or note having become insolvent, without having paid the same.

The commissioner by his report charged the guardian with the debt; but made 492 an alternative statement *charging each of the five wards with one-fifth of the debt. The court below, on the 24th day of January 1873, being "of opinion that the estate of Jacob Ammon ought not to be held responsible for the debt due from Henry Miller and Joseph H. Kite to said Ammon as guardian" aforesaid; "neither the said Jacob Ammon in his lifetime, or his administrators, having been guilty of such negligence or mala fides in regard to said debt as to justify charging said estate of Jacob Ammon therewith;" confirmed the said alternative statements, and decreed accordingly. From that decree this appeal was applied for and obtained.

In the petition for the appeal three errors are assigned:

"1st. Because the other statement of commissioner A. M. Newman, which charges said Jacob Ammon's estate with the Miller and Kite debt of $936.65, should have been confirmed, and not the said alternate statement, which was confirmed.

2nd. Because, had suit been instituted within a reasonable time, the said Miller and Kite debt might have been secured and made; and that by reason of gross negligence on the part of said guardian and his personal representatives, said debt has been lost.

3rd. Because, before any suit was instituted, said note of Miller and Kite was barred by the statute of limitations."

The third assignment of error is immaterial, in the view we propose to take of the case, and no further notice will therefore be taken of it.

Three witnesses were examined in the case. Two of them in behalf of the representatives of the guardian, and one in behalf of the wards. First, Henry Miller, the principal debtor, was examined in behalf of the guardian's representatives. He 493 testified *that he gave his bond to

Jacob Ergenbright three or four years before his death for a lot of hogs, gave no security in the bond, and was requested to give none. After the death of Mr. Ergenbright, this bond came into the hands of Jacob Ammon, as the guardian of said Ergenbright's children. Witness then took up the bond he had executed to Jacob Ergenbright, and executed the bond or note which is the subject of controversy in this suit to Jacob Ammon as guardian, with Joseph H. Kite as security. At the date of the bond or note, on the 1st of January 1853, and up to 1861, witness had property over and above what he owed. Lost during the war, by the sale of land for Confederate money, in negroes, horses, crops, debts, &c., not less than from $22,000 to $25,000. Thought his property, at the time he gave his testimony, would not meet his debts. His inability to pay his debts was the result of losses sustained during the war. Thought his surety, Joseph H. Kite, was very good. He owned a good deal of property, but lost the greater portion by fire and the flood of September 1870.

On cross-examination, the witness said that if the guardian had instituted suit and obtained judgment previous to the war, the debt could have been secured. If he or his personal representative had instituted suit, and obtained judgment since the war, and previous to September 1870, witness thought the debt would have been secured. In October, or November of that year, Kite's property was sold under execution, and produced some $600 or $700. Y. C. Ammon, one of the representatives of Jacob Ammon, called on witness during the war, in 1862 or 1863, witness thought, before he lost his property, and said that he, Y. C. Ammon, had gotten in his hands, after the death of his father, the bond witness owed 494 Jacob Ergenbright's *heirs, and stated that he, Y. C. Ammon, wanted a portion of the money to pay to some of the heirs. Witness promised to pay him a portion at some future time, and remarked, if he had doubts as to the debt, witness would give him additional security; but he seemed to be satisfied with the witness and Kite.

2nd. Joseph A. Hammon, sheriff, or deputy sheriff of Rockingham county, was examined in behalf of the wards. He testified that he had an execution in the name of John Argabright's adm'or v. Henry Miller and Joseph H. Kite, for $670.80 and interest and costs, and made on said execution $715.07, at a sale of property levied on October 28, 1869. His acquaintance with their pecuniary condition commenced in 1867; he collected all the executions he had against said Kite up to the present one; had several against Miller, but could make nothing out of him from his personal estate; considered Kite good, but Miller insolvent.

3d. Dr. S. P. H. Miller was examined in behalf of the guardian's representatives: testified that he had been acquainted with the pecuniary condition of Miller and Kite since 1857 or 1858: looked upon them at that time, and up to the disasters of the war as solvent: at the time of giving his testimony he did not think either of them solvent: thought the prime cause of their insolvency was their losses during the war. They owed debts previous to the war; during the war they made nothing, and their debts accumulated by interest. This accumulation of interest, and the loss of slaves, &c., by Henry Miller, were the causes of his insolvency. The same causes apply to Kite; and, in addition, he lost heavily by the flood. Witness considered that a judgment obtained against these parties, at November court 1869, for about $1,000, could have been made of Mr. Kite. His real 495 estate, in 1869, was *worth not less than $16,000 to $18,000. The damage to his real estate by the flood witness supposed was $8,000. Miller, in 1869, owned two hundred and thirty-five acres of land, assessed at $35 per acre. Witness thought that a debt of $1,000, if judgment had been obtained in 1867 or 1868, could not have been made of Henry Miller.

In the answer of John B. Ammon, surviving administrator of Jacob Ammon, he says that after the war, by the results of which the aforesaid debtors, Miller and Kite, were reduced in their financial condition, and when it was doubtful whether or not they would be able to pay their debts, he "offered the above mentioned bond to the wards of Jacob Ammon, but they declined to receive it, and thereupon this respondent brought suit upon it, obtained a judgment, upon which execution issued, and was returned 'no property,' as will appear from exhibit 2, herewith filed." That exhibit is a part of the record, and is a copy of said execution and return, the execution bearing date the 3d day of December 1869.

On whom should the loss of this debt of Miller and Kite fall? on the wards or on the guardian? The court below thought, and so decreed, on the wards. Whether that decree is correct or erroneous is the question we now have to solve.

We are of opinion that the decree is erroneous, and that the loss ought to fall not on the wards, but on the said guardian or his estate.

We think it extremely doubtful from the record, to say the least, whether the debt of Miller and Kite ever was regarded or intended by the guardian as a debt due to his wards. The debt of Miller, which was the consideration of the debt of Miller and Kite, was due to the father of the wards, Jacob Ergenbright, of whom 496 *it seems Jacob Ammon was administrator; and although the latter took the bond of Miller and Kite for the amount, payable to himself as "guardian for the legatees of Jacob Argenbright," yet this may have been a mere descriptio personae, and he may have given his wards credit for the amount and held the bonds as his own property. Whether this was his original intention or not, it seems that afterwards he so treated the matter; and that neither he nor his representatives ever made any return, or rendered any account, of the debt as part of the estate of his wards until 1869, after the debt had become worthless, when John B. Ammon, surviving administrator of the guardian, offered the bond to the wards as aforesaid. It appears that the accounts of the guardian and his administrator were frequently, if not regularly, settled; though some of them seem to have been destroyed by the public enemy during the war—some of them however were preserved—and it does not appear that in any account settled before the institution of this suit, the guardian or his representatives claimed any credit for this debt, or referred to it in any way; on the contrary, in all the accounts then settled of which we have any copy or trace in the record, that debt is included in the amount charged to the guardian and credited to the wards; thus forming a part of the balance reported as due to the wards respectively. Now if this be the true state of the case, nothing can be plainer than that it was too late, in 1869 for the first time, for the guardian or his representative to claim credit for this debt, in the settlement of his account with his wards; and that it must remain charged to him, as it had long previously been by himself.

But if it be considered as a debt still due to the wards, and as never having been 497 intended by the *guardian to be charged to himself; has it not been lost by the default of the guardian and his representatives, and are not he and they responsible for the loss of it, and chargeable with the amount of it in the settlement of the guardianship account?

We are of opinion that this question must be answered in the affirmative. When Jacob Ammon died, in 1867 or '8, he ceased of course to be guardian of the Ergenbrights, and the estate of his wards should then, at least have been delivered to them if of age; and if not, to another and succeeding guardian; and if none, should have been brought into court and invested under the order of the court for them. Instead of that, the bond or note never was brought into court, nor reported to the commissioner as part of the estate of the wards, and never was offered to them, nor were they ever informed of it, so far as the record shows, until 1869; but remained in the possession of the guardian and his representatives, without any suit being brought upon it until that time. Whereas, in the meantime, both the debtors, who were perfectly solvent when the debt was created, became perfectly insolvent—the principal, Miller, having been ruined by the war, and the surety, Kite, having been ruined by the war and by a flood, which happened several years thereafter. If suit had been brought for the debt at any time before 1869 it might have been made. Such suit ought to have been brought by the guardian or his representatives long before that time, supposing the debt to be still due to the wards. Certainly it was the duty of Jacob Ammon's administrator to put the debt in suit; if not sooner, at least when Miller, the principal debtor, had become insolvent by the results of the war.

There was then but one solvent debtor
 498 remaining, and he was a surety, *and the administrator certainly had no right to hold up the debt longer at the risk of the wards. Though Kite was still solvent, he might become otherwise, as he afterwards did, before judgment was recovered for the debt in 1869. It was a time of doubt and danger, when fiduciaries had no right to delay the collection of debts, and certainly no right to delay the institution of suits therefor, whereby security might be obtained by judgment and execution. Several, if not all, of the wards had become of age before 1869, and if the debt was considered as still due to them, they ought to have been informed of the fact, and their consent ought to have been obtained to the long indulgence which was given.

We are therefore of opinion that the decree of the court below ought to be reversed; that the estate of Jacob Ammon ought to be held responsible for the said debt; that the report of commissioner Newman, charging the said estate with the said debt, and not his alternate statement charging each of the said wards with one-fifth of the said debt, ought to be confirmed, and that the cause ought to be remanded to the court below for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing opinion. And that liberty ought to be reserved to the representatives of said Jacob Ammon to apply, by further proceedings in this suit, for any relief to which they may be entitled against the administrators of said Jacob Ammon, or either of them, or the estates of them, or either of them, on account of the default of them, or either of them, in regard to the collection of the said debt.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the order aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the estate of Jacob Ammon ought to be held responsible to the appellants for the debt due by Henry Miller and Jos. H. Kite, in the proceedings in this case mentioned; that the report of commissioner Newman, charging the said estate with the said debt, and not his alternate statement, charging each of the appellants with one-fifth of the said debt, ought to be confirmed, and that the said decree appealed from is erroneous, and ought to be reversed: therefore it is decreed and ordered that the said decree be reversed and annulled, and that the appellants recover of the appellee, John B. Ammon, surviving administrator of Jacob Ammon, deceased, out of the estate of the said Jacob, which is now in, or may hereafter come to, the hands of the said administrator to be administered, the costs by the said appellants expended in the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here, for which said costs the whole estate of said Jacob, of whatever it may consist, and in whosoever hands it may be, shall be liable.

And it is further decreed and ordered that this cause be remanded to the court below for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing opinion; and that liberty be reversed to the representatives of said Jacob Ammon to apply by further proceedings in this suit in the said court for any relief to which they may be entitled against Yelverton C. Ammon and John B. Ammon, administrators of said Jacob Ammon, or either of them, or the estates of them, or either of them, on account of the default of them, or either of them, in regard to the collection of the said debt; which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

*Frazier v. Frazier &amp; als.

September Term, 1875. Staunton.

Partition—By Judicial Proceedings—Sale.—F and R owned one-half of two tracts of land, one in Bath county, called the Bath Alum, and the other in Rockbridge, called the Rockbridge Alum. The other half of these tracts was owned by J. an infant aged 17 years, subject to his mother's dower; and she had married P, who became the guardian of J. F sold the Bath Alum tract with some furniture to B. for $30,000 Confederate 8 per cent. bonds, subject to the ratification of the court. F & R then brought their suit in equity to have the sale ratified, alleging that the property could not be conveniently divided, and that it was for the interest of all parties, including the infant, that the property should be sold. P & wife and J answered, concurring in the statements of the bill, and in the prayer that the sale to B should be confirmed. Three witnesses concur in sustaining the statements of the bill, and that the price is a full price for the land. And the court confirms the sale. When J comes of age he files a bill to set aside the sale. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Conclusiveness of.—The suit of F & R was a suit for partition, and the proceedings having been regular throughout, the fact that the sale was made for Confederate bonds, which have since become worthless, is no ground for setting aside the sale.
2. Same—Mode of Making Divisions.—The fact that the parties owned another tract of land in another county, and that it did not appear that partition in kind of the two tracts could not be made, is not ground for setting aside the sale; the parties not wishing to sell this other tract, which was productive.
3. Same—Valuation.—The fact that the witness spoke of the value of the land, not referring to the furniture, which was not worth more $2,000 or $2,500 in Confederate money, but estimating the price to be given as a very full price for the land, is not grounds for setting aside the sale; especially as this objection was not made until the court had decreed to dismiss the bill, when it was set up by an amended bill.

*This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Bath county, brought in 1868 by James A. Frazier against William Frazier, Joseph Baxter and others, to set aside a sale of land made in 1863, when he was an infant. There was a decree in the cause made on the 23d of April 1874, by which the bill and amended bill of the plaintiff was dismissed; and he thereupon obtained an appeal to this court. The case is stated in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Christian.

Wm. J. Robertson, Jno. Letcher and H. B. Michie, for the appellant.

*Partition—By Judicial Proceedings—Sale.—For the principle that a decree of partition of a court of competent jurisdiction is binding and cannot be attacked collaterally except on the ground of fraud or surprise, see Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493; Fox v. Cottage, etc., Ass'n, 81 Va. 677; Marrow v. Brinkley, 85 Va. 55. See also, V. C. § 2564, as to partition by decree of court.

G. M. Cochran, for the appellees.

Christian, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The bill in this case is filed by the appellant, James A. Frazier, under the seventh section of chapter 178, Code of 1860, which secures to an infant the right within six months after he arrives at the age of twenty-one years, to show cause against a decree directing a sale of his land during his minority.

The object of the bill is to impeach and set aside a decree of the Circuit court of Bath county, pronounced on the 15th day of May 1863, in the suit of John S. Randolph and Wm. Frazier v. Porter & wife & others. The record in that case discloses the following facts: Randolph and William Frazier and John W. Frazier were joint-tenants of two tracts of land, one lying in Bath county, known as the Bath Alum Springs, and the other lying in Rockbridge county, known as the Rockbridge Alum Springs. In both these tracts Randolph and William Frazier owned one undivided moiety, and John 502 W. Frazier the other. *During this joint-tenancy John W. Frazier died, leaving as his sole heir at law the appellant, James A. Frazier, who inherited from his father the two moieties in said tracts of land subject to the dower of his mother. Mrs. Frazier subsequently intermarried with Stephen A. Porter, who qualified as the guardian of her son, James A. Frazier.

In February 1863, Randolph and Frazier being desirous to have partition of the "Bath Alum" property, and satisfied that it could not be divided in kind, (Stephen A. Porter being of the same opinion,) a contract of sale was entered into between William Frazier, "acting for himself, his partner, Randolph, and for and on behalf of Stephen A. Porter, guardian of James A. Frazier," of the one part, and Joseph Baxter of the other part, by which contract it was agreed to sell to the said Joseph Baxter the property known as the "Bath Alum Springs," with the household and kitchen furniture, (excepting the furniture of two rooms,) for the sum of thirty thousand dollars in Confederate States 8 per cent. bonds.

This sale was made expressly upon condition that it was to be ratified by a decree of the Circuit court of Bath, upon proper proceedings to be had in that court. In the meantime Baxter was to deposit with R. H. Maury & Co., bankers, in the city of Richmond, Confederate bonds, bearing 8 per cent. interest, to the amount of $30,000, to await the action of said Circuit court.

Accordingly on the day of 1863 a bill was filed by Randolph and Frazier in the Circuit court of Bath county, to which bill Stephen Porter and wife, James A. Frazier, the infant, Stephen Porter, guardian of James A. Frazier and Joseph Baxter, were made defendants.

503 *The bill set forth with much detail how the property had been acquired, for what purpose it had been used, and the joint interest of the owners therein. It alleges the impracticability of a partition in kind, and the advantages to all interested in having a sale for partition. It sets forth as reasons for a sale the fact, that the property had been used as a watering place, which constituted its chief value; that the buildings were rapidly going to decay and ruin, being then used as a hospital for Confederate soldiers; that the enterprise of keeping the Bath Alum Springs had never been profitable; and that it could not again be used for that purpose without large expenditure of money in the way of repairs. With the bill is exhibited the contract of sale with Baxter, which the court is asked to ratify and confirm as a sale for a full and fair price, and one in every way advantageous to the parties interested.

The answer of Porter and wife admits that partition cannot be made in kind advantageously to the parties interested, and "that the best mode of disposing of said property would be a sale, and the disposition of the proceeds of sale, according to the rights of the parties; and that therefore they willingly concur in the sale made by the plaintiffs to their co-defendant Joseph Baxter, as stated in the plaintiff's bill, at the price of thirty thousand dollars; and respectfully ask that the said sale may be confirmed by a decree of the court, and the proceeds thereof legally disposed of."

The separate answer of Stephen A. Porter, as guardian of the appellant, James A. Frazier, is also filed, in which "he admits that the buildings of the 'Bath Alum' have become very much dilapidated and out of repair, so that it would take a large amount to put them in a proper state of repair.

504 He also admits the *said 'Bath Alum' could not be advantageously divided between the parties interested therein by metes and bounds; and that the interest of all parties concerned would be greatly promoted by a sale thereof, and more especially would his ward be greatly benefited by such a sale; and influenced by that consideration he most heartily concurred, and still concurs, in the sale made by William Frazier for himself and on behalf of other parties in interest to Joseph Baxter on 6th February 1863 * * * ; that said sale was for a full and very adequate price, and highly advantageous, so far as his ward is concerned;" and asks that the court may confirm said sale.

A guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant, and he also files his concurrence. The infant (the appellant) being over the age of fourteen years, (then being seventeen years of age,) his answer is also filed, in which he says: "The sale made of the 'Bath Alum' Springs is highly advantageous to the parties interested therein, and especially to the respondent, and that the consideration agreed to be paid by said Joseph Baxter is fully adequate; that he is therefore willing that the sale should be confirmed; but being under the age of twenty-one years he submits his interest to the protection of the court."

The depositions of three highly respectable witnesses, who were well acquainted with the property and its then present condition, were taken and returned to the court. They all agree in four most material facts: 1st, that the property is of such a character that it could not be divided in kind; 2d, that it was rapidly depreciating and going to ruin; 3d, that the price offered by Baxter was a full and adequate price; and 4th, that it was to the manifest interest of all parties that the sale made to Baxter for thirty 505 *thousand dollars cash should be confirmed by the court.

On the 15th of May 1863, the cause coming on to be heard on the bill and answers, exhibits filed, and examination of witnesses, and the court being of opinion that the Bath Alum Springs property was altogether "incapable of division by metes and bounds, without great injury and sacrifice of the rights and interests of those entitled, that a sale for division is not only absolutely necessary, but that even if the subject were susceptible of division in kind, a sale of the subject would better promote the interests of the infant defendant, as well as the adults, than a specific allotment and division;" and being further of opinion that the sale to the defendant, Baxter, for thirty thousand dollars in Confederate 8 per cent. bonds is judicious, and for a full and adequate price," the said sale to Baxter was ratified and confirmed by the court.

After the close of the war, and after by its result Confederate bonds had become worthless, the infant defendant in the suit of Randolph & Frazier v. Porter &c., (James A. Frazier) having arrived at age filed his bill, in which he claimed the right to show cause against the decree in that suit above referred to, and impeached the decree upon various grounds. The cause came on to be heard upon the bill and answers and deposition of witnesses, and the Circuit court of Bath pronounced its decree, in which it was held that the case of Frazier & Randolph v. Stephen A. Porter et als., was a suit for partition under the one hundred and twenty-fourth chapter of the Code of Virginia (1860); that all the proceedings were regular; that it was satisfactorily proven by intelligent and disinterested witnesses, that the Bath Alum Springs going to decay; that the interest of the plaintiff, then a minor, would be promoted by a sale, and the price agreed to be paid by the defendant, Joseph Baxter, was fair and adequate, and no reason now appearing for impeaching the decree confirming said sale rendered on the 15th day of May 1863, either on the ground of fraud, collusion or error, it is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed that the plaintiff's bill (original and amended) be dismissed. It is from this decree that an appeal was allowed by this court.

506 *property was incapable of division in kind; that the property was rapidly

The court is of opinion that there is no error in this decree of the said Circuit court.

The proceedings in the suit of Frazier &

Randolph v. Porter & others, were all regular and in strict conformity with the provisions of the third section of chapter 124, Code 1860.

Under the pleadings and evidence in that cause, prepared and conducted with unusual care, conforming in every respect to all the provisions of the statute, the Circuit court of Bath had full and unquestioned authority to decree a sale of the subject. It had the same authority to ratify and confirm a contract of sale which the adult parties had already entered into, upon condition of its subsequent ratification by the court.

The complaint of the appellant that the consideration was grossly inadequate because it was sold for Confederate money greatly depreciated, and the investment for him in Confederate bonds, and that he has thereby lost his inheritance without his assent, is one made in the light of subsequent events; and is not such cause shown against the decree as can now impeach or invalidate it. In Walker's ex'or v. Page

&c., 21 Gratt. 636, this court held,
507 that "the right of an *infant to show cause against a decree which affects his interests after he arrives at age must be limited to this extent, to show cause existing at the rendition of the decree, and not such as arose afterwards. The question always must be, can any cause be shown why the decree at the time it was rendered was not a legal and binding decree?"

The argument now made, that the interests of the infant were not promoted, because the land was sold for a depreciated currency, and the investment made in Confederate bonds, which proved to be worthless, is, as was said in Walker's ex'or v. Page, "not based upon the evidence before the court at the time the decree was entered for a sale of the property, is not made in the light of the facts then existing and proved before the court, but upon facts existing subsequent to the decree, and in the light of events that happened afterwards. It is easy to show now, after the close of the war, after Confederate currency and Confederate securities have perished, that as subsequent events have transpired, the interest of the infant has not been promoted by a sale of his real estate. And if such considerations could govern the adjudications of this court, then every sale of real estate in which infants were interested, made under decrees of courts during the war, must be vacated and annulled. The conclusion this court announced, in the case above cited, after a most careful and deliberate consideration, was this: "If the court which pronounced the decree had jurisdiction of the subject and the parties; if the proceedings were regular and in accordance with the requirements of the law, and the decree is sustained and justified by the evidence there introduced, the infant, upon arriving at age, will not be allowed, as against a bona fide purchaser, to 508 go out of the record to *show that, upon facts and events arising subsequent to the rendition of the decree, his interests were not promoted by a sale of his real estate; especially when these subsequent events were the results of civil and political revolutions, over which the parties and the court of chancery had no control, and could not possibly foresee." These principles, enunciated in the case of Walker's ex'or v. Page, have been repeatedly recognized and reaffirmed by this court.

But the case before us, in many of its aspects, is a case still stronger for affirmance than Walker & Page. That was a case of the sale of infant's land under a bill filed by the guardian. This is a case of partition, in which the adult parties were interested along with the infant, and their interests were the same as that of the infant. One of the plaintiffs, William Frazier, was a near relative of the infant, and had the same interest as the infant. The co-defendants were the mother, the step-father and guardian of the infant. All the parties, both plaintiffs and defendants, united in asking for a sale, and all united in insisting that the property could not be conveniently divided in kind. The proceeding was, as it properly ought to have been, under the provisions of the 124th chapter, Code 1860, and not under chapter 128. It was a suit for partition, and not a suit for the sale of infant's land by the guardian. Every requirement of the former statute was strictly complied with. It was conclusively shown both that partition of the entire subject could not be conveniently made, and that the interests of the parties entitled would be promoted by a sale. It is true that one of the parties entitled was an infant; but the third section of chapter 124 expressly provides, that such sale for partition may be made "notwithstanding any of the parties entitled may be an infant."

509 *The record shows that the suit of Frazier & Randolph v. Porter & wife & others, was conducted with unusual care, not only observing all of the requirements under chapter 124, (Code 1860,) but, as far as possible, those of chapter 128, making the guardian of the infant a party, with his sworn answer approving the sale, the infant himself a party, with his answer, (he being seventeen years of age,) approving the sale, and appointing a guardian ad litem for the infant. All these answers concurred in asking for a sale, and admitting that the land could not conveniently be divided in kind. The evidence of respectable witnesses all concur in stating that a division thereof could not be made, and that the interest of all parties would be promoted by a ratification of the sale to Baxter; which all concurred in opinion was a full and adequate price. All this concurred in by the experienced and able judge who entered the decree, made it a case in which this court is constrained to conclude cannot now be impeached or invalidated.

But it is insisted by the learned counsel for the appellants, that the parties in the suit of Frazier & Randolph v. Porter & wife et als. were also tenants in common, and joint owners in the "Rockbridge Alum Springs," as well as in the "Bath Alum," which last was the subject of the suit for partition, and that partition might have been made in kind if both of these tracts of land had been taken into account in the suit for partition. It is sufficient in answer to the objection, to note the fact, that these two properties are not only entirely separate, lying more than twenty miles apart, but are situated in different counties, one being in the county of Bath, and one in the county of Rockbridge. The latter was valuable and remunerative as "spring's property;" the other was never a successful enterprise; was occupied at the 510 *time the decree of sale was entered, as a hospital, liable to be destroyed on that account by raiding parties of the Federal army, and rapidly falling into ruin and decay. Reasons which applied with full force to sell the one piece of property, had no application to the other. The parties in interest could not be compelled to sacrifice their interest in the "Rockbridge Alum" property lying in a different county and a different jurisdiction, in order to make a sale of the "Bath Alum" property, which, by common consent, it was necessary to sell for partition.

The only remaining objection to the decree of the Circuit court of Augusta, in the case of Frazier & Randolph v. Porter & wife is, that the contract of sale made by the adult parties to Baxter, which was confirmed by the court, included certain personal property, being the furniture left at the Bath Alum Springs, and that the testimony of the witnesses was confined to the value of the real estate.

To this complaint, it is sufficient to say that this objection was not made in the original bill impeaching the decree, and was not then thought of as a ground of invalidating that decree until after the suit had progressed to a final decree: then an amended bill was filed for the first time urging this point. But the evidence taken under the amended bill shows that this old furniture was only worth some $2,000 or $2,500 in Confederate money, and could not have been a material element to change the estimate of value of the real property by the witnesses, who all agreed that the purchase at thirty thousand dollars was a very high price for the property.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court of Bath, and that the same be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

*Bonds—Assignments—Parties to Suit by Assignee.
—The rule laid down in the principal case, that where there has been an unconditional and entire assignment of a chose in action, the assignor is not a

upon land, the assignment being absolute, is not a necessary party in a suit by the assignee against the vendee of the obligor, to subject the land to satisfy the debt.

II. Same—Same—Same.—H and B, as his surety, execute their bond to M, executor, for land purchased of him by H, and which H afterwards conveys to O. M recovers judgment upon the bond against H and B, and B pays the debt, and M assigns it to him without recourse. On a bill by B against O and H to subject the land to satisfy the debt. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Same.—Whether B claims as assignee, or as a security who has paid the debt, M is not a necessary party.
2. Same—Same—Subrogation.—B is entitled to have the land sold to pay his debt without proceeding first against H; especially as O did not ask for such a decree in the court below.
3. Equities between Vendor and Vendee.—O may, if he chooses, make an issue in this case between himself and H, and have the equities between them settled.

By deed bearing date the 13th day of December 1860, William W. Minor, as executor of Dabney Minor, deceased, conveyed to Bartlett A. Henson a tract of land lying on Mechunck creek, in Albemarle county; and by deed of the same date, Henson conveyed the same land to S. V. Southall, in trust to secure the payment of four bonds of the same date as the deed, and each for $1,415.10, given by Henson to Minor as executor, for the purchase money of the land. These deeds were duly admitted to record in the clerk's office of Albemarle county on the 7th of January 1861.

512 *Bartlett S. Henson paid off three of the bonds to Minor, the executor; and then by deed bearing date the 1st of September 1863, and duly admitted to record, he conveyed the land he had purchased from Minor to Richard F. Omohundro.

In 1866 it would seem, though the date is not given, Minor brought suit in the Circuit court of Louisa county, upon the unpaid bond against Bartlett A. Henson, Benjamin Henson and two others, who were obligors therein, and recovered a judgment. The interest on this judgment was paid from time to time, from September 1867 to June 1870, by Benjamin Henson, and he, at this last date, paid the whole amount then due to Minor, the plaintiff; and, by an endorsement on the receipt, Minor assigned the judgment to Benjamin Henson without recourse.

In May 1871 Benjamin Henson instituted a suit in equity in the County court of Albemarle against Bartlett A. Henson and the other obligors in the bond to Minor, necessary party to the suit by the assignee to enforce collection of the chose, is followed in the decision of Tatum v. Ballard, 94 Va. 375, where the principal case is cited with approval. The principal case is also cited but distinguished in Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Taylor, 79 Va. 674. See also, Barton's Ch. Pr., Vol. 1 (2d Ed.) page 171; James R. & K. Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53; Scott v. Ludington, 14 W. Va. 393; Vance v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 342.

Richard F. Omohundro, and Southall, the trustee, in the deed to secure the debt; and in his bill he set out the foregoing facts, and averred that Bartlett A. Henson was the principal on said bond, and the plaintiff and the other obligors were his sureties; and that Omohundro took the land with full knowledge of the deed of trust to secure the debt. He claims that having paid the money he was entitled to be substituted to the rights of Minor under the said deed of trust; and he prays that the land may be sold, and the money he had paid might be repaid to him, and for general relief.

Omohundro answered the bill. He admitted as true the facts, so far as they were sustained by record evidence; but as to all other facts alleged, especially payments said to be made by the plaintiff to Minor, he called for strict proof.

513 *The case was referred to a commissioner to state an account of the payments made by the plaintiff, and the report was several times recommitted. The last report stated the amount paid by Benjamin Henson, charging interest on the payments, from the date of payment, at $2,257.20, as of January 1st, 1872. He made a special statement omitting the interest, showing the amount paid to be $2,143.38.

Omohundro excepted to the report, 1st, because it was made prematurely; Wm. W. Minor, the executor of Dabney Minor, deceased, not having been made a party in the suit; and 2d, to the fixing the amount due at $2,257.29, because it results from compounding the interest; which was erroneous.

After filing the exceptions to the report, Omohundro was, on the 10th of October 1872, allowed to demur to the bill, on the ground that Minor was a necessary party. And on the same day the cause came on to be heard, when the court overruled the demurrer, and adopting the special statement of the commissioner, made a decree, that unless Omohundro, within six months from the date of the decree, should pay to the plaintiff, Henson, the sum of $2,143.38, with interest on $1,415.10, part thereof from the 1st of January 1872 till paid, and the costs of this suit, a commissioner named should proceed to sell the land in the bill mentioned, in the mode and on terms stated in the decree. After the decree was made the cause was removed to the Circuit court; and then Omohundro applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Wm. J. Robertson, for the appellant.

Watson & Perkins, for the appellee.

514 *Anderson, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion that William W. Minor, executor of Dabney Minor, deceased, had no interest in the subject of the suit, and was not a necessary party. The deed of trust was executed to secure the payment to the said Minor, as executor as aforesaid, of four bonds, which had been given to him by Bartlett A. Henson and his sureties, Benjamin Henson, the appellee, and others, for the purchase money of a tract of land belonging to the estate of Dabney Minor, deceased, which had been sold and conveyed by deed of record by said Minor, executor as aforesaid, to the said Bartlett A. Henson, and which, subsequently, the said Bartlett sold and conveyed to the appellant. Three of the bonds were fully paid by the principal himself to the said Minor. Upon the fourth and last bond suit had been brought, and judgment obtained by the said Minor, which was fully satisfied by Benjamin Henson, the appellee, one of Bartlett A. Henson's securities, who brought this bill in equity, to enforce by right of subrogation, Minor's lien upon the land.

What interest could Minor have in the suit? He was fully satisfied of the debt secured by the deed of trust, and had no further interest in the subject. And the security of the debtor was entitled for so much of it as had been paid by him, to be subrogated to the securities and remedies of Minor, the creditor, upon well established principles of equity.

If the appellee was seeking to enforce this lien as the assignee of Minor, upon the authority of Littlejohn v. Ferguson, 18 Gratt. 53, 81, 82 and 83, Minor would not have been a necessary party. Minor did assign to him without recourse. But it is insisted by the learned counsel for the 515 appellant, that the assignment was nugatory, *because Minor having received payment, the debt due him was discharged, and he had no interest in the bond and security to assign. Whether the assignment was nugatory or not it is not material to decide. But the argument that it is, is based on the concession that Minor had no interest in the subject of the suit. Why then should he be made a party to a suit in which he had no interest? There is less reason for making him a party to a bill by a security who paid the debt, to substitute him to his rights and remedies, than in a bill by his assignee to enforce the lien; because, in the latter case, the security does not rely on the ground of a transfer of his right by the act of Minor.

And it is not necessary that he should be made a party for the protection of the appellant, the subsequent purchaser of the land, because, when the appellee paid the debt, his payment was a full satisfaction and discharge of the obligation of his principal and his securities to Minor, and is a legal bar to any claim which might be made by him to the land. Minor has no claim that he could set up against it. His bond is filed in the clerk's office with the record of the suit, and is merged in the judgment, which the return upon the execution shows is satisfied. After the bond was discharged he has no claim against the land which he could ever assert. It is not then necessary for the appellant's protection that Minor should be a party to the suit; and there is no error in the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer for this cause.

The court is further of opinion that there is no error for which the decree should be reversed for not decreeing primarily against Bartlett A. Henson personally. Omohundro asked for no decree against him. He, as grantee of Henson, took the land as 516 it was in *the hands of Henson, subject to the lien. And as it was competent for Minor to have proceeded primarily against the land in the hands of Henson, to subject it to the payment of the debt, so it was competent for him to have proceeded against it primarily in the hands of Omohundro, the purchaser from Henson, with notice of the lien; and if Omohundro had paid Henson, he had recourse against him on his covenants. But the court having all the parties before it, to the end that complete justice might be done, might have decreed over in favor of Omohundro against Henson, his grantor, if, upon an issue being made between them, it appeared that Omohundro was entitled to recourse against him. But no such demand was made by Omohundro, and no such issue was made between him and Henson. If it had been, it was a matter of interest only between the appellant and his grantor, which did not concern the appellee. He was entitled to stand in the shoes of the creditor, whose debt he had paid, who had an unqualified right to recourse primarily against the land. And if a decree over against his grantors can be of any avail to the appellant, the cause is still open for him to ask for such decree, which might raise an issue between him and his grantor, if he should have any equities against it, which may still be determined by the court below in this cause; but it is not right that the appellee should be postponed to give the appellant further time to litigate such matter with his grantor,—if he should desire to do so.

The court sees no error, and is of opinion to affirm the decree of the Circuit court with costs and damages.

Decree affirmed.

1. Suit for Partition—By Guardian.—It is a suit for partition, and E might properly bring it.

2. Same—Sale—Conclusiveness of.—If in the progress of the cause, it appears to be a case under the statute for a sale of part of the land, and a sale was made, which all the adult parties and E, as guardian of her children, approved, and it was confirmed and perfected by payment of the purchase money and a conveyance, it cannot afterwards be questioned by the infants as unauthorized in that suit.

518 *3. Same—Same—Rights of Purchaser.—Even if it is doubtful whether E could maintain such a suit, yet it having been brought, and the sale having been so made and perfected, the purchaser will not be disturbed in his purchase at the suit of the infants.

V. Decree—Binding on Infants.§—It is well settled in Virginia that an infant, as a general rule, is as much bound by a decree against him as a person of full age. He is not permitted to impeach such decree, except on the same grounds as a person of full age may impeach it—such as fraud, collusion or error.

VI. Judicial Sales—Rights of Infants.—But in suits for partition, whenever the court sells and conveys an infant's inheritance, he is entitled to an opportunity of making a defence at any time within six months after he arrives at full age.

VII. Same—Rights of Innocent Purchaser.—The errors for which a judicial sale of an infant's land may be set aside must be substantial errors. A fair purchaser is not bound to go through all the proceedings, and to look into all the circumstances and see that the decree is right in all its parts. He has the right to presume the court has taken the necessary steps to investigate the rights of parties, and upon such investigation has properly decreed a sale. He will not be affected by any imperfection in the frame of the bill if it contain sufficient matter to show the propriety of the decree. The propriety of the sale must be tested, and its validity determined by the circumstances then existing, and the surrounding circumstances. The only matter for enquiry is, Did the court have jurisdiction of the subject matter? Were the proper parties before it? Were the proceedings regular? Was the sale proper under all the circumstances then surrounding the parties? If so, the title of an innocent purchaser is not to be disturbed, because, from subsequent events, the sale has proved unfortunate for the infants.

In March 1863 Ellen S. McCue instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Augusta county, and in her bill she set out that she was the widow of John McCue, deceased, who departed this life in April 1862, seized and possessed of a tract of land of seven hundred and eighty-nine acres, estimated to be worth $90 per acre, and also of a number of slaves and other valuable personal property. That the heirs and distributees of said McCue are the plaintiff, and said McCue's ten children, naming them, eight of them by a former 519 *wife, all of whom were of age, and two of plaintiff's, who were infants of tender years. That plaintiff is desirous of having her interests and those of her children (whose guardian she is) in the estate, clearly ascertained and laid off. She is willing to have her dower in the land assigned in kind, or that it be commuted for a sum in gross, as may be deemed most advantageous for all concerned. That the buildings, which are large and valuable, are at one end of the farm. That it is obvious if the dower of plaintiff were laid off and the estate divided among the heirs, it would give but a small portion to each. For this reason it will probably be to the interest of all parties to sell the land entire or in two or more parcels. If a sale should be deemed advisable, it might be necessary to sell the mansion house and the adjacent land, in order to make the rest bring its value, as the absence of improvements on the other parts might deter parties from purchasing. Plaintiff, however, merely makes these suggestions for the consideration of the court. She is content to take either a fair allotment of dower, or the equivalent in the form of a commutation for money. She prays that all necessary steps may be taken by the court to have her rights in the lands, slaves, &c., of her deceased husband, ascertained and assigned to her in kind, or its equivalent in money; and that the interest of her infant children may be also ascertained, and placed under her control as their guardian; and that all such orders and decrees may be made as may be necessary for a full and final adjustment and settlement of the rights of all the parties in the whole estate, real and personal, and to secure to each and every one their respective rights, &c. The administrator and all the children of John McCue, deceased, were made parties defendants.

520 *The adult defendants answered.

Some of them objected to the commutation of the plaintiff's dower in the land, and insist she shall take the same as the law directs. They all agree that if the land remaining after laying off the plaintiff's dower, can not by consent, be satisfactorily sold in parcels, it be divided among the heirs; but in respect to this matter they are willing the subject may be disposed of in a manner most conducive to the interests of the heirs at law; conceding, however, to each heir, and reserving for themselves respectively, the right to take each his share in kind, provided it can be done without manifest injury to the others. The infants answered by guardian ad litem.

The cause came on to be heard on bill and answers, when, by consent, the court appointed commissioners to make a survey and plat of the land, laying off one-third in quantity and quality, which might be assigned to the widow for dower. And in order that the court might be advised, in case the court should decree a sale of the whole tract, out and out, the commissioners were directed to report by metes and bounds, in what parcels the land should be sold; and they shall give their opinion whether it would be most expedient, in case of a sale out and out, to sell the whole tract together or in parcels. And if the court should determine to assign dower in kind, they should report whether it would be best for the heirs to sell the remainder in the tract as a whole or in parcels. There were other enquiries directed which need not be stated.

In June 1863 the commissioners returned their report. They report against selling the whole land, either all together or in parcels, and against commuting the widow's dower. They think that amid the 521 inflation *of the currency and uncertainties which harass the country, it is best for the widow and her infant children, to have a comfortable home, and land enough to guarantee to her at least an adequate and secure support. They have accordingly assigned to her dower; and this includes the mansion house and improvements and one hundred and eighty-seven acres of land, and is laid down on the survey and plat returned with the report. They assigned to Bell, who owned two shares in the land, a tract of one hundred and twenty acres; and there still remained four hundred and seventy acres for distribution in whole or in parcels. The commissioners concluded to divide it into two parcels of equal value. These tracts, the commissioners say, may be sold or allotted to the heirs; the upper tract to four heirs, who may unite in taking it as coparceners; and the lower tract to four, who may take it. They express the opinion, that in case a sale be made of the residue after deducting the land assigned for dower and to Bell, it would be best to sell in the parcels designated as the upper and lower tracts, instead of selling the whole four hundred and seventy acres together. They say that they have been informed that the Misses McCue (Hannah and Martha) prefer retaining their interests without sale, and that the widow, who is the guardian of the infant children, prefers likewise retaining their shares; and they think it probable these four shares could be allotted together, constituting one of the said two tracts; and so with regard to the other four shares.

The cause came on to be heard on the 16th of June 1863 upon the report of the commissioners, which, except as modified in the decree, was confirmed. The assignment of dower in the land to Mrs. McCue was confirmed; and the parties by 522 their counsel suggesting *to the court that it will promote the interests of all concerned to sell the residue of the tract, after deducting the dower aforesaid, in three parcels, rather than make an assignment of any particular parcel to any one or more of the heirs, and to make an equal division of the proceeds of the sale among the heirs, A. H. H. Stuart, William H. Harman and Hugh W. Sheffey, were appointed to sell the same in three lots described in the decree, upon the terms specified therein; but with the privilege to the purchaser to pay the whole amount of his purchase money in cash.

In July 1863 the commissioners proceeded under this decree to sell the land, when Moses Zirkle became the purchaser of two of the lots, one of  $234\frac{7}{8}$  acres at \$185 per acre, and the other of  $183\frac{1}{4}$  acres at \$175 per acre; and he paid the whole purchase money in cash. The other lot was purchased by Bell, who held one-fifth interest in the estate.

The commissioners returned with their report of sales of the land, a paper signed by Mrs. McCue, as guardian of her two infant children, and all the other heirs, in which they say that being entirely satisfied that the lands belonging to said McCue's estate sold at the sale by commissioners Stuart, Harman and Sheffey, sold for their full value, they express their approbation of said sales, and their wish that the court shall confirm the same.

The cause came on again to be heard in November 1863, when the court confirmed the report; and by another decree a commissioner was appointed and directed to convey to Zirkle and Bell respectively the land purchased by them, by deed with general warranty binding the heirs of John McCue, deceased.

In this suit the slaves were divided, the administration account was settled, 523 and the whole estate, except *the widow's dower, distributed; but it is unnecessary to refer to these things further.

In September 1871 Alexander H. McCue and Henry M. McCue, infants, who sued by Ellen S. McCue, their mother and next friend, instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Augusta county against the widow and the other heirs of John McCue, deceased, and Moses Zirkle, to review the decrees in the aforesaid suit, and that the sales of the land may be set aside. In their bill they set out very fully the averments of the bill and the answers. They say that the suit was instituted by the widow alone, claiming dower and distribution in the estate of her husband, but asserting no right in the estate; and it was not instituted under the act for the sale of infants lands. They say no witnesses were examined, or facts agreed by the adult heirs, before the decree appointing commissioners to make report; they refer to their report, as against a sale; and yet with a knowledge that a partition in kind could be made, and a sale was not for the interests of the parties, yet upon a mere suggestion by counsel, that it would promote the interest of all concerned to sell the land, after deducting the dower, in three parcels, &c., the court decreed the sale of the land, &c. And they pray that the decrees and proceedings in said suit may be reviewed, reversed, and set aside, and the plaintiffs restored to their rights; and for general relief.

Zirkle demurred to the bill; and also filed a plea that he was a bona fide purchaser of the land; was clothed with the legal title to it by deeds duly executed to him, which he exhibits; and that he had paid in full the purchase money for said lands; that he had been in undisturbed possession of said lands under said deeds since the day of 524 1863; and *that at the time said deeds were executed and delivered to him, he had no notice of any equitable claim or title of the complainants in and to said lands, or of anything connected with the sale sufficient in law to avoid such deeds. He also answered referring to the proceedings in said suits, and insisting that the court was authorized and justified by the facts to decree a sale of the land in that suit.

The cause came on to be heard on the 3d of April 1873, when the court made a decree to overrule the demurrer and review the decrees; and that the decree in said cause made on the 16th day of June 1863, so far as the same provides for the sale of the real estate of John McCue, deceased, in said decree mentioned, and all subsequent proceedings in said suit founded upon and intended to give effect to the sale so decreed be set aside and annulled, so far as they effect the rights or interests of the infant plaintiffs in this cause. And commissioners were appointed to lay off to the plaintiffs each one-tenth of the said land purchased by Zirkle and Bell, &c., &c. And thereupon Zirkle applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Sheffey & Bumgardner, and Tucker & Christian, for the appellant.

George M. Cochran, for the appellees.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question for our consideration is as to the true character of the suit brought by Mrs. Ellen McCue in the year 1863. It is clear that the bill was not filed under the statute which authorizes a 525 suit in the *name of the guardian for the sale of the ward's real estate. It was not so intended, and it would be unjust to all the parties so to treat it.

The bill is plainly a suit for assignment of dower to the widow, and for partition of the realty among the heirs, or a sale, as might be deemed most conducive to the interests of all. The complainant describes herself as widow and as guardian. Although she does not formally sue as guardian, the averments are sufficient to bring her before the court in that character. She sets forth the names of the children; the quantity and equality of the lands; that it would be for the interest of all the parties to sell it, either entire or in two or more parcels; she asks that the interests of her infant children may be ascertained and placed under her control as guardian, and that such orders may be entered as may be necessary for a full and final adjustment and settlement of the rights of all the parties in the whole estate, real and personal. In this respect the case is very similar to that of Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 551. In that case objection being made that the bill did not formally aver that it was filed by the complainant in his capacity of guardian, Judge Daniel, speaking for the whole court, said: "But surely this can furnish no sufficient ground for reversing the proceedings, when it is seen that the bill distinctly states his qualification as guardian of the children; details the facts and reasons going, in his opinion, to show that it would be to the interest of the children as remaindermen that the land should be sold and the proceeds properly invested." Now what is here said very strongly applies to the case before us; and we may fairly consider the original bill of Mrs. McCue filed as well in her capacity of guardian as in that of widow.

526 *It is said that it is not competent for a guardian to maintain a suit for partition. It is difficult to perceive any very good reason why he is not. The guardian has the legal right to the possession of the ward's lands during the guardianship. He may maintain trespass for an injury to the soil; or even ejectment for its recovery. He may grant a copy-hold in reversion or remainder in his own name. He may have a writ of right of ward, and recover the land and damages, as well as the body of his ward. 2 P. Wms. 122; Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. 556.

In Bacon's Abridgment it is laid down, that a guardian may make partition in behalf of the infant; and it will bind the infant if equal; for the guardian is appointed by law to take care of the inheritance of the ward. Bacon Abr., Guardian, 415. And in Schouler on Domestic Relations, 472, the doctrine on this subject is thus expressed: "Guardians may assign dower; and it seems the assignment will bind the heirs. Guardians may also institute proceedings for partition. Such proceedings in England should be by bill in equity. In this country the subject is usually regulated by statute."

These authorities sufficiently show that it is competent for the guardian to institute proceedings in equity for a partition of the ward's lands. Indeed, the judge of the Circuit court has recognized the original bill as a suit for partition. After setting aside the decree of sale under which the appellant claims title, the decree directs a partition of the lands which are the subject of controversy here.

But if it be conceded, that according to strict right, a suit for partition cannot be maintained by a person occupying the position of both guardian and widow, still, if a bill is filed by such person for assignment of dower, and in the progress of the suit the court, having all the heirs before it, should ascertain that these interests will be protected by a partition or sale, there would seem to be no reason why it should not decree accordingly, instead of turning the parties around to a new suit. It would be simply a decree between defendants. Such an irregularity, if it be one, would clearly not be sufficient to reverse the proceedings and vacate the sale as against a purchaser for value clothed with the legal title.

The only remaining inquiry is, whether the court was warranted in decreeing a sale of the lands, instead of directing a partition.

It must be remembered that the sale took place in 1863; that the rights of a bona fide purchaser are involved, a purchaser who has paid the full amount of the purchase money, whose purchase was confirmed by the court; who received his conveyance, and was put in possession of the property. It is held in many states, that such a purchaser will not be affected by errors in the proceedings under which the sale was made. It is the established doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the courts of several of the states, that if the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the proper parties are before the court, rights acquired by third persons under authority of the decree will be sustained, notwithstanding a reversal of such decree.

In Gray v. Brignardello, 1 Wall. U. S. R. 627, 634, the Supreme Court of the United States say: "Although the judgment or decree may be reversed, yet all rights acquired at a judicial sale while the decree or judgment was in force, and which they authorized, will be protected. It is sufficient for the buyer to know that the court had jurisdiction, and exercised it, and that the order, on the faith of which he purchased, was made, and authorized the sale. With the errors of the court he has no concern. These principles have so often received the sanction of this court, that it would not have been necessary again to reaffirm them had not the extent of the doctrine been questioned at the bar. In support of this view, the court cites the case of Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Peters' R. 168; Voorhees v. Bank of United States, 10 Peters' R. 449; and other cases. See also articles cited in Rorer on Judicial Sales.

These authorities are not cited for the purpose of following or approving the rule they establish, but simply to show the extent to which the decisions of other states have been carried. This court has never given its sanction to the doctrine, that the title of the purchaser is not affected by a reversal of the decree under which the sale is made, nor has it expressly repudiated that doctrine. The question with us must be regarded as an open one.

It is, however, well settled with us, that an infant, as a general rule, is as much bound by a decree against him as a person of full age. He is not permitted to impeach such decree except on the same grounds as a person of full age might have impeached it, such as fraud, collusion or error. 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 221.

In Williamson v. Gordon, 19 Ves. R. 114, Lord Eldon said: "Admitting the right of the infant to show cause, he cannot do that if the decree would have been right against him had he been an adult. He can show nothing but error in the decree."

In Pierce's adm'ors v. Trigg, 10 Leigh 406, 429, Judge Tucker said: "The decree against an infant, though it gives him a day in court to answer, is of the nature of a final decree, and is carried into execution as such; nor is it reversible, but for error or fraud or collusion."

*Since the revisal of 1849 and '50, it is unnecessary to insert in the decree a provision allowing the infant a day to show cause; but in any proper case he may, within six months after he arrives at maturity, show such cause in like manner as if the decree contained such provision."

It is laid down by some authorities, that in suits for partition the infant has no day in court, but is bound by the decree absolutely; but the better opinion is, that he has the right in such cases to show cause against the decree. This privilege has, however, been taken away by statute in England, and now in suits for partition in the courts of that country no day is given. But in this state the rule seems to be well settled, that whenever the court is asked to sell and convey an infant's inheritance, he is entitled to an opportunity of making a defence at any time within six months after he arrives at full age. The only exception to this rule is found in those proceedings in equity under the statute for the sale of small inheritances of less value than three hundred dollars. Parker & als. v. McCoy & als., 10 Gratt. 594.

Conceding that the title of the purchaser falls with the reversal of the decree, and that the infant can only reverse upon showing error in the decree, the question still recurs as to the nature of the error sufficient for such reversal as against a purchaser not a party to the suit, who has paid the purchase money and received his conveyance under a decree of confirmation.

According to the English practice, if a mortgage is foreclosed the infant has his day; but if a sale is decreed, instead of a foreclosure, the infant is absolutely bound by the decree, and has no day. And so if the land is decreed to be sold to satisfy judgment creditors, *without an account of the personal estate, the purchaser will not be affected by the error.

Neither in the case of a foreclosure, nor a sale under the mortgage, is the infant permitted to unravel the accounts, nor to redeem by paying what is reported as due. See Wilkinson's adm'or v. Oliver's representatives, 4 Hen. & Mun. 450.

In Parker et als. v. McCoy et als., 10 Gratt. 594, 605, Judge Lee in delivering the opinion of the court said: "There are strong authorities to show that a fair purchaser is not bound to go through all the proceedings and to look into all the circumstances, and see that the decree is right in all its parts, and that it cannot be altered in any respect. He cannot, of course, be protected against a title not in issue in the cause, nor against the claims of persons not parties to the cause, and therefore not bound by the decree; but it would seem that he has the right to presume the court has taken the necessary steps to investigate the rights of parties, and upon such investigation has properly decreed a sale.

In Daniel & als. v. Leitch, 13 Gratt. 195, 210, Judge Moncure also speaking for the other judges said: "The purchaser at a judicial sale will not be affected by error in the decree, such as not giving a day to show cause in cases in which a day ought to be given, or in decreeing a sale of lands to satisfy judgment debts without an account of the personal estate. A fortiori, he will not be affected by any imperfection in the frame of the bill if it contain sufficient matter to show the propriety of the decree.

In the case of Walker's ex'or v. Page et als., 21 Gratt. 636, 643, Judge Christian, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The right of an infant to show cause against a decree which affects his interests after he arrives *at age, must be limited to the extent, to show cause existing at the rendition of the decree, and not such as arose afterwards."

These extracts, and others that might be given, show that while this court has never gone as far as the courts of other states in favor of purchasers at judicial sales, it has, on all occasions, manifested a very strong disinclination to interfere with the rights of such purchasers, unless upon palpable and substantial errors in the proceedings and decrees under which such titles are acquired.

In the language of this court, in Parker & als. v. McCoy et als., already cited: "It is, of course, to the interest of the infant that the property should bring the best possible price; and it is to the public interest that the real estate of the citizen should be properly cultivated and improved. But who would be willing to purchase the land of an infant at a fair price, or to improve it after he should purchase it, if at a remote period, when the infant attained his age, he could come in, rip up the whole proceeding, and reclaim the property. The effect must be either to put an end to such sales altogether, or to occasion ruinous sacrifices, still farther impoverishing the helpless and needy object of the court's protection."

In Voorhees v. Bank of the United States, 10 Peters' R. 449, 476, the Supreme court say: "The principles which must govern this and all other sales by judicial process, are general ones adopted for the security of titles, the repose of possession, and the enjoyment of property by innocent purchasers, who are the favorites of the law in every court and by every code."

Bearing these principles and rules of decision in mind, we are to consider whether the court, in decreeing the sale of the infant's land, committed such error *as demands a reversal of the decree and the vacation of the sale. Was it a case for partition exclusively, or might the court, under the circumstances, direct a sale of the different interests of adults and minors? Our statute provides that: "In any case in which partition cannot be conveniently made, if the interests of those who are entitled to the subject or its proceeds will be promoted by a sale of the entire subject, or allotment of part and sale of the residue, the court, notwithstanding any of those entitled may be an infant, insane person, or married woman, may order such sale, or such sale and allotment, and make distribution of the proceeds of sale according to the respective rights of those entitled.

Under this section, the case must be one in which partition cannot be conveniently made; and it must appear that the interests of the parties will be promoted by a sale of the property. These concurring circumstances are necessary to warrant a decree for such sale. It is not necessary they should appear from the report of commissioners, or by the depositions of witnesses. It is sufficient if the facts appearing in the record reasonably warrant the decree of sale. This is especially true when the proceeding is to defeat the title of an innocent purchaser.

If the report of the commissioners appointed by the court to assign the widow's dower and partition the land of the infant had said, or even indicated, that such partition could be conveniently made, or that the interest of the parties would not be promoted by a sale at that time, it would be very difficult, by anything appearing in the record, to overcome the weight due to evidence of that character. But I do not understand the report as making any such averment, or containing any recommendation of the kind. The commissioners 533 *do say it is not best for the widow, or for the interest of all concerned, to sell the whole tract, out and out, altogether, or in parcels. But this statement was made in answer to the proposition to sell the widow's dower also, and pay her a sum in gross, or the interest on one-third of the purchase money. They, the commissioners, express the opinion that, under all the circumstances, it is best for her and the infant children to have a comfortable home and land enough to guarantee to her at least an adequate and secure support. And they say: "Accordingly we have assigned the widow" her dower, including the mansion house and improvements, and one hundred and eighty-seven acres of land.

The commissioners do not partition the residue of the tract among the heirs according to their respective interests—they do not recommend it—they do not intimate that it could be conveniently done. What they did do was to divide the tract into two parcels of two hundred and forty acres, each equal in value. These parcels to be sold, or one of them to be allotted to four heirs, who may unite in taking it as coparceners, and the other to be disposed of in the same way. Of course this plan was not feasible unless all the parties consented to its adoption. They did not consent to it, and of course it was abandoned. After the assignment of dower, and of David T. Bell's two interests, there remained only four hundred and seventy acres for division among eight heirs, being about sixty acres to each one. The commissioners clearly saw the difficulty of partitioning a small tract among so many, with due regard to wood and water and places of residence. They were no doubt satisfied it could not be conveniently done, and the division into two tracts was the only plan that could 534 be adopted consistently with *the interests of all the parties. It is impossible to give any other interpretation to the report.

After that report was made and returned, the parties by their counsel suggested to the court, it would promote the interests of all concerned to sell the residue of the tract in three parcels, rather than make an assignment of any particular parcel to any one or more of the heirs. A decree of sale was entered accordingly; and Alexander H. H. Stuart, William H. Harman, and Hugh W. Sheffey, were appointed commissioners to make the sale. The sale was made, and the appellant became the purchaser of two parcels—one of two hundred and thirty-four acres at one hundred and eighty-five dollars per acre, and the other of one hundred and eighty-three acres at one hundred and seventy-five dollars per acre, making in the aggregate the sum of $75,920.62. The adult heirs, including the husbands of those that were married, expressed their entire approval of this sale, their conviction that the land was sold for its full value, and they united in a written request to the court to confirm the sales. Mrs. McCue, the mother and guardian of the infants, joined with the others in making this request. Upon this ratification by all concerned, the purchaser paid the whole amount of the purchase money, and the court confirmed the sale—the learned judge, the Hon. Lucas P. Thompson, expressing his conviction that the land was sold for a fair price. Thereupon a deed of conveyance was executed, and the purchaser placed in possession.

We have here then the report of the commissioners that the land could not be divided; we have the statement of all the parties concerned, that the interest of all would be promoted by a sale; we have the written request of the six adults, and 535 the mother and guardian *of the two infants, that the sale might be confirmed; and we have the deliberate opinion of the distinguished and discriminating judge then presiding, that the land was sold at a fair price: we have all these concurring facts and circumstances in favor of this purchase. There is nothing in this record adverse to this pretension, except the entire loss of the infants' share of the purchase money. Had the struggle in which we were engaged terminated differently, it is highly probable—nay, it is almost certain—this controversy would never have arisen.

If any proposition can be regarded as well settled, it is, that the propriety of this sale must be tested, and its validity determined, by the circumstances then existing and surrounding the parties. The purchaser can no more be held liable for the loss of the fund by the results of the war than he would be for its loss from the insolvency of a guardian, or the failure of a bank in which the fund was deposited.

In the opinion just delivered by Judge Christian, he has quoted largely from the observations of this court in Walker, ex'or, et als. v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636, 644. These observations apply with equal force to the case in hand. It is unnecessary, however, to repeat them here. They, in effect, declare that now after the Confederate currency has perished, that as subsequent events have transpired, it is easy to show that the interests of the infants have not been promoted by a sale of their real estate during the war; and if such considerations could govern the adjudications of this court, then, every such sale in which infants were interested must be annulled. But this is not the true criterion. The only matter for inquiry is: Did the court have jurisdiction of the subject matter; were the proper parties before it; were the proceedings 536 regular; *was the sale proper under all the circumstances then surrounding the parties. If so, there is no pretence for interfering with the title of an innocent purchaser, because in the light of subsequent occurrences the sale has proved injudicious and unfortunate for the interests of the infant.

For these reasons, the decree of the Circuit court of the 3d of April 1873, and of the 16th of June 1874, must be reversed and annulled, and the bill of the appellees dismissed with costs.

The decree was as follows:

This day came the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the decree aforesaid is erroneous. It is therefore decreed and ordered that the same be set aside, vacated and annulled; and that the appellant recover against the appellees Alexander H. McCue and Ellen S. McCue, next friend of Henry M. McCue, an infant, his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And this court proceeding to pronounce such decree as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered: It is further decreed and ordered that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed, and that the defendant, Moses Zirkle, recover against the plaintiffs his costs by him about his defence in this behalf expended: Which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Augusta county.

Decree reversed.

537 *Beirne v. Rosser & Turner.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Plea in Abatement—When Bad.*—R brings assumpsit against B. in the county of N. and the process is served upon him. B appears at the rules, and files a plea in abatement, that at the time of the service of the process upon him, and at this time, he was not and is not a resident of N; but was and is an inhabitant of, and resides in M county, West Virginia. This plea does not give the plaintiff a better writ in this state; and is therefore bad.
2. Evidence—Parol Proof of Writings.—Plaintiff offers in evidence the copy of a letter from himself to the defendant, and states that defendant replied to that letter. He states on oath that he placed the letter with other papers in the hands of his counsel in West Virginia; that he had written to his counsel to send him his papers by express, which the counsel did, writing to him at the same time that he had sent him all of his papers that were in his hands; but the letter and other papers which he put in the counsel's hands were not in the package of papers so sent. That he had not since ap-

(2d Ed.) 1164-65, where the principal case is cited; Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 289, also citing the principal case. For a qualification of the general rule, see Warren v. Saunders, 27 Gratt. 267. plied to the counsel for the letter, because he supposed it was useless after the counsel's letter saying he had sent all the papers. Held: There being no suspicion of fraudulent purpose, that parol proof of the contents of defendant's letter was admissible in evidence.

3. Exceptions—Form of Bill.*—The exceptions of the defendant to the admission of parol proof of the contents of his letter, not stating what was so proved, the appellate court cannot know whether or not the appellant was injured by the evidence and therefore cannot reverse the judgment even if the admission of the evidence was improper.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Nelson county, brought by Rosser & Turner against Oliver Beirne, to recover a balance of $2,378.39, 538 which *they claim to be due to them for constructing a road leading from the Sweet Springs in Alleghany county, to the White Sulphur Springs in Greenbrier. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; and thereupon Beirne applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was awarded. The case is fully stated by Judge Moncure.

Watson, for the appellant.

Whitehead, for the appellee.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Nelson county. Rosser and Turner brought an action of assumpsit in that court against Oliver Beirne, a resident of Monroe county, in West Virginia, who happened at the time to be in Nelson county, and upon whom the summons in the case was executed in that county. The declaration contained the common counts. The bill of particulars filed therewith, shows that the action was brought to recover a balance claimed to be due for the construction of a road, leading from the Sweet to the White Sulphur springs. The defendant pleaded in abatement, "that at the time of and before the institution of the suit, and at this time (to wit, the time of filing the plea) he neither was, nor is, a resident of Nelson county, nor of Virginia; but was and is an inhabitant of, and resides in Monroe county, West Virginia; that he has no land, estate or debts within the county of Nelson aforesaid, subject to the claim of the said plaintiffs; and that the cause of action for *Bills of Exceptions—Necessary Statements in.—A bill of exceptions objecting to the admission of improper evidence must show the facts. See Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 661; Martz v. Martz, 25 Gratt. 361; Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Gratt. 1; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 387; Valley M. L. Ass'n v. Teewalt, 7 Va. 421; Taylor v. Com., 90 Va. 110; Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 157; Harman v. City of Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 37, and note.

Venue.—For the general principle that a transitory action may be brought wherever the defendant may be found and served with process, see Mahany v. Kephart et als., 15 W. Va. 621; Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 767, citing the principal case.

which said suit was brought, or any part thereof, did not originate in the said 539 county of *Nelson, Virginia, but in the county of Monroe, West Virginia, aforesaid." To this plea the plaintiffs filed a demurrer, in which the defendant joined. The demurrer was sustained. The defendant afterwards pleaded non assumpsit; to which the plaintiffs replied generally. On the trial of the issue thus made up, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages at $2,378.39, with legal interest thereon from the 1st day of January 1867; and judgment was rendered accordingly. On the trial of the cause the defendant excepted to an opinion of the court then given, and tendered his bill of exceptions, which was signed and sealed by the court, and made a part of the record.

It appears from the said bill, that on the trial, one of the plaintiffs (Fayette Rosser), being introduced for the plaintiffs, was shown a paper in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Mr. Beirne,

Dear Sir: I am willing to make your road from the Sweet springs to the White Sulphur, 19 feet wide, except in difficult places, say 18 feet; and to be paid for thorough grading 60 cents for rock, and 29 cents for dirt, per cubic yard, and the prices for thorough embankments that are given for thorough cutting; $2.88 per perch for bridge masonry, rubble work, and the same price for culverts; the superstructure of the bridges at cost. In changing Cove creek channel, in order to save bridging, 60 cents for rock and 30 cents for dirt. I am willing to construct the road at the above prices, complying with the specifications, and complete it within 12 months from the time of contract for the sum of $850 per mile.

540 I shall expect to be *paid every month for the amount of work done—the ten per cent. reserved on the monthly payments.

Respectfully,

May 8, '60.

Thos. Rosser.

The bridges and culverts are not included in the mile:"

and testified that the same was in the handwriting of his father, Thos. Rosser; and being asked if the defendant replied to said letter, answered that "he did;" and was proceeding to state the contents of the letter of the defendant in reply; to which the defendant by counsel objected; and the witness being asked what had become of the said reply, said that it had been lost; that he, the witness, had possession of it, and he placed it, with other papers, in the hands of a lawyer in Union, Monroe county, West Virginia; that after the witness returned to Virginia, he wrote to his lawyer to send him his papers by express, which the lawyer did; writing to him at the same time that he had sent him all of his papers that were in his hands; but the letter and other papers that he had put into the hands of his said lawyer, were not in the package of papers so sent him by express; and being asked if he ever afterwards applied to his lawyer for the said O. Beirne's letter, said that he had not. And being further asked, why he did not do so, said that he did not think it worth while to apply again, as the lawyer had written to him that he had sent him all of the papers he had in his possession belonging to the witness; nor had he ever informed the lawyer that he had failed to send said reply. And thereupon defendant's counsel objected to the witness stating the contents of the said letter of the defendant, on the 541 ground that no *proper foundation had been laid for giving secondary evidence of the contents of the said letter. But the court overruled the said objection, and allowed the witness to testify as to its contents; to which ruling of the court the defendant excepted as aforesaid.

To the judgment aforesaid the defendant applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded accordingly. The only errors assigned in the petition are: 1st, that the court sustained the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the defendant's plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court; and, 2ndly, that the court erred in admitting upon the trial, parol evidence of the contents of the alleged letter of the petitioner.

As to the first error assigned, to-wit: in sustaining the demurrer to the plea in abatement; the court is of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in sustaining the said demurrer.

All actions are either local or transitory. Real and mixed actions are local, and personal actions are transitory. This is a personal action; being for the recovery of damages for the breach of a contract; and is, therefore, a transitory action. It is a general principle of the common law, that a transitory action can be brought against a party wherever he may be found and served with process; no matter where he may reside, or where the cause of action may have arisen. See Story on the conflict of laws, 538; and 1 Rob. Pr., new edition, pp. 316, 353, 354, 356 and 357, and the authorities there cited. This general principle is modified by statute, which has created various exceptions to it. Most of them will appear by reference to 1 Rob. Pr., new edition, pp. 357 and 358; Code p. 1082, ch. 165; p. 1083, ch. 166; and p. 1088, ch. 167. But this case comes within the general principle and 542 not *within any of the exceptions. It is a case in which no court in the state has jurisdiction, except that in which it was brought, whose process was executed upon the defendant within the county over which it has jurisdiction; and that court has jurisdiction because, and only because, the defendant was found and served with process within the county. That fact gave that court jurisdiction, according to the general principle of the common law before referred to. The plea in abatement did not give to the plaintiff a better writ; did not show what court in the state had jurisdiction of the case; which was necessary to make the plea a good one. If the defendant be within the state, so as to be served with process thereon, there must be a remedy against him in some court in the state; and if in no other, in the courts of the county in which he may be found and be served with process. The plea in this case was therefore not a good one, and the demurrer to it was properly sustained.

As to the second error assigned; that the Circuit court erred in admitting upon the trial parol evidence of the alleged letter of the appellant.

The first question presented by this assignment of error is, whether a sufficient foundation was laid to authorize the introduction of parol or secondary evidence of the contents of the letter? Was the loss of the letter sufficiently proved, or was a sufficient excuse shown for not producing it on the trial?

Fayette Rosser, one of the plaintiffs, on his examination as a witness in the case, testified that the letter had been lost. If his testimony had stopped there, he would have proved the loss of the letter, which would have been sufficient to let in secondary evidence of the contents of the letter. But he did not stop there. The witness proceeded to explain how the letter was 543 *lost: "that he, the witness, had possession of it, and placed it with other papers, in the hands of a lawyer in Union, Monroe county, West Virginia; that after the witness returned to Virginia, he wrote to his lawyer to send him his papers by express, which the lawyer did, writing to him at the same time, that he had sent him all his papers that were in his hands; but the letter and other papers that he had put in the hands of his said lawyer were not in the package of papers so sent him by express." And being asked if he ever afterwards applied to his lawyer for the letter said, "that he had not;" and being further asked, why he did not do so, said, "that he did not think it worth while to apply again, as the lawyer had written to him that he had sent him all of the papers he had in his possession belonging to the witness; nor had he ever informed the lawyer that he had failed to send said reply." Was a sufficient foundation thus laid for the introduction of secondary evidence of the contents of the letter?

The letter was proved to have been out of the state; and "the question has occasionally arisen," as is said in a note (446) to 2 Phillips on Evidence, Cowen & Hills and Edwards' notes, edition of 1868, page 434, "whether proof that a paper is out of the state, will, of itself, be sufficient to lay the foundation for introducing secondary evidence of its contents without further evidence showing an effort to obtain it. In Connecticut it has been held that it would not. Townsend v. Atwaler, 5 Day's R. 298, 306. So also in Louisiana, Lewis v. Beatty, 8 Martin, N. S. 150. Otherwise, however, in Kentucky; and the court likens it to the case of a subscribing witness absent from the state. Boone v. Dyke's legatees, 3 Monr. R.

530. See also Eaton v. Campbell, 7 Pick. R. 10." In this case there was further 544 *evidence, showing an effort to obtain the letter. After the witness returned to Virginia, he wrote to his lawyer living in West Virginia, in whose hands he had placed the said letters with other papers, requesting him to send him his papers by express; which the lawyer did, writing to him at the same time that he had sent him all of his papers that were in his hands; but the letter and other papers that he had put in his hands were not in the package of papers so sent him by express. The witness further said, in answer to questions propounded to him, that he never afterwards applied to his lawyer for the letter, that he did not think it worth while to do so, as the lawyer had written to him that he had sent him all of the papers he had in his possession belonging to the witness; nor had he ever informed the lawyer that he had failed to send said letter.

Now was this evidence that the letter was out of the state, taken in connection with the effort which was used by the plaintiffs to obtain it, a sufficient foundation for the introduction of parol or secondary evidence of its contents?

The Circuit court was of that opinion, and so decided. Will this court say that the decision was erroneous, and on that ground reverse the judgment?

The point thus decided was a preliminary and incidental one, addressed solely to the court, and not affecting the issue to be tried by the jury; and parties and persons interested are recognized as competent witnesses in respect to the facts and circumstances necessary to lay a foundation for secondary evidence. 1 Phil. on Ev., supra, p. 436, note 446, and cases therein cited.

"Secondary evidence," as is said in note 473 to that work, page 469, "is not admissible, if by reasonable diligence the 545 original could have been *produced; but the degree of diligence will depend on the nature of the transaction to which the paper relates, the apparent value of the paper, and other circumstances."—"The rigor of the old common law rule has been relaxed in this respect; and the non-production of instruments is now excused for reasons more general and less specific, upon grounds more broad and liberal than were formerly admitted. In general, the party should give all the evidence reasonably in his power to prove the loss. He is not bound, however, to furnish the strongest possible assurance of the fact. If any suspicion hangs over the instrument, or that it is designedly withheld, a rigid enquiry should be made into the reasons of its non-production. But where there is no such suspicion, all that ought to be required is reasonable diligence to obtain the original. In practice, when there is no ground of suspicion that the paper is intentionally suppressed, nor any discernible motive for deception, courts are extremely liberal in regard to secondary evidence." After making the above, and other remarks on the subject, and referring to cases to sustain them, the writer of the note thus concludes:

"From the foregoing observations, extracted from several cases, it will be seen that but very few propositions of a general character can be safely advanced on this subject. The sufficiency of the proof given, by way of allowing a resort to secondary evidence, is, in general, a preliminary point addressed to, and to be determined by the court exclusively, and upon which they are to pass in view of the peculiar features which may chance to characterize each case as it arises." The record in this case discloses no ground for suspicion that the letter was intentionally suppressed, nor any discernible motive for deception on the part of the plaintiffs.

546 *We cannot therefore say that the decision of the Circuit court on this preliminary point is erroneous, and that on that ground the judgment ought to be reversed.

But even if we could say that such decision is erroneous, can we say that it sufficiently appears from the record that the defendant was injured by such error?

In order to reverse a judgment of the court below, it ought to appear to the appellate court not only that there is error in the judgment, but that such error injured the party who complains of it.

Can we say that the error complained of in this case, if there be such error, injured the party who complains of it?

The bill of exceptions states, that the court overruled the objection to the witness stating the contents of the letter, and allowed him to testify as to such contents. If it can be inferred from the record that such contents were stated by the witness, certainly none of them are set out in the bill of exceptions, and we cannot therefore say that the defendant was injured by the testimony. The letter may have had no relation whatever to the case, or none that was at all material, or may have been rather in support of the plaintiff's than the defendant's side of the case. If the defendant was injured by the admission of the testimony, ought he not to have shown the fact by setting out the testimony in his bill of exceptions?

In Nailor v. Williams, 8 Wall. U. S. R. 107, decided by the Supreme court of the United States in 1868, it was held, that where a question is asked of a witness, which is illegal only because it may elicit improper testimony, and the court permits it to be answered, against the objection of the other party; if the witness knows nothing of the matter to which he is inter-

547 rogated, *or if his answer is favorable to the objection party, it is not error of which a revising court can take notice. It works him no injury. If it does work the objecting party injury, he can show it by making the answer a part of the bill of exceptions, and unless he does this, there is no error of the sort mentioned.

In Johnson's ex'or v. Jennings' adm'r, 10 Gratt. 1, decided by this court in 1853, a question was propounded to a witness, which was objected to; but the objection was overruled, and an exception was taken. The exception did not state the answer of the witness, nor that he answered the question. The answer might have been of no importance, or of no injury to the exceptant. This court would not reverse the judgment on that alleged ground of error.

In Stoneman's case, 25 Gratt. 887, decided by this court in 1874, an objection to a question asked and to the witnesses answering it, was overruled, and an exception taken, which did not state the answer. This court held, that an appellate court could not consider the question intended to be raised by the exception. That case was a prosecution for murder. In answer to a question of the attorney for the commonwealth, a witness said that she had received a message from the deceased. The attorney then asked her to state what the message was. To which question and the witness answering the same the prisoner objected; but the court overruled the objection, and directed the witness to answer. The bill of exceptions, however, did not state whether in fact the witness answered the question or not. In delivering the opinion of the court, Judge Staples said, on this branch of the case: "It may be that she (the witness) was unable to remember or repeat the message. And if she remembered and 548 *repeated it, we have no means of knowing what it was. The message may have related to some matter having no connection with the homicide. It may have been so entirely immaterial as to produce no impression on the mind of the jury. The bill of exceptions ought to have contained the answer of the witness, that this court may see whether it is material, and possibly may have affected the finding of the jury. The omission renders it impossible for us to consider the question raised by this bill of exceptions."

According to the principle of the foregoing cases, we are of opinion that the bill of exceptions, if it shows any error at all, shows none to the injury of the plaintiff in error. It may be said in this case, according to what was said by the court in Stoneman's case: it may be that the witness was unable to remember or repeat the contents of the letter; and if he remembered and repeated them, we have no means of knowing what they were. They may have related to some matter having no connection with the matter in issue; or may have been so entirely immaterial as to produce no impression on the mind of the jury. The bill of exceptions ought to have contained the testimony of the witness as to the contents of the letter, that this court might see whether it was material and possibly may have affected the finding of the jury.

Upon the whole, we are of the opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit court, and that the same ought to be affirmed.

Staples, J. was of opinion that a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of parol proof of the contents of the letter. Upon the other points he concurred with the other judges.

Judgment affirmed.

549 *Peters v. Neville's Trustee & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Receivers—Collections in Confederate Money.—Bonds well secured are given by purchasers at a judicial sale made in 1860, and they fall due in 1861, 1862 and 1863. In 1860 P is appointed a receiver to collect the purchase money; and he collects that due in 1862 and 1863 in Confederate money, and makes no report to the court, but retains it in his own hands. He was not authorized or justified in receiving Confederate money, and it is not to be scaled.
2. Appeals—Failure to Except to Commissioner's Report.*—Where an exception is not taken to a commissioner's report, on a question which might be affected by extrinsic evidence, and the question is not made in the court below, the appellate court will not consider it.
3. Same—Amendment of Decree Appealed from.—After an appeal has been allowed in a cause, by consent of parties a decree is made, modifying, in one respect, the decree appealed from. The appellate court may amend the decree appealed from in that respect, and affirm it.
4. Same—Same.—A decree directing a receiver to pay certain sums to parties, which should bear interest from a certain day, will be amended, and so amended will be affirmed.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Nelson county, brought by Frederick G. Peters, to subject the real estate of La Fayette Neville to satisfy the plaintiff's judgments. Other creditors of Neville came in by petition; the land was sold by commissioners in 1860, upon a credit of one, two and three years; and in that year Peters was appointed a receiver to collect the purchase money. The only material question in the case is, whether moneys collected during the war by Peters should be 550 scaled? The court *below refused to scale them, and Peters applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

Coghill and Fitzpatrick, for the appellant.

Thompson, Wm. M. Cabell, Whitehead & Wm. J. Robertson, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The main and almost the only question arising in this case is, whether the amounts collected by the appellant, F. G. Peters, as receiver in this case, in Confederate money, ought to have been scaled?

The following is a statement of the facts and history of the case, so far as material to be stated.

This suit was brought in March 1859 by the appellant, the said F. G. Peters, to enforce his judgment liens against the real estate of La Fayette Neville, deceased, consisting of a tract of land in the county of Nelson known as "Locust Grove," containing six hundred and fifty-five acres. Other creditors of said Neville, by judgment and otherwise, afterwards came in, on petition or motion, and joined in the prosecution of the suit. On the 1st of October 1859, it appearing to the court that the sale of the said tract of land must necessarily be made, the court without deciding any other question in the case, and reserving for future decision the question how the proceeds of sale should be distributed, decreed that the said tract of land should be sold by commissioners appointed by the court for the purpose, for cash as to so much of the purchase money as was necessary to defray the expenses of sale, and on a credit of one, two and three years as to the residue, to be paid in three equal annual instalments, to be secured 551 by bonds with good security, *bearing interest from the day of sale, and the title to be retained until the purchase money should be fully paid. In August 1860, the said tract of land was accordingly sold by the said commissioners, who shortly thereafter made their report to the court.

On the 29th of September 1860, the cause came on to be heard on the papers formerly read and the said report of sale, to which report and sale there was no exception; and on consideration thereof the court approved and confirmed the sale. The decree then proceeds in these words: "And it appearing from the deeds filed in the cause, that F. G. Peters (the plaintiff and appellant) is now the owner of the dower right of Mary J. Neville in the "Locust Grove" tract of land sold as aforesaid, which dower right the said F. G. Peters elects to commute and receive the value thereof in money; and all the parties in interest in this cause consenting to said election, the court doth adjudge, order and decree that the commissioner in chancery, who may take the accounts hereinbefore directed, (by a decree made on the 8th of May 1860,) do ascertain the money value of the dower right of Mary J. Neville in the purchase money of "Locust Grove," as of the 27th of August 1860, the day of its sale, and make report to the court; and it being suggested that the purchaser of said land desires to pay off and retire one or more of his bonds before they mature, the court doth adjudge, order and decree that F. G. Peters, who is hereby appointed a receiver for the purpose, be at liberty to withdraw the bonds of Stevens, Fulks & Harvey, for the purchase money of "Locust Grove," (upon leaving attested copies thereof,) and proceed to collect the same." But the said Peters was required first to give bond with good security for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office of receiver.

552 *No other decree or order was made in the case, and nothing further appears to have been done in it for six years, and until the 5th of October 1866, when a further order was made in regard to the taking of the accounts before directed, which had not been taken, either in whole or in part; and the said receiver was directed to report his proceedings at the next term. Nothing further appears to have been done in the case until 1870 and 1871, when commissioner Kirby settled the accounts ordered to be taken by decrees made in the cause in 1860; and on the 8th of March 1871 he made his report. From that report, it appears that the dower right of Mary J. Neville, which had been assigned to the receiver, was valued at $1,401.68; which, with interest from August 27, 1860, to January 1871, making $869.97, amounted to . . $2,271 65; and that his two judgments, with interest to the same day and costs, amounted to . . . 1,508 86; making his whole claim against the fund, including interest, $3,780 51.

It further appears from the report, that the receiver was charged by the commissioner with the following sums of money collected of the purchasers of said land, viz:

1860, October 5—To cash $700; 1862, November 24, ditto $1,500; 1863, January 3, ditto $1,300; 1863, July 27, ditto $1,000; 1868, September 23, ditto $300.95. 1869, January 1, ditto $20; making the amount of principal collected . 4,820 95; on which the interest to 1st January, 1871, amounted to . . 2,271 67; making the whole amount of principal and interest . $7,092 62.

553 *From the interest the Commissioner deducted $20 paid William Cabell, and $8.47 costs of suit, . . . 28 47; and the balance remaining due on that account appeared to be $7,064 15, with interest on the principal, $4,820.95, from January 1, 1871, till paid. The receiver did not appear and make any exception before the commissioner, but made the following exception and affidavit after the return of the commissioner's report, viz:

Exception.

"The plaintiff, F. G. Peters, receiver in this cause, excepts to so much of commissioner Kirby's report as charges him with the full amount received by him of S. C. Stevens. All of the sums so received, except the sum of $700, as of the 27th of August, 1860, were collections in Confederate money, and liable to scale. See affidavit of F. G. Peters filed herewith, marked 'A.'"

"State of Virginia—Nelson county.

This day Frederick G. Peters personally appeared before me, a justice of the peace in and for the county aforesaid, and made oath, that all the collections made by him in the case of Peter's su'g partner v. Neville, &c., were in Confederate notes, save and except the sum of $700 of principal and $21.95 of interest; that he did not appear before said commissioner in said cause, and show said fact, because he was of opinion that said commissioner would, of his own motion, scale all collections made after January 1st, 1862. Given under my hand this 23rd day of March, 1871.

P. H. Cabell, J. P."

554 *On the 15th day of September, 1871, by consent of parties, the cause came on again to be heard upon the papers formerly read, the said report of commissioner Kirby, the said exception of the plaintiff and receiver thereto, and other exceptions thereto by other parties, and was argued by counsel: on consideration whereof the court overruled the plaintiff's exception, and made other rulings in regard to the other exceptions; and recommitted the report to the same commissioner, to restate the accounts according to the said rulings; who was authorized to proceed without any further notice to the parties, except reasonable notice of the time to the respective counsel engaged in the cause. In stating the account the commissioner was directed to report any other judgment claims against Lafayette Neville which might be proved before him.

On the 6th day of March, 1872, commissioner Kirby made his supplemental report in obedience to the last mentioned decree, after reasonable notice to all the counsel of all parties interested; which report he said he believed was made in conformity with all the rulings of the court in the said decree of the 15th of September, 1871. There was no exception to that report by any party.

On the 27th March, 1872, the cause came on again to be heard on the papers formerly read, with the supplemental report aforesaid, to which there was no exception, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof the court ratified and confirmed said report; and also ratified and confirmed the original report, in so far as it was not in conflict with, and modified by said supplemental report; said modification having been made in conformity with rulings and instructions of the court. And the court proceeded to decree a distribution of the parties respectively, as ascertained by said supplemental report.

From the two decrees of the 15th of September 1871, and the 27th of March 1872 aforesaid, the plaintiff and receiver, F. G. Peters, applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was accordingly allowed, and which is the case now before us.

The only error in the said decrees assigned in the petition for an appeal is, because the exception taken by the petitioner to the commissioner's report should have been sustained, and the Confederate notes collected by him scaled to their good money value.

Was that an error? We are of opinion that it was not. The money collected was due on account of a good money debt, created in the year 1860. That the larger portion of the debt became payable during the war, when Confederate notes constituted the only currency of the country, is a fact which did not of itself authorize the receiver to collect the debt, or any portion of it, in a greatly depreciated currency—depreciated to the extent to which Confederate notes were depreciated at the times of the collection made by the receiver in such notes.

The debt continued to be a good money debt, notwithstanding that Confederate notes became the common, or even the only currency of the country, when the deferred instalments became payable; and it was solvable only in good money. The receiver was neither justifiable nor excusable in making the collections which he did make on account of the debt in Confederate notes. The only decree or order made by the court in regard to the collection of the debt was the decree of the 29th of September 1860, appointing a receiver, and giving him liberty, after executing the bond required of him, to withdraw the bonds for the purchase money of the land, and 556 to *proceed to collect the same. At that time Confederate notes were not in existence, and there was no reason to believe they ever would be. The currency then in existence, and likely so to remain indefinitely, was a specie currency, or, what was equivalent thereto, one easily convertible into specie. When afterwards, and before the deferred instalments of the purchase money became due the currency became depreciated, it was the duty of the receiver not to collect the money in that currency, but to let it remain uncollected, or, at all events, not to collect it without the express direction of the court. The debt was perfectly secure, and was not in the least danger of becoming otherwise at any future time. Its collection was not required by any necessity or convenience of the parties entitled to it, at least other than the receiver himself. It could not be distributed, for it had not been ascertained by any settlement of accounts in the case, who was entitled to it, or in what proportion. He did not pay the money so collected, or any part of it, to any other party, nor into court; nor did he invest it either under the order of the court or on his own responsibility. He did not ask the court for its instruction; nor did he ever make any report to the court on the subject. He did not consult the wishes of any of the other parties entitled to the money. It does not appear that anybody concerned, besides the debtor and himself, ever knew, before the war was over, that he had collected a dollar of Confederate money on account of the debt. He could have collected it only for his own benefit, and he no doubt used it accordingly. He no doubt believed that the amount due to him would be about equal to the amount he collected, and that the latter would ultimately be applied to the former.

At that time the widow's dower right, 557 which *had been assigned to him, had not been valued; and he probably supposed it would be valued higher than it afterwards was. "On the 3d of January 1863," it is said in the brief of one of the counsel, and no doubt truly, "Confederate treasury notes were three for one of gold; and on the 27th of July 1863 they were nine for one of gold, as per scale of Miller & Franklin, brokers, which has been adopted by the Circuit court of Nelson county." At the former period $1,300, and at the latter period $1,000, were collected by the receiver in Confederate notes on account of the debt. He may have been able, as was sometimes the case at that period, to use these notes in such a way as to make them worth their par amount, or nearly so to him. And, if so, it would be unjust in the last degree to charge the other creditors of Neville with the amount of the depreciation of these notes at the periods of their collection. But, whether so or not, it would be unjust and illegal so to do. That the receiver had not a right to make these collections in Confederate money, at least at the risk or loss of any other person concerned than himself, and that he is justly chargeable, and was properly charged with their amount in good money, is, we think, clear, both upon principle and authority; and it is sufficient, in support of this conclusion, to refer to what was said by this court in the cases of Moss &c. v. Moorman's adm'or &c., 24 Gratt. 97, and Hannah's adm'or v. Boyd &c., 25 Id. 692, cited in the argument.

We are therefore of opinion, upon this main question in the case, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the exception of the appellant to the report of commissioner Kirby.

We now proceed to notice some other matters of minor importance in the case.

558 *Mundy's ex'or, whose claim is postponed to all the judgment liens, and cannot be fully satisfied by reason of the deficiency of the fund for distribution, complains, that he has been injured by the act of the commissioner in deducting the amount due to the appellant, including principal, interest and costs on the 1st of January, 1871. $3,955.51, from the principal due by the receiver, $4,820.95, leaving a balance of principal for distribution on that day among the judgment creditors amounting to $865.44, and leaving the entire interest due by the receiver on that day, to-wit: $2,243.20, for distribution; instead of deducting the amount so due to the appellant, first from the said interest, and then from the said principal; thus leaving a balance due by the receiver of $3,108.64, all principal, for distribution. It is contended that the effect of this error, if it be one, is a loss of interest on $2,243.20, the amount of interest due by the receiver aforesaid, from the 1st day of January 1871, to the 27th of March 1872, the date of the decree confirming the commissioner's report and making distribution of the fund. This loss would be comparatively inconsiderable, amounting only, it seems, to $166.78. But a complete answer to this objection seems to be, that neither Mundy's ex'or nor any of the other creditors made any exception whatever to the commissioner's report, on that or any other ground; but suffered the same to be confirmed by the court, and a decree entered in pursuance thereof, and started the objection for the first time in this court, more than three years after the decree was rendered. We are of opinion that the objection came too late, and the parties were then concluded from making it by their omission to except to the commissioner's report, and by lapse of time and acquiescence. It 559 is a general rule that a *commissioner's report, so far as it is not excepted to, is admitted to be correct, not only as regards the principles, but as relates to the evidence on which it is founded. 2 Rob. Pr., old ed., p. 383, and the cases there cited. "Reports which are erroneous upon the face of them, although not especially excepted to prior to the hearing, may, perhaps, be objected to at the hearing, or in the appellate court. But it is clear that reports not excepted to, cannot be impeached before an appellate court, in relation to matters which may be affected by extraneous testimony. Id. Whether or not interest ought to be charged to an executor in the statement of his accounts, has been considered by an appellate court to be a matter the decision of which might be affected by extraneous testimony. Id. 384, citing White's ex'or v. Johnson, &c., 2 Munf. 285. Not only is that a question here, but the subject of the objection now for the first time made, might in other respects have been affected by extraneous testimony. Suppose the parties consented that the account should be settled by the commissioner as it was, in regard to the manner of applying the fund in the hands of the receiver to the payment of the amount due to himself. Of course, if said consent had been proved before the commissioner, it would have been binding; and it might have been proved if an exception had been taken to his mode of stating the account.

Mundy's ex'or also complains, that injustice was done by the commissioner to the other creditors of Neville, in deducting the full amount due to the receiver himself from the funds in his hands before anything was paid to the other creditors; thus placing the two on unequal ground, and subjecting the latter to the risk of possible loss from not realizing the whole residue of the trust fund. The same answer may be made to this complaint as was made to the other. The subject of it might have been fully explained by extraneous testimony. The mode of settlement adopted by the commissioner may have been assented to by all the parties concerned. They may have given such assent from motives of liberality or of policy—of liberality to the receiver, who was charged with the Confederate money collected by him at its nominal amount, while he was allowed no commission as receiver; and of policy, to induce him to acquiesce in the charge, and not appeal from the decree. This view is confirmed by what is said in some of the briefs in this case. In that of the appellant's counsel it is said: "The decree was drawn by one of the counsel of the first class creditors, and ordered to be entered by the court without any objection from any quarter." And in that of the counsel of some of the judgment creditors it is said: "In a spirit of liberality this was permitted and acquiesced in, the counsel for the judgment creditors not excepting to the report, and preparing the decree which was entered." Certainly it was too late, several years thereafter, to make the exceptions for the first time and in the appellate court.

We are therefore of opinion that the errors complained of by the appellee, Mundy's ex'or, are not well founded, and do not exist.

But there is another matter referred to in the briefs and in the arguments of counsel which requires attention. After the appeal in this case was obtained, and while it has been pending in this court, to wit: on the 17th of March 1874 a consent decree was made by the Circuit court of Nelson county in this cause, whereby the decree of the 27th of March 1872, so far as it was in favor of Elizabeth Hopkins, executrix of 561 Arthur *Hopkins, deceased, was reduced and modified as mentioned in said consent decree. The former decree ought therefore to be amended, as if the latter had been embodied in it, instead of so much thereof as was in favor of the said Hopkins' executrix as aforesaid.

The said decree of the 27th of March 1872 ought to be further so amended as expressly to give running interest from its date till payment, on the following sums of money thereby decreed to be paid as of that date to the following named parties, viz: $218.84 to R. L. Jefferson; $1,021.21 to Hubbard, Gardner & Co., assignees of John W. Mosby; and $195.57 to N. R. Powell.

The court is therefore of opinion that the decrees appealed from, with the amendments aforesaid, ought to be affirmed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decrees aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion that the decree appealed from ought to be amended, according to the consent decree made in this cause on the 17th day of March 1874, while it was pending in this court, of which consent decree a certified copy is contained in an appendix to the record of the case in this court, and was considered by the court as a part of said record; and it is accordingly ordered that the said decrees appealed from be so amended, and that the said decree of the 27th day of March 1872 be read and considered, as if so much of it as is in favor of Elizabeth Hopkins, executrix of Arthur 562 Hopkins, deceased, *were stricken out of the same, and instead thereof, the said consent decree were embodied in the said decree of the 27th day of March 1872 as part thereof.

The court is further of opinion that the said decree of the 27th day of March 1872 ought to be further so amended as expressly to give running interest from its date till payment, on the following sums of money thereby decreed to be paid as of that date to the following named parties, viz: two hundred and eighteen dollars and eighty-four cents to R. L. Jefferson; ten hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty-one cents to Hubbard, Gardner & Co., assignees of John W. Mobsy; and one hundred and ninety-five dollars and fifty-seven cents to N. R. Powell; and it is accordingly ordered that the said decree of the 27th of March 1872 be so amended.

The court is therefore, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, further of opinion that there is no error in the said decrees appealed from, amended as aforesaid; and it is decreed and ordered that the said decrees so amended be affirmed, and that the appellees recover of the appellant their costs by them about their defence in this court expended, and damages according to law; and it is ordered that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court, for further proceedings to be had therein, in conformity with the foregoing opinion and decree; which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Nelson county.

Decree amended and affirmed.

*Sipe v. Earman &amp; als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Deeds of Trust—Validity—Preference of Creditors.*—

A deed of trust to secure bona fide creditors, which conveys land, horses, cattle, &c., farming implements, household and kitchen furniture, growing grain and vegetables, the grantor to retain possession for three years, by paying the interest on the debts secured, is not fraudulent per se, though *Preference of Creditors. — The general principle, that in the absence of statute a debtor may make such preference in paying his debts as he sees fit, is applied in Paul v. Baugh et als., 85 Va. 958; Williams v. Lord and Robinson et als., 75 Va. 402; Lucas, Sergeant, etc., v. Claffin & Co., 76 Va. 277; Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 272; *Gordon v. made without the knowledge of the creditors secured.

2. Same—Same—Execution Pendente Lite.—Nor does the execution of the deed pending a suit against the grantor, by a creditor not secured by it, and a short time before the term at which it was probable judgment would be rendered against him render the deed fraudulent.

3. *Same—Same—Postponement of Sale by Provision in Deed.**—Nor does a provision in the deed, authorizing a sale of the property within the three years at the instance of the grantor, render the deed fraudulent.

4. Same—Fraudulent Intent in Grantor.†—If there was a fraudulent intent in the grantor in making the deed, (of which there was no evidence,) as it is not fraudulent on its face, and the trustee and creditors secured by it had no knowledge of its execution until it was done, they cannot be affected by such fraudulent intent, and the deed is valid as to them.

5. Bill in Equity—Prayer for General Relief.—A judgment creditor files a bill to set aside the deed for fraud, and for general relief. Though the deed is held to be valid, the plaintiff is entitled to the surplus after paying the debts secured; and the bill should not be dismissed, but under the prayer for general relief, he is entitled to an account of the debts secured by the deed, and to have a sale of the property.

In September 1869 Joseph Sipe brought a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, to set aside a deed made by Peter F. Earman to secure John Carpenter and others named in the deed, certain debts therein named.

The bill states, that in August 564 *1867 the plaintiff recovered a judgment in the County court of Rockingham against Peter J. Earman for $1,676.82, with interest and costs. That a short time before said judgment was recovered, the said Peter F. Earman made a deed, by which he conveyed all of his property to John W. Earman, for the ostensible purpose of securing the payment of the debts mentioned in said deed. He charges that the deed was made with the intent to hinder and defraud the plaintiff; that the pretended debts secured in the deed, or a large portion of them, are not bona fide debts; that the deed is fraudulent upon its face, and fraudulent in fact. And he states that Earman had since gone into bankruptcy. And making Peter F. Earman, John W. Earman, the trustee, and the creditors named in the deed, as also the assignee of Earman, parties defendants, he prays that the said deed of trust may be set aside as fraudulent and void, and the property therein conveyed applied to the payment of plaintiff's debt by a sale thereof under a decree of the court; and that he might have such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require and to equity seem meet.

The deed which was filed as an exhibit with the bill, bears date the 7th of May 1867, and conveys to John W. Earman one tract of land of one hundred and seventeen acres, lying in the county of Rockingham, with all the growing crop thereon, four horses, &c., naming cattle and sheep, two wagons, one spring wagon, one carriage, farming implements of every description, all his household and kitchen furniture, about ten acres of wheat and rye growing on an adjoining farm, also the corn growing on the same place, in which he had an interest, also his interest in ten acres of oats and in the crop of potatoes and sorghum on another place he names, and also 565 the melons on the *place where he was then living, in trust to secure John Carpenter in a debt of $500, &c., naming the other creditors and their debts. The deed then says: It is covenanted expressly herein that the said grantor is to hold, occupy and enjoy the use and profits of the property herein conveyed for the term of three years from this time, by paying the interest on the debts herein secured annually, and then if at the end of three years all the debts herein secured are not liquidated at that time, the person or persons holding a majority of the debts then unpaid, may at any time require the trustee, upon due notice, to advertise and sell. But it is further covenanted, that at any time the said grantor may desire to sell the property herein conveyed, the parties are to allow the said sale, and receive the amount of money then due. This deed was only executed by Peter F. Earman, and was admitted to record on his acknowledgment in the office.

The creditors named in the deed, and the trustee, who was also a creditor, severally answered the bill. They all aver that their debts are bona fide, and offer the evidences of their debts. They say they had no knowledge of the execution of the deed until it was made; but when informed of it they accepted it; and they deny all fraud in procuring it, and they do not believe there was any purpose of fraud by the grantor in its execution.

Peter F. Earman also answered. He denied any fraudulent intent in executing the deed. He averred that his purpose was to secure debts he honestly owed; that the judgment of the plaintiff was recovered in his absence; that it was for the balance of an account which had not been fully adjusted, and he was entitled to large credits upon it, which had not been allowed him; and he asked that the court would direct a new trial of the case.

566 *Though a number of witnesses were examined by the plaintiff, there was not the slightest evidence of fraud or knowledge of fraud by the creditors; there were two or three witnesses who stated that after the deed was made Peter F. Earman spoke of Sipe's debt as unjust as to the amount, and that he would not pay it.

The cause came on to be heard on the 11th of October 1872, when the court held that the deed of trust was made bona fide, and was valid and binding, and dismissed the bill with costs. And thereupon Sipe applied to one of the judges of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

John E. Roller, for the appellant.

Sheffey & Bumgardner and Berlin, for the appellees.

Anderson, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The question raised by the record of this case is, was the deed of trust made by Peter F. Earman, on the 7th of May 1867 to secure his creditors therein named fraudulent?

In Dance & als. v. Seaman & als., 11 Gratt. 778, Judge Allen, in whose opinion the other judges concurred, says: "If it were a question of the first impression, it would be matter for grave consideration" "whether a deed of trust executed by a debtor on the verge of insolvency, creating preference amongst his creditors, postponing the time of sale, the possession in the meantime remaining with the grantor, and the profits to be received by him, and executed without the knowledge of, or consultation with the creditors, (very much our case,) should not be treated as made with 567 a *fraudulent intent; because the reservations may tend to hinder and delay creditors in the prosecution of their legal remedies to enforce the payment of their debts. But these questions have been settled by a series of adjudications in this court. It would disturb many titles, if the principles heretofore established, and sanctioned by the practice of the country, were now to be questioned." Where the bankrupt law does not apply, preference of favored creditors is the right of every debtor, and is a doctrine so well established, and so unquestionable, that it is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of it.

But it is contended that proof of fraud in this case arises from the face of the deed. "The court cannot presume fraud unless the terms of the instrument preclude any other inference." Dance & als. v. Seaman & als., supra. And as was said by Judge Allen in that case, so it may be said in this, "the fraudulent intent is denied by the grantor." — "As to the cestuis que trust, it is not pretended that they participated in any fraud. They were not consulted; and though, if the fraudulent intent clearly appeared on the face of the instrument, they would be affected by it if they claimed under it, the reservations on the face of the deed do not raise, under the doctrines of this court, an irresistible presumption of fraud, which would, of itself, vacate the deed."

It is true that some articles of property embraced in the conveyance are reserved for the use and enjoyment of the grantor, until default in payment, which must be consumed in the use, and could not in themselves strengthen the security; just as it was in Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348; and Dance & als. v. Seaman & als., 11 Gratt. 778; and other cases which might be cited, in which it was held that the deeds 568 were not *fraudulent. Whilst such articles of property could not directly strengthen the security of the deed, they might indirectly, by ministering to the improvement, and the support of the important and substantial subjects relied on as security, and thereby manifest an honest intent of the debtor to provide for the payment of his debts, as was held in Cochran v. Paris. But the articles of property of this description could not have been available to the judgment creditor in this case by reason of the stay law, if they had not been embraced in the conveyance. How then could the including them in the conveyance manifest an intent on the part of the grantor to defraud the judgment creditor? And his reservation of the possession and use of the whole property, conveyed for three years, is upon condition that he pay the interest in the interim annually—a condition which may be enforced by the trustee by sale if he fails in its fulfillment. The tendency of this provision is to prevent the augmentation of the debt by an accumulation of interest, whilst the use of the property by the grantor, even to the consumption of that which is perishable, which is probably not more than a compensation for the payment of interest, may improve and support and strengthen the real security of the deed if faithfully carried out. And its fulfillment does not rest upon merely the personal obligation of the grantor, but the trustee is invested with power to enforce it; as we think, upon a fair construction of the deed he is empowered to sell if it is not complied with.

The length of time allowed the debtor to pay the debts, three years, cannot prejudice the judgment creditor. He is no worse off than he would be if the deed required an immediate sale. For whatever remains of the trust fund, after paying the deed 569 of trust *creditors, is subject to his judgment debt. And if the indulgence and forbearance extended by the former creditors to the debtor would enable him to pay the interest accruing on their debts for the period of the three years of forbearance, and perchance to reduce the principal, and to increase the value of the trust subject, it would be increasing the security for his debt. And if the intermediate rents and profits are not in fact appropriated by the deed to the trust debts, they would be liable to his judgment, a liability which a court of equity would enforce. Lewis & als. v. Caperton's ex'or & als., 8 Gratt. 148. This court has repeatedly sustained the deed, in cases where it deferred payment for a long period, and the grantor reserved the right to retain possession of the property, and to enjoy its rents and profits, though no provision was made, as in this case, for the payment of the annually accruing interest. See Lewis & als. v. Caperton's ex'or & als.; Cochran v. Paris, and Dance v. Seaman, supra.

Nor does the execution of the deed pending a suit by the appellant against the grantor for debt, and a short time before the commencement of the term at which it was probable judgment would be rendered against him, render it fraudulent and void. Skipwith's ex'or v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271. Nor is the provision which authorizes an earlier sale, if desired by the grantor, repugnant to and incompatible with the avowed object and purposes of the deed, so as to render it invalid and void. This provision of the deed does not authorize the grantor to sell and account to the trustee or the cestuis que trust, as in Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. 410, and in Spence v. Bagwell, 6 Gratt. 444. Nor does it constitute him as an agent for the trustee for that purpose. 570 It only authorizes a sale to *be made of the property before the settlement, if desired by the grantor, and an application of the proceeds to the payment of the debts. By whom? We think clearly by the trustee, who is invested with the sole power of selling and paying debts. The court is therefore of opinion that the reservations on the face of the deed do not raise an irresistible presumption of fraud, which, of itself, vacates the deed, and would be notice to the creditors who take under it, so that they would be affected by it.

The court is also of opinion that the extrinsic proofs in the cause do not establish the existence of fraud, or that the deed was made by the grantor with intent to defraud other creditors, who are not provided for by its terms. If he has a right to a preference amongst his creditors, all of whom he regarded as equally just, he surely had a right to prefer those whom he regarded as just over those whom he regarded as unjust, though he might not be able to show that they were unjust. In giving such preference, the debtor may be unjust himself; yet, having the unrestricted power of alienation, if no lien has attached, he could sell his property to any creditor or purchaser, and apply the proceeds to the payment of any creditor he pleases. And if he may do so with the property or its price, there would seem to be no good reason why he should not have the right to convey it by deed of trust for the benefit of any creditor to whom he chose to give a preference. Brashear v. West, 7 Peters. R. 608; Murray v. Riggs, 15 John. R. 571. But there is no evidence that the creditors secured by the deed, or the trustee, had any knowledge of such fraudulent intent, if it could be imputed to him, or that either of them had any agency or participation therein; they were purchasers without notice of fraud, and could not be affected by it if it 571 *existed. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion, that there is no error in declaring the said deed of trust to be valid and binding.

But was there error in dismissing the plaintiff's bill? The plaintiff was entitled to the surplus fund, if any, after the payment of the debts secured by the deed of trust, and an account to ascertain their amount. But it is contended for the appellees, that he did not ask for it. There is no specific prayer in the bill for an account and the application of the surplus to the payment of his debt. The main object of the bill was to set aside the deed as fraudulent, and to subject the property primarily to the payment of his debt; and it contains a specific prayer to that end. But that is not the only object of the bill. If it were, that would be the only prayer. It prays also for general relief. That would have been unnecessary, if the only object was to set aside the deed as fraudulent, and to subject the whole property first to the satisfaction of his debt. The specific prayer is sufficient for that purpose. But, lest he might not be able to make out a case which would entitle him to that specific relief, he asks for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require, and to equity may seem meet. And whilst we think the Circuit court was right in denying to him the specific relief he asked, we think he was entitled, as adapted to the case which he made, to an order for an account and a decree for the sale of the trust subject, and an application of the surplus, if any, after satisfying the trust debts, to the satisfaction of his judgment. He was entitled to such relief under the prayer for general relief upon the case made by his bill. And so it was held in Skipwith's ex'or v. Cunningham, supra. President Tucker, in that case, at the close of a long and able opinion, in which he disposes 572 *of many intricate and important questions, and reaches the conclusion that the deed was not fraudulent, in which the other judges concurred, says: "I have now waded through all the questions in the case save one, and in that only do I find error. I think it very clear that the appellant had a right to an account of the trust fund, and to the payment of his debt out of the surplus, if any, after satisfying the schedule creditors and those who acceded to the composition." The court below had dismissed the plaintiff's bill; and for that error alone, the cause was sent back for an account and further proceedings. In that case there was no prayer for an account and an application of the surplus fund to the plaintiff's debt; but only as touching this point, a prayer for general relief. The court is of opinion, therefore, to reverse the decree for this cause and remand, and in all other respects to affirm the decree of the Circuit court.

This day came again the parties by counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in a written opinion filed with the record, that the Circuit court did not err in sustaining the deed of trust, executed by the appellee for the security of certain creditors therein named, and in giving validity to the same; but that there was error in dismissing the plaintiffs' bill, instead of directing an account to ascertain the amount of debts secured by said deed of trust, in order to a decree for a sale of the trust subject, and the application of the surplus to the satisfaction of appellant's judgment.

It is therefore ordered and decreed
 573 *that so much of the decree as dismissed the plaintiffs' bill be reversed, and that the residue thereof be affirmed. And the appellees being, in the opinion of the court, the parties substantially prevailing, it is further decreed and ordered, that the appellant do pay to the appellees their cost by them about their defence in this behalf expended: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree reversed.

*Switzer v. Switzer.

September Term, 1876, Staunton.

I. Husband and Wife—Deeds of Separation.*—A wife under the apprehension that her husband will sue for a divorce on the ground of her adultery, and anxious to avoid the scandal, unites with her husband in a deed, by which, after reciting their agreement to separate rather than seek relief by divorce, they convey to a trustee the wife's real estate worth $12,000, in which the husband has a life-estate as tenant by the curtesy, in trust for the husband during his life, and then for their two children; and she renounces all right to the custody or control of the children. And the husband covenants with the trustee that he renounces all his marital rights and control of the wife, or claim on her earnings; and that he will annually deliver to said trustee, for the benefit of the wife, *Husband and Wife—Deeds of Separation.—See on this subject, Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 52, and note; also, Dooley v. Baynes, 86 Va. 650, citing with approval the principal case.

These are the only cases in Virginia on this subject, and the court in each of them pointedly avoids passing upon the general effect of such agreements. In the principal case the deed was not declared inherently bad on account of the subject-matter, but invalid as to the wife because of her common law disability to contract. This disability now being removed by statute in Virginia, the principal case is no longer authority on the subject, and the dicta in Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 52, and in Dooley v. Baynes, 86 Va. 650, for the same reason are entitled to very little weight; hence the question as to the validity of deeds of separation may still be considered as res integra in Virginia.

35 bushels of wheat, 80 bushels of corn, 250 lbs. of pork, and he sells to the trustee for the wife certain household and kitchen furniture, a horse, buggy and harness. And the wife is to have a lien on the land to secure the performance of the husband's covenant. The wife is privily examined, and the deed admitted to record. On a bill by the wife to set aside the deed—HELD:

1. Same—Same—Validity.—Quære: If a wife is competent to contract with her husband on an agreement for her separation.

2. Same—Contracts between—Validity.—If a wife may contract with her husband on an agreement of separation, this deed is invalid, on the ground of the disability of coverture, for the want of freedom of the will in the wife in executing it, as well as the inadequacy of the consideration.

3. Same—Same—Conveyances by Statute.—The statute prescribing the mode by which the interests of femes covert in real estate may be divested, applies to conveyances executed by the husband and wife to third persons, and not to deeds executed by the wife to the husband, or for his benefit. It is the union of the husband and wife as grantors that makes the instrument operative. And this deed can derive no validity from the privy examination of the wife.

575 *4. Same—Same—As to Husband's Children.—

The deed being invalid as to the husband, is invalid as to the children. The disability, the constraint operating on the wife, and the inadequacy of the consideration, necessarily extend to them.

II. Same—Same—When Valid.—A contract between a husband and wife in an agreement for a separation, cannot be sustained in any case in which it does not clearly appear, that in the negotiation which preceded the agreement, as well as at the time of executing the same, the wife was in a position in which she could act and did act, not only with perfect freedom, but with a full knowledge and appreciation of all the circumstances of her situation, and of her individual and marital rights; and the contract in itself must be fair and just, wholly free from exception, and such as a court of equity might have imposed upon the parties in a case in which their persons and their property had properly fallen under its jurisdiction and control.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Augusta county, brought in October 1865, by Mary Switzer, by her next friend, against Benjamin M. Switzer, her husband, H. P. Hahn, and the two infant children of B. M. and Mary Switzer, to set aside a deed bearing date the 20th of July 1863, and duly admitted to record in the clerk's office of the County court of Augusta, upon the certificate of the privy examination of the wife, by which Mary Switzer conveyed two tracts of land which she inherited from her father and mother, to said Hahn, in trust for the purposes declared in the deed. The provisions of this deed are sufficiently set out in the opinion of Judge Staples.

It appears that Mrs. Switzer was the only child of Joseph and Elizabeth Shank. Joseph Shank died many years since, leaving a tract of one hundred and forty acres of valuable land. After his death, B. F. Switzer married the daughter, and they lived with the mother until her death, in 1862; and during this time Mrs. Shank bought a tract of wood land of about eighty-five acres. These tracts of land are worth from ten to twelve thousand dollars; 576 and the personal property *of Mrs. Shank, including stock on the farm, household and kitchen furniture, was worth probably about one thousand dollars.

It appears further, that by agreement between Benjamin F. Switzer and his wife, Peter S. Roller and B. F. Hahn were selected to determine upon the terms of separation; that the matter was submitted to them, and they fixed the terms as stated in the deed, which was then prepared, and at the request of the parties Hahn consented to act as trustee. Messrs. Roller and Hahn were well acquainted with the property; but they were informed that Mrs. Shank's debts at her death were between three and four thousand dollars; and there is nothing in the record on that subject. They both say that the provisions of the deed were carefully explained to Mrs. Switzer, and she agreed to them; but she was very unwilling to a separation, and as they supposed only agreed to the arrangement from apprehension of a suit by the husband for a divorce on the ground of her adultery. After this suit was brought, Benjamin F. Switzer did in fact bring such a suit, and the court decreed him a divorce a vinculo matrimonii.

The cause came on to be heard on the 3d of March 1873, when the court decreed that the said deed be set aside, vacated and annulled, as a writing void and of no effect. From this decree Benjamin M. Switzer applied to a judge of this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

A. H. H. Stuart, for the appellant.

Sheffey & Bumgardner, for the appellee.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit by a married woman 577 to set aside a *deed of separation between her husband and herself. This deed bears date 20th July 1863. It recites, among other things, that irreconcilable differences had arisen between the parties, which rendered it impossible for them to live together in mutual affection and harmony as man and wife, and they therefore proposed to live separate and apart by agreement, rather than seek relief by divorce at the hands of the court. Then follow certain covenants on the part of the husband, with the trustee mutually selected by the parties to act for the wife, by which the husband renounces all his marital rights, all control of his wife's person, and all claim to her earnings.

The wife, on her part, surrenders every right she may have to the custody and control of the children, not only during the life of the husband, but after his death.

She then conveys two tracts of land, derived by descent from her father and mother, to the trustee, in trust, that he will permit B. M. Switzer, the husband, to occupy the same during his life, and at his death he will convey the same to the children of the marriage or the survivor of them.

In consideration of this conveyance, the husband covenants that he will annually deliver to the said trustee, for the benefit of Mrs. Switzer, thirty-five bushels of wheat, thirty bushels of corn, and two hundred and fifty pounds of pork, all of merchantable quality; he also sells to the trustee, for her benefit, a horse and buggy and harness, a cow, and certain articles of household and kitchen furniture of inconsiderable value. A lien is reserved to Mrs. Switzer upon the lands conveyed for the due performance of the covenants on the part of her husband. These are the *most material provisions contained in the deed of separation.

The only question we are to consider is, how far this deed is binding upon the wife's estate of inheritance. In this state, agreements between husband and wife for separation have never been passed upon by any court of the last resort. The question is, therefore, res integra with us. In England the subject has received the fullest consideration. It is there held that deeds of separation, when properly framed, are valid, and will be enforced. The courts will not enforce a contract between husband and wife to live apart; this they pronounce void upon grounds of public policy; but they hold that the deed is valid so far as relates to the trust and covenants by which the husband makes a provision for the wife, and the indemnity given to the husband by the trustees for the wife. In Worrall v. Jacob, 3 Meriv. R. 255, 268, Sir William Grant said: "The object of the covenants between the husband and the trustee is to give efficacy to the agreement between the husband and the wife; and it does seem rather strange that the auxiliary agreement should be enforced, whilst the principal agreement is held to be contrary to the spirit and policy of the law." And he expressed his entire concurrence with Lord Eldon, that "if this were res integra, untouched by dictum or decision, he would not have permitted such a covenant to be the foundation of an action or suit." But dicta has followed dicta, decision has followed decision, to the extent of settling the law on this point too firmly now to be disturbed.

In Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Clark & Fin. R. 488, 527, Lord Brougham, in discussing this question, said: "What is the legal value or force of this kind of agreement.

Absolutely none whatever, in any court *whatever, for any purpose whatever, save and except only the obligation contracted by the husband with trustees, to pay certain sums to the wife. In no other point of view is any effect given by our jurisprudence, either at law or in equity, to such a contract."

It will be found, upon examination of nearly all the English cases, that the proceedings were at the suit of the wife for a separate maintenance, agreed to be paid by the husband. True, there are decisions enforcing the wife's covenant to pay the husband a sum of money upon an agreement for a separation. But in these cases the wife was possessed of a separate estate, as to which she is treated as a feme sole. Having the jus disponendi, she may, of course, alien or charge such separate estate, or enter into valid covenants with reference to it, unaffected by her general disability of coverture. Even here it is held, that if the agreement bears the least appearance of inequality or unfairness, the court will not assist either husband or wife in getting possession of the estate with a view to the execution of the agreement. Durand v. Durand, 2 Cox R. 207; Bright v. Chapman, 2 Anst. R. 345; Clancy on Married Women, 420; 2 Bright on Husband and Wife, 306; St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. R. 526.

There is another class of cases in which the English courts have held the covenant valid for the benefit of the husband. For example, where the agreement is so framed as to be capable of being enforced against some third person acting as trustee for the wife, and agreeing to indemnify the husband against the debts of the latter. In these cases the claim of the husband is not asserted against the wife herself, but against the person who has contracted in her behalf.

The American courts have never gone as far as the English courts in sanctioning deeds of separation between *husband and wife. In many of them, perhaps in a large majority, it is held that a covenant by the husband for the benefit of the wife, through the intervention of trustees, upon a valid consideration, will be enforced. In 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 1428, the doctrine is thus clearly expressed: "In the first place, a deed of separation does not relieve the wife from any of the ordinary disabilities of coverture. In the next place, a deed of separation entered into by the husband and wife alone, without the intervention of trustees, is utterly void. In the next place, a deed for immediate separation, with the intervention of trustees, will not be enforced, so far as regards any covenant of separation, but only so far as maintenance is covenanted for by the husband, and the trustees covenant to exonerate him from any debts contracted therefor. See Walker v. Walker's ex'or, 9 Wall. U. S. R. 743, 751; 1 Bishop on the Law of Marriage and Divorce, § 656; Tourney v. Sinclair, 2 How. R. (Missis.) 326.

The distinction between a covenant or conveyance by the husband, and covenant or conveyance on the part of the wife, rests upon very substantial grounds. The husband is sui juris; he may dispose of his estate as he pleases; he may settle it upon his wife; he may bind himself to allow her a separate maintenance. Whatever he might do, by way of making a settlement upon her if the parties were living together, he may, of course, do upon an agreement of separation. The wife on the other hand, as a general rule, can make no valid contract, especially with her husband: her legal existence is merged in him. The exceptions to this rule grew out of the possession of a separate estate by the wife, and do not affect the subject-matter here. The wife, of course, can make no valid agreement with her husband to live separate from 581 him. *Such an agreement is utterly void. It will scarce be maintained that by entering into a void contract to live apart from her husband, she can thereby make valid a covenant which would be entirely nugatory in the absence of such contract.

But if it be conceded that a wife is competent to contract with her husband upon an agreement for a separation, it is very questionable, to say the least, whether in any view the one now being considered can be sustained. The effect of the deed is to relieve the husband from every obligation to support the wife, to exclude her from all claim upon him or his property, to vest in him during his lifetime, and in the children after his death, her entire estate, of the value of nearly twelve thousand dollars. The consideration she receives in return consists of a small quantity of personal property of but little value, perishable in its nature, or readily consumed in the use. She is also entitled to receive annually for her support a small quantity of grain and pork, which will not exceed eighty dollars in value. With this she is expected to go through life; to supply all her wants; raiment, food, a home, and whatever she may need.

It is very true that the husband is tenant by curtesy of the estate, and as such he is entitled to the rents and profits for life. But this right is accompanied with the corresponding obligation to support his wife. He cannot, by his marital right, take her estate and turn her out of doors, to subsist by her own exertions, or upon the charity of friends.

But although he is tenant by the curtesy, upon his death the estate reverts to her, with an unlimited power of disposition. By the deed she has executed here, after the death of the husband it devolves immediately upon the children. She has 582 surrendered every *interest, present or future. It is difficult to believe that any person of sound mind (especially one of the weaker sex) would have executed such a deed, except under influences of a potential character, influences which, if they did not destroy, must at least have affected that freedom of will so absolutely indispensable in every contract between husband and wife. This record furnishes abundant evidence that Mrs. Switzer consented to the arrangement only from a keen apprehension of the exposure and scandal of a suit for divorce. To escape this, she would have agreed to anything her husband might have proposed in regard to her inheritance or to her future maintenance.

The learned judge of the Circuit court, who first decided this case, has very properly said in this connection, "that such an agreement cannot be sustained in any case in which it does not clearly appear that, in the negotiation which preceded the agreement, as well as at the time of executing the same, the wife was in a position in which she could act, and did act, not only with perfect freedom, but with knowledge and appreciation of all the circumstances of her situation and of her individual and marital rights; and that the contract in itself must be fair and just, wholly free from exceptions, and such as a court of equity itself might have imposed upon the parties in a case in which their persons and their property had properly fallen under its jurisdiction and control. These conditions do not exist in the present case."

The learned counsel for the appellant relies, however, upon the privy examination and acknowledgment of the wife as excluding all these questions, and as effectual to pass her interest in the real estate conveyed in the deed. The statute prescribing the mode by which the interest of femes covert in real estate may be 583 divested, *applies to conveyances executed by the husband and wife to third persons, and not to deeds executed by the wife to the husband, or for his benefit. It is the union of the husband and wife as grantor that makes the instrument operative. The deed here, being invalid for every purpose, the contract being void on the ground of the disability of coverture, and by reason of the want of freedom of will, as well as the inadequacy of consideration, can derive no validity from the privy examination and acknowledgment. The same principle applies to the children. The contract, being invalid as to the husband, is invalid as to them. They are affected by the channel through which they claim to hold. The disability, the constraint operating upon the wife, and the inadequacy of consideration, necessarily extend to them. The foundation being bad, the whole superstructure, the entire arrangement, must fall to the ground.

The learned counsel for the appellant, in his petition for an appeal, declares that the appellee appears as a convicted and divorced adulteress of the most profligate habits, seeking to recover the title to land which she had voluntarily and for good consideration united in settling on her innocent children, in order that she may acquire the right to squander it in vice, instead of leaving it to pass to these children as it had descended to her from her parents. All this may be true. But such considerations can have no effect upon the appellee's legal incapacity, as a feme covert, to make a contract with her husband. The same principles of law must apply to her agreements as to those of the most virtuous female of the land. If she is incapable as a married woman to do an act, it does not matter what is her character or her conduct. If she has title to property, the courts cannot 584 divest her of it, however *wasteful and lewd she may be, or however unfortunate may be the condition of her children.

It has been decided in some of the states, that in all cases of divorce a vinculo matrimonii, the interest of the husband in the wife's lands at once ceases, and she is entitled to be placed in their immediate possession. In this state the whole subject would seem to be regulated by statute, which provides, that "upon decreeing from the bonds of matrimony or from bed and board, the court may make such further decree as it shall deem expedient concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties or either of them, and the care, custody and maintenance of the minor children." It seems that after this suit was brought by the wife, a bill was filed by the husband against her for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, and a decree has been obtained accordingly. Whether under the statute just cited the court may make any order touching the lands in controversy, how far it may control the same, or dispose of the rents and profits, are questions which do not arise in this case. The suggestions of the learned counsel, in regard to the habits and character of the appellee, would be perhaps more properly addressed to the court having charge of the divorce suit.

In this suit, the only matter we have to consider is the validity of the deed of separation, so far as the wife's interests are affected. Upon the other branch of the question, whether such deeds and all the covenants therein are or are not invalid, even as regards the husband, upon grounds of public policy, no opinion is expressed. What view the Virginia courts may take of that question, must be a matter for future consideration.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion, there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court.

Decree affirmed.

R before demand by T sold the tobacco of T

6. Appeals—Erroneous Instructions in Lower Court.—When an appellate court is of opinion that an instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine that the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence, and therefore to affirm it. But the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Frederick county, brought in September 1869 by Trotter & Brother, partners, against William J. Rea, to recover the value of certain manufactured tobacco which the plaintiffs had stored with Rea in July 1864. There was a trial of the cause in June 1872, when Rea was examined as a witness; but after the case had been submitted to the jury to consider of their verdict, and they had been adjourned over to the next day, one of them failed to appear, and the cause was continued. At the October term of the court the death of Rea was suggested and the suit was revived against his administratrix.

The cause came on again to be heard in November 1873. The plaintiffs, to sustain their action, proposed to introduce John J. Williams as a witness; and the defendants objected to him, on the ground that he was the counsel of the plaintiffs. But the court overruled the objection; and the defendant excepted.

able compensation as implied. See Armstrong v. Walkup, 9 Gratt. 372; Lucas v. Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 282; Hurst v. Hite, 29 W. Va. 205.

†Instructions.—See note on "Instructions Generally," to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

In the progress of the trial the plaintiffs proved by John J. Williams, that in January 1869 he was employed by the plaintiffs, through A. D. Trotter in person, to collect their claim against William J. Rea, and was furnished by him with the paper marked

A, as evidence of the claim, which 587 paper was in the handwriting *of

Rea; and that he in person, and as attorney for the plaintiffs, presented said claim and paper A to Rea, who admitted the paper, and that he had received the tobacco therein specified; but stated, he had sold the same for Confederate money, because of the Federal troops, and did not think he was responsible for anything but that money. After this, witness went to see Rea, and asked for an account of sales of tobacco; whereupon Rea produced a book and handed it to witness, and directed his attention to the account; when witness, with Rea's consent first asked, copied the same; and paper C is that copy, and a correct one of said book, which remained in Rea's possession. That when, at a former trial of this cause, Rea was on the witness stand, said Williams, then counsel in the cause, handed said paper to Rea and asked him if he admitted it to be correct; to which he replied, he did: and thereupon the production of the book alluded to was dispensed with at the trial.

The paper A commences:

Received in store on account of —

Trotter by Wm. J. Rea, July 25th, 1864.

It then sets out, 7 boxes Oreta Brand tobacco; stating the weight of each box, and making together net 449 lbs. 4 boxes Fora; setting them out in the same way, and making net 243 lbs.

The paper C was a statement of the sales of the tobacco, shewing sales for Confederate money, commencing August 2 and ending September 15—the whole amount $2,665.

The defendant objected to the introduction of these papers as evidence: but the court overruled the objection; and the defendant excepted.

After the evidence had been introduced the plaintiffs moved the court to give 588 to the jury five instructions, *which the court gave, with four asked for by the defendant. To the granting of the instructions asked for by the plaintiffs and the defendant, or any of them, the defendant objected: but the court overruled the objection; and the defendant again excepted. These exceptions are numbered from one to nine, and they are given in the opinion of the court.

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for five hundred and seventy-nine dollars and seventy-five cents, with interest from July 1st, 1865. And thereupon the defendant moved the court for a new trial, on various grounds; which motion the court overruled, and rendered a judgment upon the verdict. And thereupon the defendant excepted. There was a second motion for a new trial, which was overruled; and the defendant again excepted. These exceptions are stated in the opinion of the court.

The material facts of the case seem to be, that the plaintiffs, Trotter & Co., were the carriers of the mail in stages between Staunton and Winchester, under a contract with the Confederate government. They resided in Staunton. That they could not purchase supplies at Winchester to carry on their business with Confederate money, and they had to use other articles to get them, and among them tobacco. That, with the consent of the Confederate authorities, they, shortly prior to July 25, 1864, brought a considerable lot of tobacco to Winchester; and M. Brannon, their local agent at that place, advised them to store a part of it with a Union man and part with a Southern man, and he named John Higgins as the Southern man, and William J. Rea as the Union man. That, in consequence of this advice, plaintiffs directed Brannon to make the said arrangement with those persons for the storage of the tobacco. That, accord-

589 ingly, Brannon *called upon Rea, and informed him that the plaintiffs had the tobacco, and what they had been advised to do, and that he, Rea, had been recommended to the plaintiffs as a Union man, and that he came to him by the direction of the plaintiffs, and because he was such. That Rea thereupon consented to receive the tobacco. That upon Brannon reporting that fact to the plaintiffs, A. D. Trotter, one of the plaintiffs, together with Brannon and — Rutter, who was driving the plaintiff's wagon on that night, about dark took the tobacco, less the part which they deposited with Higgins, to Rea's warehouse, opening on the alley at the rear of his lot whereon was said Rea's dwelling, and in a front room of which was his store-room, in which warehouse he, Rea, received in person the tobacco; and then and there wrote and delivered to Trotter a receipt for it, which is the paper A before mentioned. That for years before 1864 Rea had been trafficking and trading, having a store-room and back store-room in his dwelling, and a warehouse on the alley; that he continued his business through the war, and dealt in tobacco, produce, &c., and had tobacco exposed in the windows of his store at various times whilst the Union forces were in Winchester, including the year 1864.

In addition to the evidence of Williams, as hereinbefore given, the witness gave a further statement of Rea's testimony at the former trial, viz: That he received the tobacco in question in store without making any charge for storage, and that he never intended or expected to make any charge therefor; but that nothing passed between him and the plaintiffs on the subject of such charge at any time. That in September 1864, three or four days after the 19th, when General Sheridan of the Union forces took possession of Winchester, 590 *Major Young, of General Sheridan's scouts, searched Rea's house, in which was his dwelling and store-room, as he said, for tobacco and contraband goods, and found a small piece of choice tobacco in Rea's secretary (a piece of furniture in his dwelling), and took it, as he said, for his own use; that Rea after the tobacco was left, and before the 19th of September 1864, did meet Joseph Andrews, general stage agent for plaintiff's line, and gave him some message about the tobacco—what the message, as stated by Rea was, the witness, Williams, could not remember; that he, Rea, sold the tobacco of plaintiffs as well as his own, because of his apprehension, after the Confederate troops burned Chambersburg, that the Union troops would be hard on Winchester.

There is no evidence that anything was said at the time or afterwards as to the terms on which the tobacco was received by Rea. Rea proposed several times to Andrews, the general agent of the plaintiffs, to purchase the tobacco, but was told by Andrews that he had no authority to sell it. There was proof that the tobacco was sold by Rea for Confederate money and Virginia treasury notes, and that he offered the money to Trotter after the war.

Upon the application of Rea's administratrix a supersedeas was awarded.

Holmes Conrad, for the appellant.

Williams & Williams, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that Mr. John J. Williams was a competent witness for 591 the plaintiffs, notwithstanding *his relation to them as their attorney in the cause; and therefore the Circuit court did not err in overruling the defendants' objection to the competency of said witness, and in admitting the said witness, as stated in the defendants' bill of exceptions, No. 1.

The court is further of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the defendants' objection to the papers marked A and C, referred to in the defendants' bill of exceptions, No. 2, offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, through the witness, John J. Williams, in the order and connection appearing from his testimony, as stated in the certificate of facts proven, and in admitting the said papers in evidence, as stated in the said bill of exceptions. Paper A was the defendants' receipt for the tobacco mentioned in the declaration, and was not only admissible, but was most important evidence in the case, though not all the evidence. It does not set out the terms on which the tobacco was received, which, however, appeared from the other evidence in the case in connection with the receipt. The receipt was a link in the chain of evidence, tending to prove the plaintiff's case. Paper C was, in effect, an account rendered by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the sale made by the former of the latter's tobacco, and was original and not secondary evidence, although it was copied from the book of Rea. The copy was made in the presence and by the consent of Rea, though made by the plaintiff's counsel, whose act was, in effect, the act of Rea. It was an account rendered, and was no more secondary evidence, than is any other account rendered, which is almost always copied from a book. The evidence consists in the rendition of a certain account, which fact is original evidence, though the account be a copy from a book.

592 *The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in giving to the jury the instruction No. 1, moved for by the plaintiff's counsel, viz: "That they must determine from the acts, agreements, conversations and writings, circumstances and relations of the plaintiffs and William J. Rea; in short, from the whole evidence, what the contract was between said parties." The effect of the instruction was the same as if it had been: "the jury must determine from the whole evidence what the contract was between said parties." Had it been in that form, the propriety of it would not have been denied.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in giving to the jury the instruction No. 2, moved for by the plaintiff's counsel, viz: "That when one receives from another goods in store, and nothing is said between the parties as to pay for such storage, the law implies a contract that the party who receives the goods in store shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor." Where service is performed by one, at the instance and request of another, and especially where that other is personally benefited by the service, and nothing is said between the parties as to compensation for such service, the law implies a contract, that the party who performs the service shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, unless there be something in the relation of the parties or the circumstances of the case which precludes the idea of such compensation; in which case there would be an implied agreement or understanding that no such compensation was to be paid. This is an undeniable principle of law, which applies to almost every case of assumpsit on a quantum meruit. The court in such case charges, that the service was performed by the plaintiff at the special instance 593 and request of the defendant *who, in consideration thereof, promised to pay to the plaintiff as much as he reasonably deserved to have therefor. And proof that such service was performed at such instance and request, without more, will sustain the court, and entitle the plaintiff to recover in damages whatever amount he may prove the service to be reasonably worth. If it appear from the evidence that the service was to be performed gratuitously, of course nothing would be recovered. But in the absence of such proof, or proof of the like kind, the plaintiff's right to recover as aforesaid is undeniable. Now the case before us is precisely such a case. To receive and keep goods in storage for another, at the latter's special instance and request, is certainly to render him a service; that the party who renders it is not a "warehouseman," so to speak, can make no difference. The service may, in fact, be greater on that account. A warehouseman is prepared to receive and keep goods on storage, and may do so at less inconvenience than one who is not a warehouseman, and is not so prepared. It is not admitted that Rea was not in fact a warehouseman. The plaintiffs contended, and the evidence tended, to prove that he was. But that is immaterial to the question we are now considering, which assumes that, technically speaking, he was not.

Instruction No. 3, is in these words: "If the jury, in the light of the first and second instructions, believe from the evidence that William J. Rea, on the 22d of July 1864, received from the plaintiffs the tobacco sued for, and agreed for, or was entitled to compensation to keep the same in store on account of the plaintiffs and subject to their order, until they should in person, by agent or order, demand the same, and then to deliver up the same to them, their agent

594 or order, and so *agreed in view of the fact, that said Rea resided in the town of Winchester, and had his store-house there, and against any risk to said tobacco that might arise from the occupation of said town by the Federal forces, and that Rea said did not so keep the tobacco as agreed as aforesaid, nor deliver the same as agreed as aforesaid, but upon demand if the plaintiff's failed to deliver the same, or to pay, or to offer to pay in money the fair value of the same at the time of such demand, then they must find for the plaintiffs, even though they may believe from the evidence, that said William J. Rea, before said demand, sold the plaintiff's tobacco, as well as his own, because of his apprehension that the Union forces were about to occupy said town of Winchester, and would search his house and seize said tobacco, and that said forces did, after their occupation of said town, search said Rea's house for tobacco, and that one of them did take from the secretary (being a piece of furniture) of said Rea a small piece of choice tobacco for his own use."

The court is of opinion, that this instruction was calculated to mislead the jury; that there was nothing in the facts proved on the trial, as certified in the record, tending to prove that the defendant warranted the tobacco against any risk that might arise from the occupation of said town by the Federal forces, which is one of the facts, on the supposed existence of which the said instruction was based, and, therefore, that the court erred in giving the said instruction, No. 3, to the jury. There would have been no substantial objection to the instruction if the words: "And against any risk to said tobacco that might arise from the occupation of said town by the Federal forces," contained in the instruction, had been omitted. If the tobacco, as the instruction supposed, and as the evidence tended *to prove, was deposited said Rea, who resided in the town of Winchester, and had his store-house there, and who received the same on storage for a compensation to be paid him by the plaintiffs, and agreed in consideration thereof to keep the same in store on account of the plaintiffs, and subject to their order until they should demand the same, and then deliver it up to them or their order; and if the said Rea failed so to keep the tobacco and to deliver it up, he thereby became liable to pay to the plaintiffs the damages sustained by them from such breach of the contract, and of course the jury ought to have found for the plaintiffs. The questions for them to decide upon all the evidence were—1st. What was the contract between the parties? 2dly. Was it broken by the defendant, or rather by Rea, her intestate? And if so, 3dly, What damages did the plaintiffs sustain from such breach? Whether Rea had authority, under any circumstances, to sell the tobacco, depended upon the nature and terms of the contract, express or implied. If the tobacco was deposited in his hands for a special purpose, and with an understanding or agreement between the parties, that he was not to sell it at all under any circumstances, and especially not for Confederate money; and that the plaintiffs were fully aware of the risk to the tobacco from seizure and capture by the Union forces, and intended and agreed to incur that risk themselves; then, of course, Rea had no authority to sell it on account of any apprehension by him, however well grounded it may have been, that the tobacco would otherwise have been seized and captured as aforesaid. If, on the other hand, the agreement or understanding between the parties was, that Rea should take the best care he could of 596 the tobacco *with a view to its safety, and to preserve it from being seized and captured by the Federal forces, and should have authority to sell it for Confederate money if he had good reason to apprehend that it was necessary to do so to prevent its total loss by such seizure and capture, then if Rea did take such care of the tobacco, and did have good reason for such apprehension, he had such authority; and if he sold the tobacco accordingly, he is not liable to the plaintiffs for any damages sustained by them on account thereof. Now all these questions depend upon the evidence, on the meaning and effect of which the jury alone had to consider and decide. Instruction No. 3, without the objectionable words aforesaid, would have sufficiently embodied the former of the foregoing alternatives, and if given in that form would have been a good instruction, and well warranted by the evidence. The court ought therefore to have given it in that form or to that effect if any instruction at all were given on the subject.

The court is further of opinion, that the court did err in giving instruction No. 4; "that the fact that William J. Rea's house was searched after the 19th September 1864, is not competent evidence to show what a contract (if such was made) of date July 26th, 1864, was."

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in giving instruction No. 5, for the same reason for which it erred in giving instruction No. 3 as aforesaid; that is, for the reason that there was no evidence before the jury tending to prove an agreement by the defendant to protect the tobacco from seizure and capture by the Union forces. No. 5 is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence, that the tobacco in controversy was stored with 597 the *defendant, to be kept by him, and with an agreement to protect it from seizure and capture by the Union forces, then the court instructs the jury, that a sale of the same, because of a fear that the same would be seized by the Union forces, or because its possession would endanger the defendants' property, was a violation of the contract under which the same was stored; the sale of the same was unauthorized, and they must find for the plaintiffs, although they may believe that the defendant sold his own tobacco about the same time for the same price and for the same reasons."

Instruction number six is in these words: "Although the jury may find from the evidence, that Rea received Trotter's tobacco in store, to hold subject to Trotter's order, and that Rea, without authority from Trotter, did sell said tobacco; yet if they find that such sale was made from the peculiar necessities of the case, and to prevent total loss of said tobacco, then Rea is not liable, except for the proceeds of said sale, provided said sale was fairly made and for a reasonable price under the circumstances; unless they further find from the evidence, that said tobacco was deposited with the defendant Rea with reference to its care and keeping, in the possession of said Rea, in the event of the presence of the Federal forces in Winchester; and if the jury so further find, then they are instructed that said Rea was not authorized to sell said tobacco, and they must find for the plaintiff the value of the tobacco when demanded. But the burden of proof, as to the character of the contract, is upon the plaintiffs." The court is of opinion, that this instruction is vague and uncertain, and was calculated to mislead the jury, and therefore ought not to have been given.

Number seven is in these words: "The court instructs the jury, that if they 598 find from the evidence, *that Trotter deposited his tobacco with Rea, and that such deposit was for the benefit of Trotter alone, and without compensation to Rea, then Rea was only bound to use slight diligence, and was only answerable for gross negligence." Without deciding whether the Circuit court erred or not in giving this instruction, it is enough to say that the error, if any, is not to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, who has therefore no right to complain of it.

Number eight is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant Rea received the tobacco without charge in store for Trotter, and that he, Rea, afterwards, to prevent total loss of said tobacco by a force against which he had not insured it, sold it; that then Rea is only responsible for the value of the consideration received by him for the tobacco." That would depend upon the meaning and effect of the evidence and the purpose for which the tobacco was stored; of all which matters the jury were to judge. If the agreement and understanding of the parties was that the tobacco was to be kept by Rea until demanded by Trotter, and was not to be sold by the former, then Rea is responsible for the value of the tobacco when sold, even though it may have been received and sold under the circumstances stated in the instruction. The court therefore erred in giving this instruction; but the error was not to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error.

No. 9 is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence that Trotter deposited his tobacco with Rea, and that Rea, without insuring it against the Federal forces, afterwards, and before the Federal forces came in, sent word to Trotter by Trotter's general agent, that he, Trotter, must take the tobacco away, and that Trotter failed to do so, and that then 599 *Rea sold said tobacco to prevent total loss thereof, then Rea is liable only for the value of the consideration received by him."

This instruction is objectionable, on the ground, if no other, that there is no evidence tending to prove that he, Rea, sent such a message to Trotter as is stated in the instruction, which, therefore, ought not to have been given; but the error was not to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error.

The instructions given by the court on the trial are all set forth in the defendant's bill of exceptions No. 3. Two other bills of exceptions were taken by the defendant in the case, which yet remain to be noticed, viz: Nos 4. and 5. Defendants' bill of exceptions, No. 4, was to the action of the court in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict and award a new trial, upon the grounds, 1st, that the jury had been misled by erroneous instructions; 2d, that improper testimony had been allowed to go before the jury; and 3d, that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence. And defendants' bill of exceptions, No. 5, was to the action of the court in overruling the motion of the defendant made four days after the verdict of the jury had been rendered and recorded, to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, on the ground that a certain paper, which was not in evidence, had been conveyed to the jury room, and read by the jury in their retirement. If the judgment in this case is to be reversed for the errors of the court in giving instructions as aforesaid, it is unnecessary to consider and decide the questions presented by the two last mentioned bills of exceptions, as they will, in that event, become immaterial, a new trial being the necessary result of such reversal. It is contended, however, by the counsel for Trotter & Bro., that even 600 *though there be such error, it is not material, and does not require a reversal of the judgment, if, notwithstanding such error, the defendant is not thereby aggrieved, and justice has been done by the verdict and judgment. Without undertaking to decide whether justice has been done by the verdict and judgment, the court is of opinion that the judgment ought to be reversed for the errors aforesaid, and the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded. The case seems to be governed by that of Wiley &c. v. Givens &c., 6 Gratt. 277, in which it was held by this court, that when an appellate court is of opinion that an instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine that the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence, and therefore to affirm it. But the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the judgment is erroneous for the reasons aforesaid, and ought to be reversed, and the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had therein, in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their attorneys, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the judgment aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the Circuit court did not err in the following rulings:

1st. In overruling the defendants' objection to the competency of John J. Williams, as a witness for the plaintiffs, notwithstanding his relation to them as 601 their *attorney in the cause, and in admitting the said witness, as stated in the defendants' bill of exceptions No. 1.

2ndly. In overruling the defendants' objection to the papers marked "A" and "C," referred to in the defendants' bill of exceptions No. 2, and in admitting said papers in evidence, as stated in that bill of exceptions.

3rdly. In giving to the jury instructions "No. 1.," "No. 2.," and "No. 4.," set out in "defendants' bill of exceptions No. 3."

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err to the prejudice of the defendant, if at all, (who has therefore no ground to complain of any such error) in giving to the jury instructions "No. 7.," "No. 8.," and "No. 9.," set out in the last mentioned bill of exceptions. The last two at least might well have been objected to by the plaintiffs: "No. 8" upon the ground that its propriety depended upon the meaning and effect of the evidence, and the purpose for which the tobacco was stored, of all which matters the jury were to judge; "No. 9" upon the ground (if no other) that there was no evidence before the jury tending to prove that such a message was sent by Rea to Trotter, as is stated in the instruction.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in giving instruction "No. 3.," on the ground that it was calculated to mislead the jury, and that there was nothing in the facts proved on the trial, as certified in the record, tending to prove that Rea warranted the tobacco against any risk that might arise from the occupation of the town of Winchester by the Federal forces; which is one of the facts on the supposed existence of which the instruction was based. There would have been 602 no substantial objection to the *instruction if the words "and against any risk to said tobacco that might arise from the occupation of said town by the Federal forces," contained in the instruction, had been omitted.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in giving instruction "No. 5.," for the same reason for which it erred in giving instruction "No. 3.," as aforesaid; that is for the reason that there was no evidence before the jury tending to prove an agreement by Rea to protect the tobacco from seizure and capture by the Union forces, and the instruction was calculated to mislead the jury.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in giving instruction "No. 6.," which is vague and uncertain, and was calculated to mislead the jury.

The court is further of opinion, that for the errors aforesaid, and without deciding or considering whether the Circuit court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict and award a new trial, on the ground stated in "the defendants' bill of exceptions No. 4.," or in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on the ground stated in "the defendants' bill of exceptions No. 5.," or whether the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instructions aforesaid, is right upon the evidence; the judgment ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded in the case.

Therefore, it is considered by the court, that the said judgment is erroneous, and be reversed and annulled; and that the plaintiff in error recover against the defendants her costs by her expended in the prosecution of her writ of supersedeas aforesaid here; and it is ordered that the verdict of the jury

 603 be set aside, and *the cause remanded to the said Circuit court, for a new trial to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing opinion and judgment: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Frederick county.

Judgment reversed.

*Evans v. Pettyjohn.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Practice—Attempts to Delay.—P, as assignee of L, brought debt upon two notes against E. At the September term 1873 of the court E appeared and filed pleas of payment and nil debit, and three special pleas; on which issues were made up. The case was continued until the next March term of the court; when the defendant tendered another special plea, stating an agreement with L before the assignment, which, if true, constituted a good defence to the action. But the court being satisfied that it was merely intended for delay, rejected it. And the appellate court, concurring with the court below, affirmed the judgment.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of the county of Amherst, brought in August 1873, by Joseph Pettyjohn against William M. Evans. The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court, delivered by Judge Christian. There was a judgment for the plaintiff; and Evans obtained a supersedeas.

Coghill, for the appellant.

Mundy, for the appellee.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This case is before us upon a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of Amherst. It is an action of debt, brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, on two promissory notes in the following form:

605 *First note $1,647.27.

New York, Nov. 1st, 1870.

On or before the 1st day of November 1872 I promise to pay to S. Otis Livingston or order sixteen hundred and forty-seven dollars and twenty-seven cents, for value received, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, having deposited with him as collateral security, with authority to sell the same at the brokers' board, or at public or private sale, at his option, on the non-performance of this promise, and with ten days' notice, seventy (70) shares of the capital stock of the Livingston Manufacturing Company.

Certificate No. 84.

(Signed,)

Wm. M. Evans.

Second note $1,352.73.

New York, Nov. 1st, 1870.

On or before the 1st day of November 1872 I promise to pay to William H. Daly or order thirteen hundred and fifty-two dollars and seventy-three cents for value received, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, having deposited with him as collateral security with authority to sell the same at the brokers' board, or at public or private sale at his option, on the non-performance of this promise, and with ten days' notice, sixty shares of the capital stock of the Livingston Manufacturing Company.

Certificate No. 78.

(Signed,)

Wm. M. Evans.

Both of these notes, by endorsement made thereon, were assigned without recourse, by the payees respectively, to the defendant in error.

On these notes suit was brought to the September term 1873 of the Circuit court of Amherst. At that term the plaintiff in error appeared by his counsel and pleaded payment, nil debet, and by leave of the court filed three special pleas in writing. Upon all these *pleas the plaintiff (defendant in error) replied generally; and the case was continued until the next term.

The first of these special pleas avers that the deposit of the shares of the capital stock of Livingston Manufacturing Company, in the notes mentioned, were made with the payees of said notes, with the understanding and agreement, made at the time of the execution of said notes, that they were to be sold by the payees, and the proceeds applied to the payment of said notes before action brought thereon for the balance thereon, if any balance remained; and that said stock was worth in market, before the bringing of this suit, the full amount of these notes, to wit, the sum of $3,000.

The two other pleas, in different forms, in substance were, that after maturity of the notes, and before commencement of this suit, the payee thereof sold the stock mentioned in said notes for a sum sufficient to pay and satisfy the same.

Issue was taken upon these pleas, as well as upon the pleas of payment and nil debit. The defendant (plaintiff in error) also filed at the September term, with his pleas, an account of offsets, in which he estimates the value of the stock deposited with payee at $50 per share, amounting in the aggregate to $6,500.

At the March term of said Circuit court the defendant (plaintiff in error) offered another special plea in the following words:

And the said defendant, for a further plea in this behalf, saith: That after maturity of said notes, to-wit, on the 15th January 1873, and before the assignment thereof to the plaintiff, by an agreement then made by the parties, the value of the said collaterals (stock) was estimated between them at $23 per share, or 607 that when *exposed to sale, that the same was to be bidden in by or for the said persons, Daly & Livingston, unless the said collaterals sold for an amount equal or greater than the amount of the notes held by the said payees; and if the said collaterals were bidden in by said payees, that the same were to be sold to the said plaintiff or the Livingston and Cherry-tree Manufacturing Company for a sum equal to the amount of said notes. And the said defendant further avers, that the said collaterals were sold before the commencement of this suit, and the said payees failed to carry out their agreement aforesaid in reference to said sale; and that he is entitled to a credit and offset to the full amount of said notes: and this he is ready to verify."

This plea was rejected by the court. The defendant then moved a continuance of the case till the next term. This motion was overruled; and a jury being waived by the parties, the case was heard by the court. A judgment was entered for three thousand dollars, with seven per cent. interest from 1st November 1872 till paid, subject to a credit of $228.64, that being the amount for which the collaterals were sold at the brokers' board in New York.

From this judgment a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

In the petition for a writ of error three grounds of error are assigned:

1. That the court erred in rejecting the defendant's special plea number four, copied above.

2. That the court erred in refusing to grant the defendant a continuance. And

3. That the court erred in giving judgment for the plaintiff on the plea of nil debit and the three special pleas in the case.

The court is of opinion, that the 608 Circuit court did *not err in rejecting said plea. The plea itself, and the time at which it was offered, were well calculated to raise a suspicion in the mind of the court that it was tendered merely for delay, and that in truth no such defence as was therein set up could be sustained. At a former term of the court the defendant had relied upon the defence (in addition to the pleas of payment and nil debit): first, that the shares of stock deposited as collateral were worth $3,000 in the market; and, second, that the plaintiff had actually sold said collaterals for the sum of $3,000.

The plea avers that on the 15th of January 1873, by an agreement between the parties made on that day, the value of said collaterals was estimated at $23 per share; and that they should be bidden in by Daly & Livingston at that price, unless they sold for an amount equal or greater than the amount of the notes held by the payees.

Now it is impossible to conceive, that if on the 15th January 1873, there had, in fact, been any such contract as that set out in the plea No. 4, it would not have been pleaded at the September term 1873. It is most natural to suppose, that a defence so vital to the interests of the defendant, that a contract so important, should have been at once relied upon as soon as the controversy came. Why was this plea setting up so important a contract not filed at the first term of the court when the case was called, and when five pleas were put in by the defendant? If such a contract as the plea sets forth was really made on the 15th January 1873, how is it to be explained that on the 21st September 1873 no such defence was offered or pretended could be made? Could the defendant, when called upon to answer the action, have forgotten this most important and vital defence?

609 Is it possible that a contract *of such importance could have been ignored or forgotten then. If it had any existence, it would have been the very first defence offered to the action. The fact that the plea was not offered at the September term, when so many defences were put in, was well calculated to impress the Circuit court with the suspicion that the plea was offered merely for delay. The plea upon its face made it liable to such suspicion; for it avers, that if the stock was not bid in at $23, it was then to be sold to the plaintiff, or to the Livingston and Cherry-tree Manufacturing Company, for a sum equal to the amount of said notes; thus bringing into the alleged agreement, as set out in the plea, outside parties who had nothing to do with the original contract, which by its terms declared that if the notes were not paid at maturity the collaterals should be sold at the brokers' board, at New York. The court was well warranted, under the circumstances, in rejecting this plea, inasmuch as the plea itself, and the time of offering it, was well calculated to raise the suspicion that it was not offered as a valid defence, but merely for delay.

The subsequent developments in the trial fully confirm this view, and show that no injustice was done by rejecting this plea for it is conclusively shown from defendant's own letter, that no such defence as that set up in plea No 4. could have been sustained. The pretence is, that the agreement set out in the rejected plea was made on the 15th January 1873; and yet in a letter to the plaintiff, who, as asserted in the plea, was a party to the agreement, dated February 17th, 1873, he makes no allusion to any such agreement; but on the contrary, says: "I did not succeed in making any arrangements with old Daly to save the stock, but agreed with them that I would release

610 all my interest, *if the Livingston Company or yourself wanted the stock, for the amount due them. I have not yet heard what had been done. * * * Western and other losses to large amounts make it impossible to save the stock." This letter is utterly inconsistent with his plea. According to his plea, there was an arrangement on the 15th January 1873, that the stock should be estimated at twenty-three dollars—a sum sufficient to pay his notes. If this was true, why should he say in his letter of the 17th February, that he did not succeed in making any arrangement to save the stock; and that he had not yet heard what was done. Why say that Western and other losses to large amounts made it impossible for him to save the stock, if it was true, as alleged in his plea, that by special agreement, stock sold on the New York market at two dollars per share was to be taken at twenty-three dollars per share? Especially if as alleged in his plea, the stock was to be taken by Pettyjohn at twenty-three dollars if no higher bid was made, according to the agreement of 15th January 1873? Why is no allusion made to this agreement in his letter to Pettyjohn on the 17th February 1873. The whole record shows that the Circuit court was right in rejecting the plea. The Circuit court was well warranted in looking with suspicion upon the plea as one offered merely for delay, and the evidence introduced under the other pleas fully justifies that conclusion.

Upon the second ground of error, that the court erred in refusing a continuance, the court is of opinion, that upon the facts stated in the bill of exceptions, the defendant was guilty of such laches and want of diligence as not to entitle him to a further continuance of the case.

Upon the third error assigned, that 611 the court ought *to have entered a judgment for defendant upon the plea of nil debit, this court is of opinion, that there was no error in the judgment of the Circuit court. The contract of the parties in writing was that if the notes were not paid at maturity, the collaterals (the stock) deposited should be sold at the brokers' board at New York, after ten days' notice. They were so sold, and the Circuit court in its judgment gives credit for the net proceeds of that sale. There is nothing in the record to show that they did not bring their full market value; nor is there anything in the record to show that at the time the contract was entered into there was any further or different agreement than that expressed by the written contract, or that the terms of that contract were afterwards varied by subsequent agreement.

The court is of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the said Circuit court, and that the same must be affirmed.

September Term. 1875. Staunton.

1. Novations—Bond Given for Debt on Account—At Law—in Equity.*—M and D, as his surety, execute a bond to G, upon a settlement of an account for articles furnished by G to M. Though at law the account is merged in the bond, in equity the debt on the account will be held as still subsisting if necessary to do justice between the parties.

2. Same—Same—No Merger—Principal and Surety.+—After the articles were furnished by G to M, but before the execution of the bond, M conveys all his property in trust for M's wife and children, subject to his then existing debts. his judgment there is a suit in equity by R's administrator, against M and others and G, to ascertain the indebtedness of M at the date of the deed, and adjust the accounts between the trust estate and G, who is largely indebted to said estate for rents. A bill by D, stating the facts as to the debt of M to G, the execution of the bond and deed of trust, the judgment and execution, the suit and G's indebtedness for rents, and asking for an injunction to a sale under the execution, makes a case for relief, and therefore cannot be dismissed upon demurrer.

In August 1872 David Meade applied to the judge of the Circuit court of Clarke county for an injunction to restrain the levy of an execution upon his property, which had issued upon a judgment recovered in that court by John R. Grigsby's administrators against N. B. Meade and the plaintiff. The bill states the recovery of the judgment for one thousand dollars, with 613 interest from January 2d, 1861, and costs; and *that an execution thereon had been sued out and levied on the property of the plaintiff. That said judgment was based upon a single bill which was executed by N. B. Meade and the plaintiff as his surety, upon an adjustment made in 1860 of said Grigsby's account for articles obtained at his store. Said single bill, according to plaintiff's recollection and belief, was made payable twelve months after date, and so was dated January 2, 1860. That prior to that time N. B. Meade had executed to the plaintiff a deed for all his real and personal estate, in trust for the benefit of his wife and children, subject, however, to all his then existing debts and liabilities; that this deed bears date February 5th, 1859, and was soon after duly recorded.

The plaintiff further charged, that the store account, in settlement of which this single bill was given, had been contracted to a very large extent, certainly, he believes, to an amount exceeding said single bill, before the said 5th of February 1859; and thus was an indebtedness of N. B. Meade existing at the date of said deed, and was therefore binding on said property, which should be held liable therefor in relief of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff further states, that there is pending in the same court a suit in equity, of Rebecca S. Meade's administrator &c. v. N. B. Meade and others, among whom are the personal representatives of J. R. Grigsby deceased; that in this suit orders have been made to ascertain the indebtedness of N. B. Meade at the date of the deed aforesaid, and also to adjust the accounts between said trust estate in favor of Mrs. Meade and her children and the estate of John R. Grigsby; and plaintiff is informed and believes that this latter estate is indebted in a large amount for rents 614 &c. to the said *trust estate, in fact to an amount exceeding the amount of said judgment. He insists that these accounts should be adjusted, and that only the balance remaining after such adjustment is the amount due to the one or the other of the parties. That the debt, so far as it was the debt of N. B. Meade at the time of the execution of the deed of trust, is a charge upon said trust property, and the same should be settled in the suit aforesaid. And making the administrators of Grigsby and the sheriff who had levied the execution defendants, he prayed for an injunction, and for general relief.

The injunction was granted; and Grigsby's administrators appeared and demurred generally to the bill, and also answered.

On the 11th of November 1872 the cause came on to be heard upon the bill and the demurrer thereto; when the court sustained the demurrer and dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill with costs. And thereupon David Meade obtained an appeal to this court.

Parker and Dandridge & Pendleton, for the appellant.

Conrad & Son, for the appellees.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

A demurrer admits the allegations in the bill to be true, and raises the question, whether those allegations afford a sufficient ground for equity to interfere. Ordinarily, it is considered premature upon a general demurrer wholly to dismiss the bill, unless the complainant's case is from his own showing radically such, that no discovery or proof properly called for by, or founded upon the allegations in the bill, can possibly make it a proper subject of equitable jurisdiction. *Pryor v. Adams, 1 Call 615 382; Le Roy v. Veeder & als., 1 John. Cas. 427; 2 Rob. Pr. 302.

Let us apply these rules of pleading to the case before us. The bill alleges that the defendant, Grigsby, had recovered a judgment, and sued out execution upon a bond for one thousand dollars, given by N. B. Meade, with the complainant, David Meade, as his surety; that this obligation had been given by N. B. Meade upon an adjustment made in the year 1860, of Grigsby's account for articles purchased in his store.

The bill further alleges, that previous to the execution of this bond, N. B. Meade had given a deed of trust to the complainant as trustee, upon all his estate, real and personal, for the benefit of his wife and children, subject, however, to all his then existing debts and liabilities; that the account for which the bond was given having been contracted prior to the date of the deed of trust, was secured by it, and the property therein conveyed should be held liable to the relief of the surety.

Upon these averments the defendant raises by his demurrer the point that the store account was extinguished by the bond, and the debt thereby fully discharged, and consequently the bond constitutes a new debt, and as such is not embraced by the trust deed.

The principle here asserted may be correct as applied to the common law courts. In those courts the acceptance of a higher security for the debt is regarded as an extinguishment of a lower security for that debt. A bond extinguishes the simple contract, the latter being merged in the former. The debtor cannot be liable on both instruments. And as there is no remedy on the inferior security, it is regarded at law as no longer subsisting. But with courts of equity a different rule prevails. Those 616 courts, not regarding the *form so much as the substance, treat the debt as still subsisting, unless the parties clearly intended a satisfaction. It must be made to appear that the creditor intended by accepting the higher security to abandon all recourse upon his original demand. Niday v. Harvey & Co., 9 Gratt. 454, 466.

This rule of the equity courts was applied in the case just cited to an obligation executed by one member of a firm, the others not joining in the instrument; but the principle is equally applicable to the present, and, indeed, to every case involving the question of the effect of a higher security upon a previously subsisting indebtedness.

Another doctrine of the equity courts is the doctrine of subrogation. The surety is entitled to enforce every remedy and every security the creditor has against the principal debtor, to stand in the place of the creditor, and to have all the securities of the latter transferred to him. These securities cannot be released or in any manner impaired by the creditor to the prejudice of the surety. The rights of the latter do not rest upon contract, but upon the principles of natural justice. So far is this doctrine carried, that if the surety pays the bond and thereby utterly extinguishes the debt, a court of equity will nevertheless keep it alive for his benefit, in order to substitute the surety to all the rights and remedies of the creditor.

The rule of marshalling assets depends upon the same principles. If a bond binding the heirs is paid out of the personalty, the debt is gone; but the equity courts permit a simple contract creditor to stand in the shoes of the bond creditor, and charge the debt by simple contract upon the realty. Numerous other illustrations of the same doctrine may be found in the books.

617 *In the present case, there is not the shadow of a doubt but that the store account was one of the debts secured by the deed of trust. The bill contains no averment from which it can be fairly inferred that Grigsby, the creditor, if he knew of the deed at all, intended to release the security it afforded him when he accepted the bond. Nor is there any averment which leads to the conclusion that N. B. Meade, the principal debtor, and the complainant as his surety, intended, or even desired, to take the debt out of the operation of the deed of trust. The complainant was the trustee; was no doubt well aware of all the provisions of the deed; knew that the store account was one of the debts therein provided for; and it is fair to presume was mainly influenced by that fact in becoming surety for the debt. It is very probable that his only hope of indemnity is in the deed. But the creditor here seems not only willing to throw the entire burden of paying the bond upon the surety, but to deprive him also of his only resource for repayment. A court of equity, before adopting any such conclusion, will require very clear proof that the intention of the parties, in the execution of the bond, was to abandon the security of the deed. Nothing in the bill warrants any such idea.

It is very clear, therefore, that upon this branch of the case the demurrer was not well taken.

A point of greater difficulty is yet to be considered. As already stated, the creditor has recovered judgment on the bond against principal and surety, sued out execution, and has it levied on the property of the latter. Can the surety compel the creditor to abandon his execution and rely upon a fund provided by the principal debtor. The general rule is, that the creditor is under no obligation to look to the principal 618 *debtor or to his property; he is not bound to exhaust his remedies against the latter before resorting to the surety. But the rule is not universal. It is not necessary now to attempt to define the exceptions to it. Hays v. Ward, 4 John. Ch. R. 127.

The only matter we have to consider is, whether the facts relied on by the complainant are sufficient to take his case out of the operation of the rule as stated.

It appears that there is now, or was when the bill in this case was filed in the Circuit court of Clarke county, a suit pending in the same court, in which the administrator of Mrs. Rebecca Meade is plaintiff, and N. B. Meade, the principal debtor, and the personal representative of Grigsby the creditor, and others, are defendants. In this suit orders and decrees have been made with a view to ascertain the indebtedness of N. B. Meade at the time of the execution of the trust deed already mentioned, and also to adjust the accounts between the trust estate, in favor of Mrs. N. B. Meade and her children, and the estate of the defendant Grigsby. It appears also, that the estate of the latter is indebted to the trust estate for rents to an amount exceeding the judgment against the surety.

These are substantially the allegations of the bill, and upon a demurrer they are to be taken as true. Upon this state of facts the complainant insists that as the debt due to Grigsby's estate constitutes a charge upon the trust estate, and as Grigsby is himself indebted to that estate for rent in a sum equal to the debt due him, the matter ought to be adjusted by way of mutual set-off and compensation. This proposition seems to be eminently just and satisfactory.

If Grigsby himself was attempting to collect his debt out of the trust property, he would be told that he, being a debtor to that property, could have no just 619 *claim upon it until he had accounted for all he had received. The equities are not changed by the fact that complainant first pays Grigsby's estate, and then proceeds against the trust property for his indemnity. The creditor is doing indirectly, through the agency of the surety, what he would not be permitted to do directly. The surety is forced to pay when he ought not, and the trust property subjected to forced sales in order to satisfy a debt already discharged by the use of that property. This is not only unjust to the complainant, but oppressive to Mrs. Meade and her children, whose reliance for support is upon the trust estate. Substantial justice is attained and litigation ended by requiring Grigsby's estate to apply the rents and profits received by him to the satisfaction of the debt due that estate.

Whether the case made by the bill will be sustained by the evidence, we have no means of determining. We express no opinion upon the merits. All that we mean to affirm is that the defendant ought to be put to his answer. He does not waive a single advantage in being required to answer that he would have upon the demurrer. The injustice done the complainant is, that by the decree he is without a hearing denied every inquiry into the equities which may attach to the parties. The court has in effect decided, that the case made by the bill is radically so defective that no discovery of proofs properly founded thereon can possibly make it a subject of equitable jurisdiction. The decision is in this respect premature. For that reason the decree must be reversed and the demurrer overruled, the case remanded to the court below, with liberty to the defendant to plead or answer as he may be advised.

620 *The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the complainant's bill is sufficient in law, and the demurrer thereto ought to have been overruled. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that, for the error aforesaid, the decree of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled; and that the said Bettie M. Grigsby, administratrix, and David H. McGuire, administrator of J. R. Grigsby deceased, out of the assets of their intestate in their hands to be administered, do pay unto the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here.

And this court proceeding to pronounce such decree as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is further decreed and ordered, that the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's bill be overruled; and leave is given the defendants to plead or answer the bill of the plaintiff, as they may be advised. And this cause is remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with this order: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit Court of Clarke county.

Decree reversed.

621 *Ammon's Adm'or v. Wolfe & al.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Guardian and Ward—Investments in Guardian's Name.

—Land of infants is sold in 1859, upon credits extending to January 8th, 1862. Their guardian collected a part of the money in May 1862, and he invested it in March 1863, $3,500 in seven per cent. Confederate bonds, which were found after his death enclosed in a paper endorsed Wolfe's heirs; but the bonds were taken in his own name. HELD:

1. Same—Same.—There is no sufficient evidence that the investment when made was intended for his wards.

2. Same—Same—In Confederate Money.*—The debt due to the wards being a good ante-war debt, well secured, he was not authorized to collect in Confederate money, and he could not be authorized under the statute so to invest it.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, brought in February 1870, by Alfred L. Wolfe and Sallie C. Wolfe, infants, by their next friend, against the administrator of Y. C. Ammon deceased. Ammon had been the guardian of the plaintiffs, and the bill was for an account, and payment of what might be found due.

It appeared that Alfred L. Wolfe, the father of the plaintiffs, died in March 1858, leaving a widow and eight children, all of whom but one were minors, and the plaintiffs were the youngest of them. He left some personal property and a tract of land, which was sold under a decree of court, in February 1859, for $12,011.00, upon credits extending to January 8th, 1862. Y. C.

Ammon was one of the administrators
622 *of Wolfe, and also one of the commissioners to sell the land, and he was appointed guardian of the plaintiffs.

A commissioner of the court was directed to take the accounts; and it appeared that the guardian had received the property of the wards. All but the last payments to him for the land seem to be in good money. The last was received in Confederate money on the 28th of April 1862; and this the commissioner scaled as of that date. The only question on the accounts was, whether Ammon should be credited for $3,500 of Confederate bonds. And this question depended upon—first, whether he had ever made the investment for his wards; and second, whether if it was made, it was a proper case for such an investment. The evidence, as well as the answer of the defendant, are stated in the opinion of the court.

The cause came on to be heard on the 26th of September 1873; when the court made a decree in favor of the plaintiff A. L. Wolfe for $2,123.41, with compound interest thereon from the 19th of July till paid, or until said A. L. Wolfe attained the age of twenty-one years, and in favor of Sarah C. Wolfe for $2,220.95, with like interest.

This decree was rendered at the previous May term of the court, and by inadvertence was not entered of record; and it was ordered to be spread upon the records at the next term, to have the same effect in all respects as if entered at the last term.

Upon the petition of Ammon's administrator, an appeal was allowed to him. And after the case was brought to this court, another decree of the May term of the court, which modified the one previously pronounced, though not entered, by stopping the compound interest at the date of the death of Ammon, was produced.

623 *C. A. Yancy and Compton, for the appellant.

John Paul and Robert Johnston, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree in favor of infants, suing by their next friend, against the personal representative of their guardian, to recover a balance claimed to be due them on the guardianship account. The defence relied on is, that the money due by the guardian to the wards was by him duly invested in Confederate bonds in pursuance of the act of the General Assembly of Virginia passed on the 5th day of March 1863; Acts of Assembly, 1862 and 1863, page 81. It is contended that the defence is unsustainable, on two grounds: 1st, that it does not sufficiently appear that any investment was in fact made by the guardian of the money due by him to the wards, or any part thereof in Confederate bonds; and if any such investment was in fact made; 2dly, that it was not made in pursuance of the terms and provisions of the said act, which does not therefore absolve the guardian and his estate from liability for the said money.

1st. Was any investment made by the guardian of the ward's money in Confederate bonds?

The representative of the guardian in his answer states, he is "informed, and believes, that about the year 1863 the said Y. C. Ammon (the guardian), in pursuance of an act of the general assembly passed March 5th, 1863, entitled an act authorizing fiduciaries to invest funds in their hands in certain cases, and for other purposes, did invest $3,500 of the amount in his hands in seven five hundred dollar seven per cent. Confederate bonds, which said bonds were preserved by said Ammon as the property 624 of his said wards up to *the time of his death (in 1866 or '7), and were found by this respondent after his administration, among the papers of said Ammon, with the indorsement that now appears on each:—"Wolfe's heirs $500," made in the handwriting of said Ammon. "(The wards being two of said heirs.) These bonds are herewith filed, marked exhibit 'XX,' and asked to be taken and read as part of this answer. This respondent has always been willing to, and has tendered to the complainants through their attorney the said bonds in discharge of that much of the amount due them; but such tender has been rejected. This respondent claims that his intestate is entitled to credit for the amount of said bonds."

These bonds bear date on the 13th of February 1863, and appear to have been obtained by Y. C. Ammon on the 2d of March 1863, before the date of the act of assembly aforesaid. They are payable to him individually, and not as guardian of the complainants. They are the same in form with a large amount of other Confederate bonds issued during the war, and found also by the said administrator among the papers of his intestate, and claimed to be the property of the said intestate. The endorsement, "Wolfe's heirs $500," made by said Ammon on each of the seven bonds of that amount as aforesaid, may have been made, so far as appears from the record, long after the bonds were issued, and even long after the war, as the guardian did not die until 1866 or '7; and it is of course not evidence that the ward's money was invested in the said bonds. The guardian was first deputy sheriff, and then sheriff of Rockingham county, from January 1857 to January 1865; and he was probably, during that period, largely engaged in speculations, which his office afforded him an opportunity of making. The guardian's adminis-625 trator in *his deposition, states his belief that the sheriffs of said county and their deputies had been in the habit of shaving executions placed in their hands for collection, and that the office was regarded desirable by some persons on that account.

 The guardian seems to have amassed a large amount of Confederate money, as he invested a large amount of it in Confederate bonds on his own account.

If the seven bonds of $500 each, endorsed as aforesaid, had been obtained for money invested for the wards, the presumption is, they would have been payable to the guardian as such, so as to show on their face that they were given for the ward's money.
 This would have been proper, whether the investment was made in pursuance of the act of the 5th of March 1863 aforesaid, or under a decree of a court of chancery in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, or by the guardian making the investment on his own responsibility, without any decree or order of court for the purpose. There was an express provision in the said act that
 "the bonds, when practicable, shall be taken in the name of such fiduciary or trustee in his fiduciary character. By taking them in the guardian's own individual name it would have been in his power to claim them as his own individual property if Confederate bonds had appreciated, instead of becoming, as they did, of no value.

There is evidence in the cause tending to show that the guardian applied to the Circuit court of the said county for authority to invest the money belonging to his wards, and that such authority was accordingly given. But such evidence is insufficient to prove even that such authority was given or applied for, much less to prove that such an investment, even if authorized, was ever actually made. It appears from the 626 evidence *that a portion of the records of said court was destroyed by the Federal troops in June 1864; and if any order for the investment had been made by the said court or the judges thereof, it may possibly have been destroyed in that way.

 But it is probable if such an order had been made, that its importance to the guardian would have induced him to obtain a copy of the order and keep it with the bonds, especially as they were payable to himself individualy, or, at least, did not show on their face that they were for the money of the wards.

The court is therefore of opinion, that it does not sufficiently appear that any investment was in fact made by the guardian of the money due by him to the wards, or any part thereof, in Confederate bonds. But if any such investment was in fact made, then,

2ndly, was it made in pursuance of the terms and provisions of the said act of assembly of the 5th of March 1863? and does that act therefore absolve the guardian and his estate from liability for the said money?

In Campbell's ex'ors v. Campbell's ex'or,
 22 Gratt. 649, 684, and in Crickard's ex'or
 v. Crickard's legatees, 25 Gratt. 410, 421, it was held by this court, that "to authorize investments under the act of March 5th, 1863, three conditions must concur: 1st, the money must be in the hands of the fiduciary; 2nd, it must have been received in the due exercise of his trust; 3rd, for some cause, he must be unable to pay it over to the parties entitled. If they do not all exist, the order of the court or judge purporting to authorize such investment is null, and the fiduciary is responsible for the money." If any of these conditions existed in this case, which is not admitted, we think the first and second certainly did not. The 627 money was not in the *hands of the guardian when Confederate bonds were taken by him; and if it was, it had not been received in the due exercise of his trust. The estates of the wards consisted of their distributive portions of their father's estate, real and personal, who died several years before the war. That estate had been converted into money before the war, and the distributive portions of the wards were due to them in money, and constituted ante war debts which were perfectly secure. The guardian before the war received a large part of the money thus due to his wards, and thereby became himself debtor to them in the amounts so received. That debt, as well as the debts for the residue of the ward's estate remaining unpaid at the commencement of the war, were good, ante war, specie debts, which the guardian had no right to collect in depreciated Confederate currency, and no right to convert into Confederate bonds in March 1863, when Confederate money was greatly depreciated in value, and was still depreciating. There was no necessity for collecting these debts, their collection not being required for the support of the wards, not as much as the accruing interest on said debts having been applied to that purpose, and the money, as before stated, being perfectly secure. A large portion of the money was actually due by the guardian before the war, and all of it might have been well and safely invested by him for his wards. Instead of that, it does not appear that he said anything about making an investment for them until March 1863, when it is contended, but not proved, that he made the aforesaid investment for them in Confederate bonds. It would have been a breach of trust and a waste of his ward's estate for him to have done so. As to the Confederate bonds amounting to seven hundred dollars which appear to have been received by *the guardian of Thos.

K. Miller on the 28th of April 1862, in part payment of the purchase money of land sold to Miller before the war, the guardian ought not to have received such payment in that medium. But it does not appear that he held or claimed to hold those bonds as an investment for the benefit of his wards, and he no doubt converted and applied them to his own use, as he only claimed to have made an investment in Confederate bonds on account of his wards in March 1863.

The court is therefore of opinion, that even if such an investment was in fact made as claimed by the guardian on account of the wards, it was not made in pursuance of the terms and provisions of the said act of assembly of the 5th of March 1863, and the said act does not absolve the guardian or his estate from liability for the money so claimed to have been invested.

Whether the Circuit court erred or not in scaling the sum of $277.14 received by the guardian for each of the wards on the 28th of April 1862, being received in payment of an ante war debt, is a question which this court need not, and therefore does not, decide. The appellees complain of no such error, and the appellant cannot, as it is certainly not one to his prejudice.

The decree appealed from, though rendered at the spring term 1873 of the said Circuit court, was, by inadvertence, not then entered of record, and was afterwards, to wit: on the 26th day of September 1873 ordered to be spread upon the record at that term, to have the same effect, in all respects, as if entered at the said spring term 1873; and it was accordingly so entered of record, though it professes on its face to be a decree of the 26th day of September 1873.

629 After *the said decree was so rendered, though not entered at the spring term 1873 as aforesaid, the cause came on again to be heard during the same time, to wit: on the 7th day of May 1873, when it was decreed "that the decree entered in this cause during the present term" being the decree rendered, but by inadvertence not entered of record at the spring term 1873 as aforesaid, "ascertaining the liability of the estate of Y. C. Ammon, deceased, to the plaintiffs, be, and the same is hereby, so far modified as not to charge said estate with compound interest on the amounts due the plaintiffs from and after the death of the said Y. C. Ammon, and the cause is recommitted to a master commissioner to report the amount due the plaintiffs after making the deductions aforesaid." Afterwards, to wit: on the 26th day of September 1837, when the said decree rendered, but by inadvertence not entered of record at the spring term of that year, was ordered to be spread upon the records as aforesaid, no notice was taken of the said decree of the 7th day of May 1873, modifying the decree previously rendered during the same time as aforesaid. And in the copy of the record which was brought up on the petition for an appeal and supersedeas in this case, the said decree of the 7th day of May 1873 was accidentally omitted. But a copy of that decree has been since supplied, and by an endorsement thereon signed by the counsel in this case, it has been agreed that the same shall be read in its proper place as a part of the record of the case, which has accordingly been done.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the decree appealed from should be so amended as to be modified according to the said decree of the 7th day of May 1873; that 630 there is no error in the said decree so *amended, at least to the prejudice of the appellant, and that the same ought to be affirmed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the decree appealed from in this case, being the said decree of the 26th day of September 1873, ought to be so amended as to be modified according to the decree made in this cause on the 7th day of May 1873, of which latter decree an official copy, by consent of the parties by counsel, has been made a part of the record in this cause, and accordingly so considered by this court, that there is no error in the said decree appealed from, amended as aforesaid, at least to the prejudice of the appellant, and the same ought to be affirmed.

Therefore it is decreed and ordered that the said decree appealed from be amended as aforesaid, and as so amended be affirmed, and that the appellant, out of the estate of his said intestate, Y. C. Ammon, pay to the appellees thirty dollars damages and their costs by them about their defence in this behalf expended. And it is further decreed and ordered that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing opinion and decree, which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree amended and affirmed.

631 *Tardy, Trustee, v. Boyd's Adm'or & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

I. Promissory Notes—Steps, Necessary to Bind Endorsers, Prevented by Public Enemy.*—A note discounted at the bank in B, was to fall due on the 18th of June 1864. On the 10th, from apprehension that the Union forces would come into B, the valuables of the bank, including this note, was sent away about two miles. The Union forces did enter B on the 12th, and left on the 14th of June. The note was not brought back to the bank until after the 18th, and was not presented and protested for non-payment, nor was notice of non-payment given to the endorsers. HOLD:

1. Same—Same—No Excuse.—The facts do not excuse the failure to have the note presented and protested, and to give notice to the endorsers.

2. Same—Same—Same.—But if the bank was not guilty of laches in not having the note presented and protested for non-payment, and notice of dishonor on the day it fell due, to bind the endorser, all this should have been done within a reasonable time after the hindering cause was removed.

II. Same—Same—New Promise to Pay.—A promise to pay, by an endorser of a note, with full knowledge of all the facts, and of the laches of the holder in not protesting the note, may be held in point of law to amount to a waiver of the right to notice. But such a promise to be obligatory, must be deliberately made, in clear explicit language, and must amount to an admission of the right of the holder, or of a duty and willingness of the endorser to pay. If, therefore, the conduct or acts of the endorser be equivocal, or the language used be of a qualified or uncertain nature, the endorser will not be held responsible.

III. Same—Same—Same—Non-Acceptance.—B was the endorser of a note made by his brother A, which fell due in June 1864, but there was no protest for or notice of non-payment. B afterwards, with the knowledge of these facts, proposed to the holder, to pay the note in Confederate money; which was refused by the holder; the note being for good money. The proposition of B having been refused, it does not constitute a promise to pay, or a recognition of his liability, which will bind him to pay the debt.

*Promissory Notes—Steps, Necessary to Bind Endorsers, Prevented by Public Enemy.—See on this subject, McVeigh v. Bank, 26 Gratt. 851, and note; Bank of Old Dom. v. McVeigh, 29 Gratt. 546, and note.

632 *IV. Scaling Debts.—A note made in January 1863 is the last renewal of notes given for a debt due before 1861. It is not to be scaled.

V. Same—Renewal of Notes.*—The act of March 3, 1866, for scaling debts, does not apply to a case where the money loaned was a sound currency, and the note sued upon was a renewal of notes accepted as an accommodation to the debtor, and only as evidence of a pre-existing debt due in good money.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Botetourt county, brought in June 1866, by John W. Johnston, administrator of Wm. W. Boyd, deceased, for the purpose of having the direction of the court in the administration of the estate. Boyd died in April 1866, leaving a large estate in lands, and largely indebted both on his own account and as surety. In the progress of the cause his creditors were called in, and reports of debts and their priorities were directed and made. Among the creditors who presented their claims was S. C. Tardy, surviving trustee of the Bank of Virginia; and among the claims presented by him were two: one a note for $2,695, made by A. L. Boyd and O. W. Kean, and endorsed by Wm. W. Boyd. This note bears date the 26th day of January 1863, and was payable at sixty days from its date. It was, however, a renewal of former notes commencing some time before 1861. The note was not protested, but a waiver of protest was endorsed upon it by Wm. W. Boyd on the day it fell due. The other was a note for $5,000, made by A. L. Boyd, and endorsed by Wm. W. Boyd. This note bears date April 16th, 1864, and was payable at sixty days from its date. It also was a renewal of former notes commencing before 1861; and William W. Boyd had been the sole endorser on the former notes. This note was not protested, and there was no written waiver of protest upon it, and there was no proof of a regular notice of non-payment. To *prove an excuse for not protesting the note, and a waiver of notice, and a promise by William W. Boyd to pay the note, a number of witnesses were examined.

A. L. Boyd, the maker of the note, was the brother of William W. Boyd, a prominent lawyer, and the note for $5,000 was given originally for several smaller debts which had been discounted for A. L. Boyd at the Branch Bank of Virginia at Buchanan, of which the said William W. Boyd was a director. This note had been continued by successive renewals down to the date of *Renewal of Notes—Discharge.—In the case of Bank v. Good, 21 W. Va. 465, the court, citing the principal case, said: "It is well settled both in Virginia and West Virginia that a note will not be regarded as an absolute extinguishment or payment of a precedent note or pre-existing debt, unless it be so expressly agreed." See also, Farmers' Bank v. Mutual Asso. So., 4 Leigh 88; Lewis v. Davisson, 29 Gratt. 225; Moses v. Trice, 21 Gratt. 556; Lazier v. Nevin, 3 W. Va. 627; Miller v. Miller, 8 W. Va. 550; Poole & Co. v. Rice, 9 W. Va. 73; Dunlap v. Shanklin, 10 W. Va. 662; Sayre v. King, 17 W. Va. 562.

that above mentioned. A. L. Boyd died in 1864, but whether before or after the note became due does not appear; and his estate proved to be insolvent.

A few days before the 12th of June 1864, it being apprehended that the Federal troops would come to Buchanan, by an order of the directors of the bank, its valuables, including this note, were removed for safety to the house of a gentleman about two miles from the town, where they remained until some days after the note fell due. In the meantime General Hunter entered Buchanan on the 12th of June, and remained there until the 14th, when he moved on to Lynchburg. He did not return through the town on his retreat. The cashier of the bank at Buchanan, in his testimony, states that he had a conversation with William W. Boyd relative to the non-protest of the note. That witness told him the note had not been protested, and that he was not bound for the debt. And he replied, whenever he endorsed a note he always intended to bind himself for the debt. That the note was handed to him either by witness or the teller, for a waiver of protest, and witness thought he had done so, and did not 634 know to the contrary until after *his death. At this time Mr. Boyd neither refused nor agreed to make the waiver, but took up the pen and made the remark aforesaid. Another witness, the teller of the bank, says: There was no fixed rule as to protesting or not protesting notes which lay over, on which William W. Boyd was endorser. Notes that the officers of the bank felt sure he would waive protest, we sometimes withdrew, and did not protest them. In regard to A. L. Boyd, witness always felt certain he would do so. When Mr. Boyd had been in the habit of waiving protest we felt certain he would continue to do it. He had been in the habit of renewing his endorsements for his brother on new notes covering the same loans and amounts, after the old note had lain without protest. And we were in the habit of withdrawing notes made by A. L. Boyd and endorsed by William W. Boyd, which were not paid at maturity; though sometimes we protested them, more with the view of making A. L. Boyd attend to his business than anything else. It was proved that sometime after the note fell due Mr. Boyd proposed to the directors of the bank, to pay the note in Confederate money, which they declined to receive in payment of it; and that he afterwards complained of the action of the board.

This cause came on to be heard on the 12th of April 1872, when the court rejected the claim of Tardy, trustee, for the debt of $5,000; and held that William W. Boyd's estate was liable upon the note for $2,695; but that the debt was to be scaled as of the date at which it was payable. And thereupon Tardy applied to a judge of this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

E. Pendleton, for the appellant.

635 *J. W. Johnston, for the appellees.

Christian, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion that the Circuit court did not err in declaring by its decree of the 12th day of April 1872 that W. W. Boyd was not responsible as endorser of the negotiable note made by Andrew L. Boyd for $5,000, payable at the bank of Virginia at Buchanan.

It is admitted that the note was not presented for payment and protested for non-payment on the day of its maturity. Excuse for this is offered by the holder that it could not have been done on the day of maturity because of the presence of the public enemy, which made the removal of the valuable effects of the bank, and among them this note, necessary, and that on the day of maturity the said note had not been returned from the place of safety where it had been secreted with other effects of the bank.

The note under consideration matured on the 18th June 1864. The Federal army under General Hunter, in its march on Lynchburg, reached Buchanan on the 12th June, and left on the 14th. On its retreat from Lynchburg the army did not pass through Buchanan. They were not present in the town, or near it, at any time after the 14th of June. It is not clearly shown that on the day of maturity of the note it was not protested and due notice of dishonor given in consequence of the presence of the public enemy. It was certainly possible on that day, four days after the enemy left the town, to have made presentment and protest, and given notice of the dishonor of the note.

On the day when this note ought to have been presented and protested Hunter's army was at Lynchburg, fifty miles from 636 Buchanan. The cashier was in *Buchanan, and had the books at the bank. The place where the effects of the bank was secreted were but two miles from the town. It was certainly possible, if not an easy matter, to have gotten possession of this note, and had it presented and protested at the day of maturity.

But conceding that under the circumstances then existing, the bank was guilty of no laches, and that it was indeed impossible to have had presentment, protest and notice of dishonor on the day of the maturity of the note, yet in order to bind the endorser, all this should have been done within a reasonable time after the hindering cause was removed.

It is conceded this was never done; but, on the contrary, it is attempted to show a waiver of protest by the endorser, and also a promise after maturity that he would pay the debt. The evidence fails to establish either fact. And the record does not show any notice of non-payment within a reasonable time. The loose conversations testified to by the cashier, if they can be regarded as notice, are not fixed at such time as would be considered reasonable, after the hindering cause was removed; nor indeed is any time fixed by witness when these conversations occurred.

That there was no waiver of protest is clearly shown; and the only evidence of any recognition of a legal liability to pay the note by Boyd was a proposition to pay his brother's note in Confederate money, then so greatly depreciated as to be refused by the bank.

The offer to pay in Confederate money was an act of favor to his brother, for he might well be willing to pay for him a few hundred dollars in order to extinguish his debt to the bank, and not be either willing or able to pay five thousand dollars for that purpose. The bank having refused 637 to accept Confederate money, *it cannot now treat that offer as a promise to pay five thousand dollars, or in any manner at a recognition on the part of the board of his liability as endorser. The Confederate money being rejected, the matter then stood just as if Boyd had never said one word about paying the note.

Although a promise to pay by an endorser, with full knowledge of all the facts, and of the laches of the holder may be held in point of law to amount to waiver of the right to notice, yet this rule must be taken with this qualification; the promise to be obligatory must be deliberately made in clear explicit language, and must amount to an admission of the right of the holder, or of a duty and willingness of the endorser to pay. If therefore the conduct or acts of the endorser be equivocal, or the language used be of a qualified or uncertain nature, the endorsee will not be held responsible. Story's Prom. Notes, § 363.

A conditional promise to pay, or an offer to pay in a certain manner, is not binding as a waiver of the rights acquired by the laches of the holder if the terms be not accepted. Bayley on Bills 300; 2 Rob. Pract. 212, and cases there cited; Newberry v. Trowbridge, 13 Mich. R. 263. In the last named case it was held that an offer to pay a note in depreciated bank bills did not constitute a waiver of demand and notice. It is not an acknowledgment of liability to pay the note, but an offer of compromise, by way rather of set-off or accord and satisfaction than of payment.

It is clear that the offer by Boyd to pay Confederate money, which was rejected, cannot be regarded either as a waiver of his right to notice, or as a promise to pay the debt, or as in any manner showing that he acknowledged his liability as endorser.

We are therefore of opinion that the 638 decree of the *Circuit court, so far as it declares that Boyd's estate was not liable for the $5,000 note, should be affirmed.

But the court is further of opinion, that the decree of said Circuit court is erroneous in scaling the debt of $2,695, as a debt due in Confederate currency. The said Circuit court was right in holding Boyd's estate responsible for this note. Upon this note endorsed by W. W. Boyd, there was an express waiver, endorsed in writing and signed by Boyd on the day of maturity. But the error of the Circuit court is in declaring this note to be payable in Confederate money, and in scaling its nominal to its specie value at the time the note became payable. It is clear from the evidence, that the debt (of which the note is evidence), was contracted prior to the year 1861, and before Confederate currency came into circulation. It was a loan by the bank, to the maker of the note, of gold or its equivalent. As an accommodation loan to the maker, it was renewed from time to time with the same endorser. The note was a renewal note. When the note was renewed the debt was not paid, but the debt remained the same. As was said by Judge Tucker, in Farmers Bank v. Mutual Assurance Society, 4 Leigh 88, "Equity looks to the substance, not the form of things. Equity sees that when a dealer at bank pays off a note by renewal the debt is the same; the debt remains unpaid, the credit only is extended." See also Moses v. Trice, 21 Gratt. 556. Here the debt, contracted before 1861, and in a sound currency, still remains unpaid; the renewal is but an extension of the credit, the debt remains the same.

The scaling act is only applicable, by its terms, to a case where "the contract was according to the true understanding and agreement of the parties, to be fulfilled or performed in Confederate States 639 treasury *notes, or was entered into with reference to said notes as a standard of value." The act certainly does not reach a case like this, where the money loaned was a sound currency, and the note sued upon was a renewal note, accepted as an accommodation of the debtor—and only as evidence of a pre-existing debt in a sound currency. This is certainly not such a debt as the scaling act was intended to apply to, and it would work the greatest injustice to apply it to such a case.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit court scaling the note of $2,695 is erroneous, and must be reversed; but that the decree in all other respects be affirmed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel; and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that there is no error in the decree of said Circuit court in so far as it declares that the estate of W. W. Boyd is not liable for the note of five thousand dollars, endorsed by said W. W. Boyd; it appearing to the court that said W. W. Boyd had no legal notice of the presentment and dishonor of said note, and that he never received notice thereof, nor that he ever after maturity and dishonor promised to pay the same.

But the court is further of opinion, that the decree of said Circuit court was erroneous in scaling the note for $2,695 from its nominal value to its value in gold at the day of its maturity; this court being of opinion, that the said note was a renewal note (renewed from time to time) for a debt due in gold or its equivalent; that it was for money 640 loaned by the bank to the maker *in 1861, before Confederate money came into circulation; and it cannot be said in such a case, that "according to the true understanding and agreement of the parties, the contract was to be performed and fulfilled in Confederate States treasury notes, or was entered into with reference to such currency as a standard of value." It is only such a contract that can be scaled under the "adjustment act." The said Circuit court therefore erred in applying the scale to the note of $2,695, and should have entered a decree for its face value. And for this error it is decreed and ordered, that said decree of said Circuit court be reversed, and that the appellant recover against the appellees his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal here, and that the cause be remanded to said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in accordance with this decree: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Botetourt county.

Decree reversed.

641 *Mauzy v. Sellars & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Mistake in Written Agreement—Reformation—Parol Evidence.*—A court of equity will correct a mistake, clearly proved by parol evidence, in an agreement for the sale and purchase of real estate; and this, whether the contest is between the vendor and purchaser, or the vendor and creditors of the purchaser.

This was a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, instituted in September 1872, by T. N. Sellars and three others, sureties of Joseph N. Mauzy, to subject his real estate to satisfy a judgment which had been recovered against him and the plaintiffs. They set out in their bill that Joseph N. Mauzy owned one undivided half of a tract of land called the "Nicholas farm," one-fourth of which tract he inherited, and another fourth he purchased from Thomas G. Mauzy; and that the said Joseph owned a half interest in what is known as the "Montevideo storehouse," one-fourth of which he inherited, and another fourth he purchased from the said Thomas G. Mauzy; and he also owned another tract. And they say he has no personal property. They therefore pray that the interest of said Joseph N. Mauzy in the "Nicholas farm" and the "Montevideo store-house," and the tract he owned, may be subjected to the payment of the judgment which had been rendered against him and them. They make Joseph N. Mauzy, Thomas G. Mauzy, and the other owners of the "Nicholas farm," and the "Montevideo store-house," *with others, defendants, pray for a sale of the property, &c.

Thomas G. Mauzy answered the bill. He admitted his sale of his one-fourth of the "Nicholas farm," and of some mountain lands to Joseph N. Mauzy; but he denied most positively, that he had sold his fourth of the "Montevideo store-house;" and averred that if the written agreement between them can be construed as embracing it, it was a mistake made by the scrivener, R. M. Mooney; that it was well understood by the said Joseph N. Mauzy and himself, and by the said Mooney, at the time the agreement was written, that the plaintiff only sold, and said Joseph N. only bought, plaintiff's interest in the "Nicholas farm" and in several tracts of mountain land held by the same parties; and if the language of the agreement can be construed as including plaintiff's interest in the "Montevideo store-house," it was a mistake on the part of all of them.

The agreement between Thomas G. Mauzy and Joseph N. Mauzy bears date the 21st of August 1868, and is certainly very inartificially drawn. The description of the property sold seems to be the interest of Thomas G. Mauzy in the land "known as the 'Jno. Nicholas farm,' together with all his undivided interest in all the lands now owned by the said parties." Thomas G. Mauzy bound himself to give a good and sufficient deed as soon as Joseph N. complied with his part of the contract; but no deed had been made by him: and it appears that a part of the purchase money was still due.

Robert M. Mooney, the draftsman of the agreement between Thomas G. and Joseph N. Mauzy, made a written statement, which it was agreed by the plaintiffs that he would swear to if an opportunity was 643 *afforded, and they consented it might be read as a deposition. He says that he wrote the agreement. That he heard and fully understood the contract between the parties, and knows that it did not embrace the "Montevideo store-house" and mansion, but had reference alone to the mountain land and "Nicholas farm;" and that if in law the word "land" or "lands" embraces a store-house and mansion on a small lot, almost covered by the buildings, he uses the word in that contract by mistake, or by mistake failed to except the Montevideo property, as it was not intended to be embraced in that contract. But his recollection is clear, that he did not understand the word land or lands, as used in that contract, as embracing anything but the mountain land jointly owned by said parties. and if it means more than that, it is the result of a mistake on his part in so writing it.

*Mistake in Written Agreement—Reformation.—That equity will reform a written agreement executed under a mistake of fact, see Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 256; Pulaski Iron Co. v. Palmer, 89 Va. 384; Carter v. McArtor, 28 Gratt. 356, and note.

Same—Parol Evidence.—For the rule that parol evidence is admissible to prove the mistake, see French v. Chapman, 88 Va. 321; dissenting opinion of JUDGE LACY, in Reynolds v. Reynolds, 88 Va. 163; Shen. Val. R. R. Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 352; Donaldson v. Levine, 93 Va. 476; Hoback v. Kilgores, 26 Gratt. 442, and note.

Same—As to Third Parties.—Equity will reform such mistakes, not only as against the other party, but against third parties claiming through him. See Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 417; Borst v. Nalle, 28 Gratt. 487.

The affidavit of Joseph N. Mauzy was also received as testimony by consent. He says, that in his purchase from Thomas G. Mauzy, under their contract of August 21st, 1868, he did not purchase Thomas G. Mauzy's one-fourth interest in the Montevideo property. That this is a large store-house and dwelling-house, with out-buildings nearly covering the small lot upon which they stand. That the words in the contract, "together with all his undivided interest in all the lands now owned by said parties," alone referred to three tracts of mountain land in which he and T. G. Mauzy had each one-fourth interest. That Robert M. Mooney wrote the said contract somewhat carelessly; but it was not supposed by any of them, that these words embraced the Montevideo store-house and mansion, and the sale did not, nor was the contract intended to, embrace the Montevideo property.

The cause came on to be heard on 644 the 5th of February *1874; when the court held, that Thomas G. Mauzy did sell to Joseph N. Mauzy his interest in the Montevideo store-house property; and the commissioner who was appointed to sell the real estate of Joseph N. Mauzy was directed to sell one-half thereof as the property of the said Joseph N. Mauzy. And the parties holding the other half of said store-house property were authorized to take the interest of said Joseph N. at a fair price which had been fixed upon it by commissioners, upon terms stated in the decree. And thereupon Thomas G. Mauzy applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

G. W. & F. A. Berlin, for the appellant.

Yancy, for the appellees.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a controversy growing out of an alleged mistake in a written agreement for the sale of certain real property. By the terms of this agreement, Thos. G. Mauzy sold to his brother Joseph N. Mauzy, "his interest in the property known as the 'John Nicholas farm,' together with all his undivided interest in the lands now owned by the said parties." At the date of the sale the vendor and vendee each owned an undivided fourth in "the Nicholas farm," in several tracts of mountain land, and also in a small lot upon which was situated a mansion house and store-house, known as the "Montevideo property."

It is claimed by the vendor, that the "Montevideo property" was not included in the sale. This is admitted by the purchaser; and the fact is fully proved by the draftsman of the instrument. He 645 states that "the contract was well understood by him; that it did not include the 'Montevideo property,' but related exclusively to the Nicholas farm and the mountain lands; that if in law the word 'land or lands' embraces a store and mansion house on a small lot almost covered by the buildings, he used the word in that contract by mistake, or by mistake failed to except the 'Montevideo property;' as it was not intended to be embraced in the contract. And his recollection is clear that he did not understand the word land or lands as embracing anything but the mountain lands.

It will thus be seen that there is no controversy between the vendor and the purchaser. But the latter, it seems, is insolvent, and his creditors having liens by judgment, insist that the terms of the contract necessarily include the "Montevideo property," and that parol testimony is inadmissible to vary or contradict the plain language of the instrument.

It will perhaps conduce to a clearer understanding of the merits of the question, to consider the case as if the controversy was between the vendor and purchaser exclusively—the one seeking to reform the written agreement by parol proof of the mistake, and the other resisting it. That it is competent for a court of equity to correct a mistake in a deed or other writing upon parol evidence, cannot now be questioned. No branch of equity jurisdiction is more fully established than this: none is sustained by a greater array of authorities, English and American.

In 1 Story Eq. Ju., s. 152, the doctrine is laid down as follows: "One of the most common classes of cases in which relief is sought in equity on account of mistake of facts, is that of written agreements, either executory or executed. Sometimes by mistake the written agreement contains less than the parties intended; 646 *sometimes it contains more; sometimes it simply varies from their intent by expressing something different in substance from the truth. In all such cases, if the mistake is clearly made out by proofs entirely satisfactory, equity will reform the contract so as to make it conformable to the precise intent of the parties.

A court of equity would be of little value if it could suppress only positive frauds, and leave mutual mistakes, innocently made, to work intolerable mischiefs, contrary to the intention of the parties. It would be to allow an act originating in innocence to operate ultimately as a fraud, by enabling the party who receives the benefit of the mistake to resist the claims of justice under the shelter of a rule framed to prevent it. In a practical view, there would be as much mischief done by refusing relief in such cases as there would be introduced by allowing parol evidence in all cases to vary written contracts." § 155.

In Gillespie v. Moon, 2 John. Ch. R. 585, 596, Chancellor Kent said: "I have looked into most if not all of the cases on this branch of equity jurisdiction, and it appears to me to be established, and on great and essential grounds of justice, that relief can be had against any deed or contract in writing, founded on mistake or fraud. The mistake may be shown by parol proof, and the relief granted to the injured party, whether he sets up the mistake affirmatively by bill or as a defence. Accordingly he gave relief against a deed conveying two hundred and fifty acres by metes and bounds, upon parol proof that the vendor only contracted for the sale of two hundred acres.

The English authorities on this subject are no less decisive than the American. The cases of Calverley v. Williams, 1 Ves.

R. 210; of Thomas v. Davis, cited in 647 *1 Sugd. on Ven. 172-3, margin, are very similar to the present case in their main features.

These, and a multitude of other cases which may be cited, show it is the constant practice of the equity courts to admit parol evidence of mistake of fact, and though such evidence is in direct contradiction of the express terms of the deed or other writing. Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 418-423. The only limitation upon this doctrine is, that the evidence in all such cases must be very strong and clear, such as to leave no fair and reasonable doubt upon the mind, that the writing does not correctly embody the real intention of the parties. If therefore the controversy here was between the vendor and purchaser, parol evidence is clearly admissible to establish the alleged mistake in the written agreement, even against the answer of the purchaser.

There is however no contest in this case between vendor and purchaser. As already stated, they are agreed in their version of the contract. The question is, whether the appellees as creditors can object to the admission of the parol proof, when the parties to the contract make no such objection. It is true that the judgments constitute a lien upon the interests of Joseph N. Mauzy in the real estate. But the question still recurs, what is the extent of that interest? The appellees may rely upon the instrument of writing as very strong and satisfactory evidence upon that point; they may require that the mistake shall be very clearly established; but they cannot rely upon the writing as conclusive when the parties to it do not insist upon it. They cannot claim the benefit of an estoppel by which they are not bound. Upon this point the case of Strader v. Lambeth, 7 B. Mon. R. 589-90, is 648 a direct *authority. In that case the Supreme court of Kentucky was of opinion that in an action at law, in a controversy with strangers to the writing, the parties to it are not themselves estopped to explain or contradict by parol its terms or recitals.

In Alexander & Co. v. Newton & als., 2 Gratt. 266, it was held that parol evidence was admissible, to show that it was the intention of the grantor, in a deed of trust, that the deed should be so drawn as to secure a preference in the payment of the debts to particular creditors, and the omission to insert such a provision proceeded from the mere mistake of the draftsman. The mistake was accordingly corrected against bona fide creditors claiming an equal participation in the trust subject.

The great difficulty encountered by courts of equity, in reforming written agreements upon parol proof, is the weight justly due to the answer of the defendant denying the mistake. But this difficulty is removed when the adverse party admits the existence of the mistake, and is willing to its correction. In such case it is said the court does not overturn any rule of equity by varying the deed, because it is an equity de hors the deed. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. 156; Attorney General v. Sitwell, 1 Younge & Coll. R. 559-582. Had the vendor here sued the purchaser to reform the agreement before the creditor's suit was instituted, a court of equity, upon the answer of defendant admitting the mistake, would have no difficulty in decreeing the correction. In such case the decree, if not conclusive, would certainly have furnished prima facie evidence of the rights of the parties even against the creditors. The latter might show collusion or fraud between the vendor and purchaser. Whether they would 649 be permitted *to re-open the whole case, in order to show by extrinsic evidence that in fact no mistake was committed, it is unnecessary now to decide.

Such evidence would perhaps, in its very nature, tend to the establishment of fraud or collusion.

Here the question arises in a suit by the creditors, asserting their liens upon the property. The vendor, in a bill filed by him, treated by consent of parties as an answer, claims that the written agreement does not express the real contract. The affidavits of the purchaser and the draftsman, by like consent treated as depositions regularly taken, fully sustain the answer. No suspicion or discredit is thrown upon these witnesses, nor is it even attempted. Their version of the matter derives some confirmation from the language of the agreement. "The Montevideo property" was as well known by its appellation as the "Nicholas farm." And yet the latter is expressly mentioned by name, while no reference whatever is made to the former.

It is difficult to understand the reason of this omission, except upon the assumption that this property (the Montevideo) was not included in the sale, and the word "lands," used in the article of agreement, referred to the mountain lands, jointly owned by the parties.

The appellees have adduced no evidence whatever upon the matter in issue. They have not attempted to impeach the testimony of the appellant; they have not even attempted to throw any light upon the conduct, the pretension or claims of the vendor, since the sale was made. This may have resulted from an undue confidence in their position, that parol evidence is wholly inadmissible in such cases; or, it may 650 be, *they cannot successfully controvert the evidence adduced by the appellant.

Whatever may have been the reasons, the cause is regularly before us for a hearing as it was before the Circuit court, and we must decide it upon the pleadings and proofs as they appear in the record.

The decree must be reversed with costs, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that the Circuit court erred in holding that the appellant, Thomas G. Mauzy, sold to Joseph N. Mauzy his one-fourth interest in the real estate known as the "Montevideo property." This court being satisfied, from the proofs taken and filed in the cause, that said property was not included, nor intended to be included, in the sale evidenced by the written agreement, dated 21st August 1868. It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the decree of the said Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the appellees do pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here.

And this court proceeding to render such decree as the Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is ordered and decreed, that so much of the bill of the complainants as seeks to subject to sale the one-fourth interest in the "Montevideo property" now claimed by the said Thomas G. Mauzy,

651 as belonging to Joseph N. *Mauzy under the agreement aforesaid, be and the same is hereby dismissed; and that the complainants pay to the defendant, Thomas G. Mauzy, his costs by him expended in this suit; all of which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree reversed.

652 *Shands' Ex'x v. Grove & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

I. Creditor's Suits.—G brings a creditor's suit against the executrix of S, to subject the estate of S to satisfy a judgment. The order book of the court was destroyed, but some of the papers were preserved; and it was proved by a witness that G recovered a judgment against the R. T. Co. and issued execution upon it; and then, at the instance of S, sued out a suggestion against him as a debtor of the Co., and that S appeared in court and acknowledged his indebtedness to the Co., and judgment was rendered against him. The proceedings in both cases to the judgments are endorsed on the papers preserved. An account taken in the cause showed the executrix indebted to the estate for considerably more than the claim of the plaintiff, beside large assets in her hands; and an inquiry ordered as to the debts of S was not acted on, no other creditor making claim. HELD:

1. Same.—G is entitled to recover his debt from the estate of S.

2. Same—Parties.—The proceeding being against the estate of S as the debtor of G, the Co. was not a necessary party.

3. Objection First Made in Appellate Court.—No other creditor having presented a claim, and the executrix not having insisted upon the enquiry, a personal decree against her will not be reversed for the want of such enquiry, upon the objection first made in the appellate court.

In July 1870 Emanuel Grove and Richard F. Omohunder filed their bill in the County court of Rockingham, in behalf of themselves and all other creditors of E. A. Shands, deceased, who should come in and contribute to the expense of the suit. They say that at the May term 1859 of the Circuit court of Rockingham, said Grove, suing for the benefit of said Omohunder, recovered a judgment against E. A.

653 *Shands for $760.25, with interest on $753, part thereof, from the 15th of December 1855, and $3.36; and they exhibit a copy of the judgment certified by the then clerk, and say the original record of the judgment was burned with the order books, &c., by the United States troops in 1864. That execution issued on this judgment in June 1859, but was never levied, and no part of it had been paid. That said judgment was duly docketed in 1861. That Shands died in 1861, leaving a widow and several children, and leaving a will which was admitted to record, and his widow qualified as executrix thereof, and took possession of his estate both real and personal. They make Mrs. Martha Shands, in her own right and as executrix of E. A. Shands, deceased, a party, and call upon her to say whether the personal estate in her hands is sufficient to pay the debt of the plaintiffs, and pray for a settlement of her accounts, an account of the debts and liabilities of the estate, that their debt may be paid, and for general relief.

Mrs. Shands answered the bill. She says she had understood that Grove, prior to June, 1857, had some pecuniary claim against the Rockingham Turnpike Company, and transferred it to Omohunder. That said company being largely indebted, on the 13th of June 1859 conveyed its property, franchises, &c., to E. A. Shands, in trust to secure its creditors, and among others Omohunder. That subsequently some irregular proceedings were set on foot by the complainants or one of them, in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, whereby they pretend they have obtained in the year 1858, a judgment upon said claim against the company. That they subsequently, on the 28th of December, 1858, sued out of the clerk's office of said Circuit court, a suggestion against said E. A. Shands, into the court of law rendering the judgment, the control of the funds and property of said company, conveyed in trust to said Shands. They now pretend that upon this suggestion they obtained a personal judgment against said Shands, for the whole amount of their claim against the company; when in truth the said Shands, in his lifetime, never owed the complainants anything, nor has his estate since his death become liable to pay them anything. She denies that Shands owed the company anything, either before or after their deed. But how he administered that trust she presumes is not a proper enquiry in this cause, as it is drawn in question in another suit pending in the Circuit court of the county, in which the defendant and the said Omohunder are parties.

The defendant further answers, that there is no sufficient record to show Grove's recovery against the Rockingham Turnpike Company; nor is there any record of a judgment against E. A. Shands in favor of the complainants or either of them. That it would appear that a suggestion as a foundation of a proceeding to obtain a judgment against Shands, was sued out of the clerk's office of the Circuit court of Rockingham on the 28th of December 1858; but he had neither actual nor constructive notice, so far as appears. That the sheriff's return upon the suggestion is that he delivered and explained a copy of said suggestion to the wife of E. A. Shands, "a white woman over sixteen years of age, he not being found at his usual place of abode;" but it by no means appears by the said returns or by any other evidence, either that the wife of E. A. Shands was a member of his family, or was found at his usual place of abode. She denies the rendition and docketing of said supposed judgment 655 *against her testator, and denies that any execution, in the sense of the law, was ever issued thereon. And she claims the benefit of the statute of limitations applicable to such cases.

Defendant admits that a considerable amount in value of real and personal property came into her hands as executrix, but the greater part thereof was embraced in a deed of trust executed by said E. A. Shands to William B. Shands, on the 22d of March 1861, to secure certain creditors. That no sale had ever been made under this deed; and the greater part of the liabilities intended to be secured thereby have been paid off by Shands in his lifetime, or defendant since his death; some of them however remain unsatisfied—that to Thomas J. Michie, and perhaps some others; she thinks the personal property, including debts, which has or will come into her hands, will be amply sufficient to pay the remaining indebtedness of the said estate. She insists that at most, Shands was only a security for the plaintiff's debt, and that the company, or at least their trustee who had been substituted in the place of Shands, should be a party.

It was in proof that the order books of the court and other papers in the office, had been destroyed by the United States troops in 1864; but there were found in the clerk's office some of the papers in the case of Grove for the use of Omohunder, against the Rockingham Turnpike Company. These were the writ with the return of the sheriff of the service thereof, the declaration, and the negotiable note on which the action was founded, with the protest for non-payment and proof of notice; and on the writ was an endorsement of the name of the case, the initials of plaintiff's counsel, the nature of the action, and the proceedings in the case to the judgment. There was 656 also a summons *to E. A. Shands, on a suggestion stating that Grove, for the use of Omohunder, had sued out, &c., a writ of fieri facias against the Rockingham Turnpike Company for, &c., reciting the judgment, &c. And on this summons there is a return of the sheriff in the words stated in the answer. Upon this summons there are similar endorsements of the names of the parties and counsel, the nature of the case, and the proceedings in the cause to the judgment. And there is a copy of an execution upon this judgment, against the goods, &c., of E. A. Shands, which is endorsed—"to lie."

It was in proof by one of the counsel who brought the suit of Grove against the Rockingham Turnpike Company, that after that judgment had been recovered, Shands requested him to sue out a suggestion upon the judgment against him; that he was indebted to the company, or had money belonging to it in his hands; witness did not remember which. Witness had the suggestion issued, Mr. Shands appeared in court in person and admitted his liability, and that witness took a judgment against him.

In August 1870 Mrs. Shands was directed to settle her accounts as executrix before a commissioner of the court; and the commissioner returned his report, bringing down the account to March 1871; at which date he reported the executrix to be indebted to the estate $1,969.83, of which $127.74 was interest. And that there were yet in her hands to be accounted for, county bonds $8,500, judgment v. county of Rockingham $6,500, and two other debts due to the estate from individuals, the amounts of which were not given.

In October 1873 the report was by consent recommitted to the commissioner, to 657 allow the executrix to *prove, if she could, some extraordinary charges sustained by her in the settlement of the estate of Shands. And in August 1874, in vacation, on the motion of Andrew J. Rader, it was decreed that a commissioner of the court should take an account of the debts and liabilities of the estate of Shands, and their priorities, if any, of what real estate said Shands died possessed, and any other and further reports as any party in interest may require; four weeks' notice to be given by publication.

The cause came on to be heard on the 3d of October 1874; when, nothing having been done under either of the two last orders, the court set them aside; and there being no exception to the report of the commissioner, it was confirmed, and there was a decree that Grove, for the benefit of Omohunder should recover of the defendant, Martha Shands, the sum of $763.36, with interest, &c. And thereupon Mrs. Shands, in her own right and as executrix of E. A. Shands, applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Robert Johnston and T. C. Elder, for the appellant.

Compton and William J. Robertson, for the appellees.

Anderson J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a creditor's bill brought by the appellee Grove, for the use of Omohunder, against the appellant Martha E. Shands, in her own right and as executrix of E. A. Shands deceased, to obtain satisfaction, out of the personal or real estate of said decedent, of a judgment which he obtained against him in his lifetime.

The said E. Grove held a negotiable note of the Rockingham Turnpike Company, which he transferred *to Omohunder; upon which note suit was brought against the said company, and judgment obtained in favor of Grove for the use of Omohunder. And afterwards, upon suggestion of the plaintiff that E. A. Shands had effects in his hands belonging to, or was indebted to, the said Rockingham Turnpike Company, which were liable by the fieri facias lien to satisfy his said judgment against the said Company, judgment was rendered in his favor for, &c., against the said E. A. Shands, in his lifetime, for the amount of his said judgment against the company; for the satisfaction of which judgment out of the estate of E. A. Shands, personal or real, or by the appellant in her own right, this suit was brought. Upon the settlement of the accounts of the appellant as executrix of E. A. Shands, it appeared that there was a balance due from her to the estate of $1,969.83; and a decree was rendered against her, in favor of the appellee E. Grove, for the use, &c., of Omohunder, for $763.36, the amount of the judgment, with interest and costs; from which decree she was allowed an appeal to this court.

The court is of opinion there is no error in said decree. It seems that the suggestion was made by the plaintiff at the instance of E. A. Shands, and that he was present in court and admitted his liability; and thereupon judgment was rendered against him. It is too late for his executrix now to object to the enforcement of the judgment by a court of equity, upon the ground that there is not sufficient evidence of either judgment, after the acknowledgment of her testator of his liability to satisfy the judgment against the company, and allowing judgment against himself. Part of the records of the suit were destroyed by the public enemy during the late war, but it seems that enough of the record was preserved to enable the clerk to *certify copies of both judgments; and the court is of opinion that the evidence is sufficient.

Nor can she now object that no fieri facias ever issued upon the judgment against the company, so as to authorize the proceeding against her testator by suggestion, he having admitted his liability in open court when the judgment was rendered. But if a fieri facias had not issued, and her testator were not estopped, nor his personal representative, to object to the judgment on that ground, the objection could not be made in a court of equity. Her remedy was in the court of law, and the error, if it existed, might have been corrected on motion in the court which rendered the judgment, under chapter 177 of the Code of 1873.

If there was any defect in the service of the summons, which was awarded upon the suggestion, it could not avail the appellant, as it is in proof that the suggestion was made at the instance of the testator, who appeared in court and admitted his liability when the judgment was rendered.

The objection for want of parties, the court is of opinion, is not error for which the decree should be reversed. They were not necessary parties in this suit.

E. A. Shands was not proceeded against as the surety of the Rockingham Turnpike Company, but as its debtor. So there is nothing in the objection if it be law, that the appellee should have been compelled to exhaust the assets of the Rockingham Turnpike Company, before resorting to the estate of E. A. Shands.

The court is further of opinion that this proceeding was not barred by the statute of limitations.

We have thus, we believe, noticed all the assignments of error by the appellant in her petition. But her counsel in argument insists, that it was error to decree against the executrix, without first ascertaining *that the fund was sufficient to pay all the debts of her testator. This objection to the decree is first made in the appellate court, and in a supplemental brief of appellant's counsel. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs, for themselves and all other creditors who should come in and contribute to the expense of the suit. No other creditors came in. And the appellant admits, in her answer to plaintiffs' bill, that the personal property, including debts, which have and will come into her hands, will be amply sufficient to pay the remaining indebtedness of the estate. The court is of opinion, therefore, that the decree should not be reversed on that ground.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion to affirm the decree.

Decree affirmed.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion to affirm the decree.

Decree affirmed.

December 1872, by George Harnsberger and N. K. Trout, executors of Jacob Harnsberger, deceased, against Samuel Simmons, John H. Moore and others, to subject a tract of land sold by the executors to Samuel Simmons, and by Simmons afterwards sold to the other parties. The defendants insisted that the land was sold with reference to Confederate money as the standard value, and that the purchase money should be scaled.

It appears that Jacob Harnsberger died in 1861, and that the tract of land in question, which contained one hundred and forty acres, was appraised by appraisers appointed for the purpose, at thirty-five dollars per acre as its cash value in good money. It was sold by the executors at public auction on the 17th of October, 1862, upon the 668 terms of one-fourth cash, and *the balance on a credit of one, two and three years, without interest, a lien for the deferred payments to be reserved in the deed, and it was purchased by Samuel Simmons. The terms seem to have been in writing and read at the sale, but the writing was lost. Nothing seems to have been said in them as to the kind of money which would be received in payment of the purchase money. On this question and as to the value of the land a great many witnesses were examined by both plaintiffs and defendants. It appears that the land was cried for some time and thirty-five dollars had been bid, when the bidding ceased for ten or fifteen minutes, when the enquiry was made by a bidder in the crowd as to the kind of money which was paid, and an answer was given by one of the executors, the other being present and hearing it. Of the precise form of the question and the answer the witnesses differ. The executors were examined as witnesses, and their testimony is stated by Judge Moncure in the opinion of the court. They and the crier say that they said they would take Confederate money for the cash payment, but they did not say they would take it for the deferred payments. A number of witnesses understood them as consenting to take Confederate money for the whole. After this enquiry was made and answered, the bidding was renewed, and the land was knocked off to Samuel Simmons, at fifty-five dollars per acre. And he thereupon paid the cash payment in Confederate money, and executed his three bonds, each for $1,931.87½, payable in one, two and three years; and the land was conveyed to him, reserving a lien for the purchase money.

As to the value of the land in good money the witnesses, and they were numerous, differed greatly. A number of them fixed it at $35 per acre cash; others 669 *thought it was worth, on the terms of credit given at the sale, from fifty-five to sixty dollars, and this especially if the cash payment was to be made in Confederate money.

There was evidence that after the first bond fell due Moore, one of the purchasers from Simmons, proposed to N. K. Trout, one of the executors, to pay it, but Trout declined to receive it. He however, showed no money to Trout.

The cause came on to be heard on the 4th day of February 1874, when the court held that the bonds sued on in the cause were not, according to the true understanding and agreement of the parties, to be fulfilled and performed in Confederate States treasury notes, and were not entered into with reference to such notes as a standard of value. And it being agreed that the defendants or some of them were entitled to credits on the notes, the cause was referred to a commissioner to take an account of any payments or set-offs to which they or any of them might be entitled. And the commissioner was also directed to ascertain the order of priority in which the lands purchased by Simmons were subsequently sold to the other defendants.

The commissioner made his report, showing that after allowing the parties their credits, there was due on the 15th of April 1874, on said bonds $4,245.65½, all principal, and also showing the order in which the other defendants had purchased from Simmons. And the cause came on to be heard on the 25th of April 1874, when the court confirmed the report, and made a decree against Samuel Simmons for the said sum of four thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-five and a half cents, with interest and costs. And if the said sum was not paid within ninety days, 670 *the lands were directed to be sold, selling the lands last sold first, and so on. And thereupon John H. Moore and the other purchasers from Simmons, applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

John E. Roller, for the appellants.

Compton, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the contract made on the 17th day of October 1862, between N. K. Trout and George Harnsberger, executors of Jacob Harnsberger deceased, and Samuel Simmons, for the sale by the former to the latter of a tract of land situated in Rockingham county, containing about one hundred and forty and one-half acres, at $55 per acre, on the terms of one-fourth in hand and the balance in three equal annual payments, with a vendor's lien to secure them, was made and entered into with reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. That the hand payment of one-fourth of the purchase money was agreed to be paid, and was actually paid, in Confederate States treasury notes, is admitted by all parties. And the only question is, as to the deferred instalments of the purchase money, whether they are payable according to their par amount, in good money, or according to the amount due, on the supposition that the contract was made in reference to the said standard of value, as well in regard to the deferred instalments, as in regard to the hand payment of the purchase money. Our opinion, as has already, in effect, been stated, is, that in regard to both, the contract was made with reference to said standard of value.

671 *Beyond all question, if the sale had been entirely for cash, the whole amount of the purchase money would have been received in Confederate States treasury notes, and the contract in that case would have been made in reference to them as a standard of value. But the difficulty arose from the fact, that the payment of three-fourths of the purchase money was by the contract deferred, and there was danger of the depreciation of the currency before the money became payable, and there was doubt as to what the amount of the depreciation would be. In this state of things, it was difficult, if not impossible, to fix upon a certain medium of payment of the deferred instalments which would do justice to both parties. The purchaser was of course unwilling to agree to pay specie or its equivalent, having contracted in reference to a lower standard of value; and the vendors were no doubt unwilling to agree to receive Confederate States treasury notes at par in payment, without reference to the extent of depreciation at the time of the maturity of the deferred instalments respectively. Had the bonds been, in terms, for the payment of Confederate States treasury notes, they might, and no doubt would, have been construed as contracts for the delivery of a commodity, and would have been soluble by the payment of the amount in such notes, however greatly depreciated they might have been at the time of the maturity of the bonds. All that could be done therefore, in justice to all parties, was to make their contract in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. If they remained of the same value at the maturity of the bonds there would be no difficulty. But if they materially depreciated in value by the time of the maturity of the bonds, then justice could be done by the payment of the value of the same

672 amount of *Confederate States treasury notes at the date of the contract, to be ascertained by the best rule that could be adopted for the purpose.

That the contract was made with reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value, is, we think, very obvious; whether we look at the time at which it was made and the surrounding circumstances, or to the evidence in the case. The sale was made on the 17th day of October, 1862, when the only, or almost only, currency which existed was Confederate States treasury notes, and that had been almost the only currency for a long time before. The 1st day of January 1862, nearly ten months before the date of the sale, was the day prescribed by law as the day between which and the 10th day of April 1865 it was made lawful for either party to a contract to show, by parol or other relevant testimony, what was the true understanding and agreement of the parties thereto, either express or to be implied, in respect to the kind of currency in which the same was to be fulfilled or performed, or with reference to which as a standard of value it was made and entered into. Such was the rarity of making a sale of real estate for anything else than Confederate States treasury notes, or, at all events, for specie or its equivalent; and such was the difficulty, if not impossibility of making such a sale for specie or its equivalent, at or about the time of the sale in this case, to-wit, the 17th of October 1862, that strong and clear evidence of an intention to make such a sale at or about that time ought to be required to prove the fact. A sale at such a time, under such circumstances, and in the absence of any such evidence, ought to be construed to be a sale in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. So far

673 from there being in this *case strong and clear evidence of such an intention, the great mass and weight of the evidence sustains the contrary. A great number of witnesses were examined in the case, some fifteen or twenty on each side. And most of them examined on the side of the purchaser testify to the fact that the sale was made in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value, as well in reference to the deferred instalments of the purchase money as the hand payment. Indeed, as we have seen, in regard to the hand payment, it is admitted on all sides that such was the case, and that the money was paid and received accordingly. While many witnesses testify that the sale was according to the same standard of value in reference to the deferred instalments also, only one or two of them testify to the contrary. The most important of these is certainly one of the executors themselves, N. K. Trout, who, no doubt, and as we happen to know, was in all respects worthy of confidence. He admits, however, that his co-executor, a son of the testator, was the chief actor in making the sale; and he testifies as to what was said and done at a sale which transpired many years before he gave his testimony. This witness testifies that "after the land had been up some time, the impression seemed to prevail that we would not take the then currency (Confederate money); there was a suspension of probably ten to fifteen minutes, and we had a conference with the legatees, and announced that we would take the payment of that day, the down payment, in Confederate money, but would not agree to bind ourselves to take the deferred payments in Confederate money. I recollect with great distinctness, while standing by the auctioneer, being asked by some person in the crowd: 'Will you take the payment which is to be made to-day in Confederate

674 *money?' I responded: 'Yes, we will.'

The interrogator then said: 'Will you require the deferred payments in gold or silver?" I responded, rather playfully, probably—"No, it is heavy to carry; we will take its equivalent or a legal tender for it." "This is the evidence mainly relied on to show that the sale, as to the deferred instalments, was to be for good money or a legal tender. But Mr. Trout no doubt only intended to make a playful remark, not only about specie, but about legal tender, and what he said was no doubt so regarded by those who heard him, if anybody heard him. This is shown by a subsequent part of his testimony. "I remember," he says, "Moore's coming to my office before the first bond was due, and asking me if I would receive the money for Simmon's bond, and I told him I would when it was due, unless I received instructions from the legatees not to. He came again some time after it was due, and I refused to take the money, because I had received orders from the legatees, through George Harnsberger, not to receive it; he showed me no money on either occasion. I supposed at the time of these interviews with Moore, that the money spoken of, in which he wished to pay the bond, was Confederate money. I did not see it." Now this payment was offered to be made about the 17th of October 1863, when Confederate money was very greatly depreciated: and is it likely that this executor would have been willing, as he seems to have been, so far as he was concerned, to receive this payment in Confederate money at par, if he had considered the purchaser as under an obligation to make payment in specie or in legal tender money? The testimony of his co-executor strongly tends to prove that there was no agreement to make the deferred payments in good money.

"The question was asked," he says, 675 "what *kind of money would be received? We, in the outset, agreed to take Confederate money for the down payment—that was stated in the terms of sale—the one-fourth in hand was to be paid in Confederate money. As to the bonds, I told them, it was out of my power to say what kind of money we would take by that time."

The contract having been made in reference to Confederate States treasury note as a standard of value, as well in regard to the deferred instalments as the cash payment, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the balance of the purchase money now due must be ascertained by scaling the nominal amount due upon the bonds; and the question now is, what mode of scaling should be adopted in this case—whether the gold standard or the property standard. This is a case to which the property standard may be applied, the Code providing "that, when the cause of action grows out of a sale or renting or hiring of property, whether real or personal, if the court (or where it is a jury case the jury) think that under all the circumstances the fair value of the property sold, or the fair rent or hire of it, would be the most just measure of recovery, instead of the express terms of the contract." Code p. 980, chap. 138, § 1. The court is of opinion, under all the circumstances of this case, that the fair value of the property sold at the time of the sale, or a due proportion thereof according to the balance of the purchase money remaining unpaid, would be the most just measure of recovery in this case, and ought to be adopted as such measure of recovery accordingly.

And now the question is, as to the value of the land sold at the time of the sale, to-wit, the 17th day of October 1862. The court is of opinion, that the value 676 *of the land at the time was thirty-five dollars cash per acre. Without reviewing all the evidence on this subject, of which there is a great deal, such, we think, is its decided preponderance. Even one of the witnesses introduced by the complainants, the executors of Harnsberger, testifies that such, in his opinion, was its value. William P. Sites, one of those witnesses, being asked, on cross-examination, "In October 1862, what was the Harnsberger land worth, to have been paid for in gold and silver or United States currency? What was it worth per acre?" answered: "From what little acquaintance I have with it, I know it very slightly, my figures on it would be $35 per acre." And being asked, on re-examination in chief, "Do you mean $35 cash?" he answered: "Yes, sir." And being asked, what difference certain terms of credit named in the question would make, he answered: "My figures have been $35 per acre as cash. What difference the terms of payment stated in the question would make, I cannot say." The testimony as to such value varies between $50 per acre and $30 per acre. None of the testimony introduced by the defendants fixes it at more than $35 per acre; while some of the testimony fixes the value at that sum as a cash price, and some as a price on the ordinary terms of credit. In fact, the executors were anxious to effect a sale of the land in December 1861 at forty dollars per acre, and tried to do so, but did not succeed. But the most important testimony in the case on that subject (to-wit, the value of the land in good money) is that of the three appraisers of the land appointed by the court for that purpose. They were no doubt selected for their impartiality, sound judgment and experience in such matters. They performed their duties upon oath, and 677 ante litem motam, *also before the sale was made or perhaps thought of. They were all examined as witnesses in the case, and all concurred in testifying that $35 per acre was, in their opinion, the fair value of the land at the time of the sale, on the 17th of October 1862.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the decree appealed from is erroneous, and ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in to a final decree in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel; and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the contract in the proceedings mentioned, made on the 17th day of October 1862, between N. K. Trout and George Harnsberger, executors of Jacob Harnsberger deceased, and Samuel Simmons, for the sale by the former to the latter of a tract of land situated in Rockingham county, containing about one hundred and forty and a half acres, at fifty-five dollars per acre, on the terms of one-fourth in hand, and the balance in three equal annual payments, with a vendor's lien to secure them, was made and entered into with reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value, not only in regard to the hand payment, but also in regard to the deferred payments aforesaid.

The court is further of opinion that no valid or legal tender was made of the amount of the bond for the first deferred payment, which became payable on the 17th day of October 1863.

The court is further of opinion that, 678 under all the *circumstances of the case, the fair value of the property sold at the time of the sale aforesaid, would be the most just measure of recovery in this case, and ought to be adopted as such measure of recovery accordingly, subject to all just credits to which the defendants may be entitled.

The court is further of opinion that the fair value of the said land at the time of the said sale, to wit, on the 17th day of October 1862, was thirty-five dollars cash per acre, with three-fourths of the amount of which value, with interest from that day, the purchaser is chargeable on account of the deferred payments, he having properly discharged the hand payment in Confederate money. The court is therefore of opinion that the decrees rendered by the Circuit court in the cause on the 4th day of February 1874, and on the 25th day of April 1874, are erroneous, and it is decreed and ordered that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the appellees, N. K. Trout and George Harnsberger, executors of Jacob Harnsberger, deceased, do out of the estate of their said testator in their hands to be administered, pay to the appellants their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here. And it is further decreed and ordered that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein to a final decree in conformity with the foregoing opinion; which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree reversed.

679 *Marshall & al. v. Cross & al.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Contracts for Sale of Land—Unrecorded—Priority.*—

In August 1867 M sold to C a tract of land for $5,500, *Unrecorded Contracts for Sale of Land.—See March,

on credits extending to 1870, for which M had not obtained the title, and $2,100 was to be retained until the death of F upon the payment of the interest. C paid in cash $500, and of the payment of $1,000 due the 1st of March 1868, C paid in July $425. M obtained a deed for the land on the 5th of May 1868, and on the same day conveyed it to W in trust to secure the amount due F's heirs. This debt falling due in 1869, W advertised and sold the land to J for $4,238, one-third cash, and the balance in one and two years; and in March 1870 J was put in possession, and complied with the terms of sale. On the 28th of April 1870 M assigned to T, trustee in a deed from M to secure debts he owed J, the balance of the purchase money, after the payment of the debt to F's heirs, for the purpose of his trust; and on the 2d of May W, the trustee, acknowledged notice of the assignment. On the 9th of September 1870 M and C had a settlement, when by writing under seal M acknowledged he owed C $778.36, on account of C's payments on the land. C files his bill against M, J and W, to subject the balance of purchase money in W's hands after satisfying the trust in favor of F's heirs; and J and W answer, denying all notice, actual or constructive, of C's contract or claim. HELD: C not having had his contract with M for the purchase of the land recorded, and J and M denying all notice, actual or constructive, of C's contract or claim, J's right to the surplus of the trust fund in the hands of W is superior to that of C.

Some time before December 1860, Dr. H. H. McGuire purchased a tract of land of about one hundred and seventy acres, lying in the county of Clarke, of one or more of the heirs of David Funsten, deceased. He seems to have paid the purchase money, except a sum retained to meet the dower 680 interest of Mrs. Funsten *in the land.

In December 1860 he sold the land to Isaac Pidgeon, for twenty-five dollars per acre, in payments bearing interest, of $600 a year for five years, and the balance of the purchase money to be divided into five annual payments, to commence when the first five ended; and a deed was to be executed when the purchase money was paid. Pidgeon was put into possession of the land in January 1861, and executed his notes for the several payments, and in January 1862 he paid off the first note. He continued in possession of the land by himself, or those claiming under him, down to 1865, without making any further payment. In September 1865 Dr. McGuire gave a written notice to Pidgeon that if his notes then due were not paid in ninety days he would proceed to take possession of the farm; and he seems to have done it.

In August 1867 Dr. McGuire entered into a written contract with J. L. Cross to sell to him the land for the sum of $5,500, payable $500 in cash, $1,000 on the 1st of March 1868, $500 on the 1st of September 1868, with interest from the 1st of March 1868, $500 on the 1st of March 1869, with like interest, Price & Co. v. Chambers et al., 30 Gratt. 299, and note, collecting cases; also Eidson v. Huff, 29 Gratt. 338. The present Virginia statute, V. C., § 2465 is identical with that of 1873 on this subject, hence these cases are still authority.

and $500 on the 1st of September 1869, with like interest, and $400 on the 1st of March 1870, with like interest, and $2,100 to be retained as a lien on the land for and during the life of Mrs. Funsten, widow of David Funsten, deceased, on which interest was to be paid annually, on the 1st of January during her life, and at her death to be paid in two instalments to the heirs of David Funsten; all of which deferred payments were to be secured by deed of trust on the land when the deed conveying the same was made to Cross.

In March 1868 Cross was put in possession of the land, which was occupied by his father and his family, he, himself, living in Florida, where he was a professor 681 *in a school. He paid the cash payment of $500, and in July 1868 he paid $425.

It seems that Dr. McGuire did not receive a deed conveying him the land from the heirs of David Funsten until the 5th of May 1868, and on the same day he conveyed the same to George W. Ward in trust to secure the payment of the sum of $1,265.45, with interest from the 30th of August 1856, to the heirs of David Funsten; and it was provided that if the said McGuire did not pay this debt and interest within six months after demand made, Ward, the trustee, should proceed to sell the land at public auction, and out of the proceeds pay the debt and expenses, and the remainder pay over to H. H. McGuire.

Dr. McGuire not having paid the debt when demanded, Ward proceeded to sell the land on the premises, when it was purchased by James Marshall, who complied with the terms of the sale, and was put into possession of the land.

In November 1868 Isaac Pidgeon filed his bill in the Circuit court of Clarke county, which was afterwards removed to the Circuit court of Frederick, in which he set out his purchase of the land from Dr. McGuire, and his payment of $636 of the purchase money, the taking possession of the land by Dr. McGuire in 1865, and his sale to Cross; and he insisted that he was entitled, if Cross took the land, to have the difference between what he was to pay and what Cross was to pay for the land, or to have the land himself, and to pay the balance of the purchase money which he owed. And, making Dr. McGuire and Cross defendants, he prayed that he might have what he had insisted on, and for general relief.

In June 1870 Pidgeon amended his bill, and made George W. Ward and James 682 Marshall defendants; *stated the sale by Ward to Marshall, and charged that they had actual or constructive notice of his equitable lien; or, if the sale and purchase was lawful, he was entitled to be paid his claim out of the funds in their hands.

Cross answered the original and amended bill. He set out his purchase of the land in 1867 from Dr. McGuire, and his payments of $500 and $425; and having been deprived of his farm, fairly purchased, he prays that Ward, the trustee, and Marshall, the purchaser, may be required to repay him out of the purchase money of the land, after discharging the debt to Mrs. Funsten, the amount he had paid McGuire. He filed with his answer a paper under seal, executed by Dr. McGuire, dated the 9th of September 1870, by which McGuire acknowledged that, upon settlement, he owed Cross $778.36.

Marshall and Ward answered. Marshall said he purchased the land at the sale made by Ward; paid the cash payment of $1,412.65, and gave his bonds for the deferred payments, and was put in possession of the land; and he avers that he had no actual notice of the plaintiff's equity, nor, so far as he knows or believes, was there any constructive notice affecting him at the date of said purchase.

Ward states his sale of the land to Marshall under the deed of trust for $4,238, of which one-third was paid in cash, and the balance was to be on a credit of one and two years. And he says that Dr. McGuire on the 28th of April 1870 assigned to Edward M. Tilball, in trust to secure certain debts due to James Marshall and W. D. McGuire by said Dr. McGuire, the balance due to him, after payment of his liability under the aforesaid deed of trust; notice of which assignment was accepted by him 683 (Ward) on the 2d of May 1870. *And he exhibits the assignment. He denies having actual notice of the plaintiff's equitable lien as charged in the bill; and says he did not know the plaintiff had filed his bill until January 1871.

A number of witnesses were examined in the case, an account of the claim of the plaintiff was taken, to which there were various exceptions, and the cause came on to be heard, when the court refused to confirm the report, and making a statement of Pidgeon's claim, rendered a decree in his favor for $346.97, with interest from the 1st of April 1865, and in favor of Cross for $778.36, with interest from the 9th of September 1870; and it appearing that the fund had been paid under a previous order in the cause, to the general receiver of the court, he was directed to pay first to Pidgeon the amount due to Pidgeon, and then to Cross the amount due to him. From this decree Marshall obtained an appeal to this court; and in October 1873 it was reversed. And the court says the bill of Pidgeon should have been dismissed; but they send the cause back with leave to Cross to file a cross-bill, for the purpose of litigating between himself and Marshall, his co-defendant, their respective equities, and their priorities with respect to the said tract of land sold by McGuire to Cross, and afterwards purchased by Marshall at the sale made by Ward, trustee.

When the cause went back Cross filed his cross-bill. He set out his purchase of the land from Dr. McGuire, and his payments as before stated. That he purchased the farm as a home for his father. He says he lived in Florida, and only returned to Virginia during his vacations in the summer. That in the summer of 1868, and after he had paid $425 to Dr. McGuire, he heard of the claim of Pidgeon, which alarmed him. He was very poor, his only means being his salary as 684 *professor. He was purchasing the farm as a home for his father, and he was much disturbed at the prospect of being disappointed, as well as suffering pecuniary loss. Nothing however was done whilst he was here. That he returned to Florida, and did not come back until July 1869. In the meantime Dr. McGuire had gotten his title through the Circuit court of Clarke county; but he had gotten it with a deed of trust for the benefit of Mrs. Funsten, which could be closed at any time, not only necessitating him, Cross, to pay the debt long prior to the terms of the agreement with Dr. McGuire, but changing the whole character of the agreement itself, by reason of that debt being larger than was then supposed. Moreover Gardiner, a purchaser of twenty-two acres of the land from Pidgeon, was still upon it, and Pidgeon still asserted his claim. Under these circumstances he was afraid to pay any more money. So matters rested; and when he returned again to Virginia, in July 1870, he found that the land had been sold by Ward, trustee, for the benefit of Mrs. Funsten.

He further says, he is informed and verily believes, that it never was the intention of Dr. McGuire to assign to Mr. Marshall, &c., anything more than the surplus (which is a considerable amount) of the fund arising from the land sold by the trustee, Ward, over and above what was required to satisfy the Funsten lien and also plaintiff's just claim to have refunded to him the amount paid on his purchase from Dr. McGuire; and this, he insists, abundantly appears from the face of the assignment itself, considered in connection with the facts of the case, especially the adjustment and settlement between Dr. McGuire and the plaintiff of the exact balance due to the plaintiff of the date September 9th, 1870. But 685 however this may *be, he contends that such a simple and indefinite assignment (and that too in trust, without the instrument having been recorded) cannot be made superior to plaintiffs' paramount claim and lien upon the surplus fund in the hands, or rather to come into the hands, of the trustee under the Funsten lien. And making Dr. McGuire, James Marshall, Titball, trustee in the alleged assignment, and Ward, defendants, he prays that he may have a decree for the amount of his claim, as ascertained in the cause, out of the trust fund now under the control of the court, and for general relief.

Marshall answered the cross-bill. He referred to the record in the original case of Pidgeon v. McGuire, especially to the answer of Ward and his own, and to the assignment by McGuire to Titball. He says, he knows nothing in the world of the matters alleged in the bill, whether correct or not, and he therefore calls for full proof of each and every allegation of fact therein made. He avers that he became the purchaser of the land referred to at a sale by G. W. Ward, trustee in a deed of trust from Dr. McGuire, a copy of which he files. That the records of Clarke county disclosed the fact, that Dr. McGuire had acquired the legal title to the land only on the day this deed was made by him. He denies that he had any actual notice of any prior equities in or to said land or its proceeds; and he does not believe he had any constructive notice of such equity. The deed of trust provides that any residue, after the debts secured, shall be paid over to said Dr. McGuire; of this residue respondent, after his purchase, took in good faith and innocence the assignment before referred to. Certainly respondent knew nothing of the alleged claim of Mr. Cross: the records 686 of Clarke county furnished *no notice; the trustee, George W. Ward, knew nothing of it, as would appear from his acknowledgment of notice of the assignment.

Ward was examined as a witness. He says, the debt for which the trust was executed became due and was not paid; and he advertised the property to be sold, the first time, he thinks, in September 1869, to be sold on the premises. He went to the place of sale, and found Mr. James Cross there, and also his son, as he supposed, in possession of the property. The property was not sold, for want of bidders. He afterwards advertised the property to be sold in October 1869, he thinks, at which time a sale was made to Dr. William McGuire, who bought for James Marshall. He went to Winchester, and Mr. Marshall would not comply with the terms of sale, pay the cash payment, until witness gave him possession. Witness saw Mr. James Cross, and asked him to give possession, which he declined doing; and witness instituted proceedings in Clarke county, where the land lies, to turn him off. After some one or two months, witness found that they claimed that the suit had been improperly brought, and the proceedings had to be renewed; and about the last of March or first of April 1870 possession was given him, and Mr. Marshall complied with the terms of sale and took possession.

The cause came on to be heard on the 13th of November 1874; when the court held that Cross was entitled to receive, out of the fund in the hands of the receiver of the court, the sum of $778.36, with interest thereon from the 9th of September 1870, and his costs; and the receiver was directed to pay to him that amount, and to pay the residue of the fund to Titball, trustee under the assignment in trust of April 28th, 1870, for the benefit of James Marshall, &c.

687 *And from this decree Marshall applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Holmes Conrad, for the appellant.

Holliday and Andrew Hunter, for the appellee.

Anderson, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The question is, in this case, whether James Marshall, the appellant, or J. L. Cross, the appellee, is entitled to a certain fund in the hands of George W. Ward, the trustee of Dr. H. H. McGuire. The fund consists of the balance of the proceeds of the sale of a tract of land, which was made by the trustee, Ward, under a deed of trust to him by Dr. McGuire, after satisfying the balance of purchase money due upon it to the widow and heirs of David Funsten, deceased.

The land was first offered for sale in September 1869. The trustee says he went to the place of sale, and found Mr. James Cross there, and also his son in possession. It was put up, but not sold for want of bidders. It was sold in October following, and was bought by Dr. William McGuire for James Marshall for the price of $4,238. It does not appear that the sale was objected to, or any claim of right made to the property by the appellee, James L. Cross, or his father, either in October 1869, when it was sold, or in September when it was put up, but not sold for want of bidders, though both the father and the son were present when it was first offered. If the appellee had any claim at that time to the property, the presumption is he would have asserted it, or would have forbidden the sale. There is no proof that he did either. If he had done so, it was easy for him to have proved it. He took the deposition of his father; but not a syllable of such notice or demand does he prove by him. Nor 688 *does he even allege it in his answer to the original bill or in his cross-bill. He made no attempt to prove it by Ward, though he was represented by counsel when his deposition was given. No inquiry was made of him if such were the fact. It must be presumed that such was not the fact, or the inquiry would have been made. And it is not easy to reconcile the conduct of the appellee, except with the abandonment of his contract and all claim upon the land. And this is not improbable.

His contract was a bad one for him. He was to pay for the land $5,500, with interest on deferred payments from 1st of March 1868—a great deal more than it had sold for before to Pidgeon, or afterwards to Marshall. And it was an injudicious contract for him, because he was evidently unable to fulfil it. He was in default in meeting the very first deferred instalment of purchase money, of $1,000, due March 1st, 1868; of which he paid only $425; and that not until the 15th of July 1868. Interest was accumulating on that instalment; another was due in seven or eight months, with accruing interest from the 1st of March 1868; and another the year following; and so on. And he might very soon be called on to pay the whole amount due the widow and heirs of David Funsten, deceased, which amounted, with interest to April 6th, 1870, to $2,321.47; and his only resource for making payments was what he could save from his salary as a teacher: as he tells us himself, he was very poor. He had evidently assumed obligations which he was unable to discharge. He was involved in an onerous contract, which he could not fulfil, and from which it would be to his advantage to be released. If it had been in the power of McGuire to have fulfilled it, and to have made him a good title, it is 689 evident he could not have *fulfilled it on his part. He had already failed to make, as we have seen, the very first deferred payment. He had evidently undertaken more than he could accomplish, and if held to his contract, it would in all probability have involved him in inextricable ruin. He had agreed to give for the land twelve hundred and sixty-two dollars more, with interest on the deferred payments, than could afterwards be got for it in open market on terms of one-third in cash, and the residue in two equal annual instalments, without interest, when it was purchased by Marshall. If he had been held to his contract it is more than probable that he could not have met his payments, and the land would have been forced to sale, and it is not reasonable to suppose would have brought more than it sold for to Marshall, in which event his loss would have been $1,262, with an accumulation of interest. It was most probably to his advantage, that McGuire was not in condition to insist upon the execution of the contract on his part. And if he had been, it would have been better for Cross, if necessary in order to be released from the contract, to have surrendered the $778.36 which he claims to be the amount due from McGuire on account of the purchase money he had paid, than to have gone on with the contract. It is not surprising, therefore, that he did not insist upon his contract, and object to the sale when it was made under the deed of trust.

But why did he not demand that he should be refunded what he had paid for the land out of the proceeds of the sale after the Funsten debt was satisfied? There is no proof, as we have seen, that he asserted any such claim at the time of sale. The presumption is he did not. That was the time for him to have asserted it if he ever intended to make such claim. The deed of trust was executed on the 5th of May 1868, 690 *and admitted to record in Clarke county on the 22nd of June following. By its terms it requires the trustee after satisfying the Funsten debt and expenses of sale, &c., to pay the remainder to McGuire. Cross must be presumed to have notice of that deed, it being of record. And the land was put up to sale under it, in his presence in September 1869, more than a year after its recordation. If he intended to assert a lien on the land or the proceeds of the sale, for what was due him from McGuire, he surely would then have notified the trustee of his claim.

And if, against his own interest, under the circumstances which I have detailed, he intended to insist upon his contract, or to hold the land bound for the purchase money he had paid, why did he not have his contract with McGuire recorded? He must be presumed to have known the law, that any contract made in respect to real estate, &c., shall be as valid, as against creditors and purchasers, from the time it is recorded, as if it were a deed conveying the estate or interest in the contract—Code of 1873, p. 897, § 4; and that by § 5, "Every such contract," &c., "shall be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record," &c. Mr. Cross must be presumed to have known the law, and all other persons are justified in dealing with the subject under such presumption. If upon searching the records, they find no evidence of such equity, they have a right to presume that there is none, if otherwise without notice of its existence. If Mr. Cross intended to insist upon his contract, or to hold the land bound for the money he had paid on it why did not he have the contract recorded? It would have been in ample time if it had been recorded 691 when the land was offered *for sale in September or October, 1869, or any time before the purchase was confirmed by Marshall in the spring of 1870. That would have been notice to all the world. It would have been notice to the purchaser, and the land, or the proceeds of the sale, in the purchaser's hands, would have been bound for his claim.

That he did not forbid the sale, or notify the trustee of his claim upon the land, or notify James Marshall, the purchaser, that he held this claim on the land, or have his written contract for the purchase recorded, can only be accounted for, it seems to me, upon the ground, that he had determined at that time, to abandon his contract, and all claim upon the land, and look to McGuire personally (in whom it appears from his cross-bill, he not only reposed confidence, but of whom he had a very exalted opinion), to refund the purchase money he had paid. Could he thus remain silent, and allow Marshall to purchase, and pay for the land, and then hold him liable for the claim which he had upon Dr. McGuire? A person who, having an interest or claim upon property, stands by and sees another sell it as his own, without objection, will not be allowed afterwards to assert his title. His silence, when in good conscience he ought to speak, shall close his mouth when he would speak (2 Sugd. Vend. with American notes, chap. 23, § 1, p. 507; 8 Amer. ed. note u, citing numerous cases).

In his answer to the original bill, which was sworn to on the 30th of July, 1870, but not filed until the October term of that year, whilst he recognizes his loss of the farm, he prays that the trustee Ward may be ordered to refund to him the purchase money he had paid on the land with interest, after discharging the Funsten debt; or that James Marshall who was the 692 *purchaser should pay it. But this was after Marshall had paid the whole purchase money; or at least after McGuire, who, as we have seen, was entitled to the residue of the proceeds of sale after satisfying the Funsten debt, &c., had assigned it for the benefit of Marshall and another, by deed of assignment, bearing date April 28, 1870, of which the trustee had been duly notified. This assignment was perfected three months prior to the date of Cross' answer, and nearly six months before it was filed—and that is the first intimation we have of the claim of Cross to hold the proceeds of the sale liable.

It appears that between the preparation of his answer, and the filing of it in court, he and McGuire had a settlement of this claim, and as auxiliary to it had an arbitration of some matters about which they were not agreed, and that a certificate was given by McGuire under his hand and seal, that he was due him a balance of $778.36, for money advanced on said contract of purchase. This certificate is dated September 9th 1870. But, as we have seen, long before this adjustment and certificate McGuire had assigned for value his whole interest under the deed of trust in the proceeds of the sale made by Ward.

But it is contended that said assignment was made subject to the claim of Cross upon the proceeds of said sale. The assignment is of "any balance due me under deed of trust," and the trustee Ward is directed to pay to Edward M. Tidball, trustee, any balance due to me after the payment of my liabilities under the trust in which he is trustee."

The deed in which Mr. Ward is trustee, conveys the land in question upon trust, to secure the payment of $1,265.45, with legal interest thereon, from the 30th of August 1856 until paid, to O. R. Funsten and 693 the other *heirs at law of Elizabeth Funsten deceased; being the balance of purchase money for the said tract of land, due from, and unpaid by, the said Hugh H. McGuire, to the said O. R. Funsten and the other heirs at law as aforesaid, for the use of said David Funsten's widow and children. And the trustee, in default of payment, six months after default of payment is made, is upon request, &c., required to make sale, and out of the proceeds "to pay all the necessary expenses, and the said debt and interest, and the remainder to pay over to the said Hugh McGuire." There is no mention of, nor allusion to any claim of James L. Cross. What was due under that deed of trust to Hugh McGuire, if it was not the balance of the proceeds of sale after satisfying the Funsten debt and expense of sale, &c.? Whatever that balance was, whatever McGuire was entitled to demand of the trustee Ward, under the terms of that deed, was transferred and vested by his said deed of assignment, in Tidball trustee, to secure the debts due from the assignee to Marshall, and to certain debts for which said Marshall and William D. McGuire are his endorsers and security. It is very clear that the assignment is not made subject to any claim of Cross against McGuire, and that Ward the

1. Eminent Domain—Appraisement by Commissioners—Testimony.—When commissioners are appointed by a County or Corporation court, under § 6, ch. 56, of the Code of 1860, for the purpose of ascertaining what will be a just compensation to the tenant of the freehold for land taken for a work of internal improvement, it is the duty of such commissioners to hear all the legal and relevant testimony offered by either party bearing upon the question of such compensation.
2. Same—Same—Same—Refusal to Hear Such Testimony.—The refusal of the commissioners to hear such testimony, when offered in due time, is of itself sufficient to vacate their report.
3. Same—Same—Report—Objections to Same.—When such report is returned to the court either party may show cause against its confirmation, upon the ground of excessive or inadequate compensation, improper conduct of the commissioners in refusing or failing to hear legal and proper evidence, or by proof of any other fact tending to show that said report ought not to be confirmed.
4. Same—Same—Open to Investigation—Notice.—Under the statute all matters affecting the validity of the report and the action of the commissioners are open for investigation without notice.
5. Same—Same—Motion to Set Aside.—On the motion of the company, a rule is made on the tenant of the freehold to show cause why the report and assessment of the commissioners, made in such a case, should not be set aside, upon the ground that said assessment is excessive; and why other commissioners should not make said assessment. Upon the hearing the company will not be confined to the specific objection therein suggested to the confirmation of the report; but the company may impeach it by showing that the commissioners had improperly refused or failed to hear legal testimony offered by the company upon the question of compensation and damage.
6. Same—Same—Same.—If the tenant may be surprised by the offer of testimony on matters not referred to in the rule, it is competent for the court to continue the hearing to a future day or term.

At the August term 1873 of the 662 County court of *Rockingham, on the motion of the Washington, Cincinnati and St. Louis Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, commissioners were appointed to ascertain the damages which would be sustained by D. M. Switzer and others by the passage of the road of the company through their lands. In October 1873, the commissioners made their report, by which they fixed the amount to be received by Switzer at $1,250. And thereupon, at the November term of the court, upon the motion of the company a rule was made upon said Switzer to show cause why said report and assessment should not be set aside, upon the ground that the said assessment is excessive, and why other commissioners should not be appointed to make said assessment.

The case came on to be heard upon the rule in March 1874; and in the progress of the trial the plaintiff proposed to prove that the commissioners had acted improperly in favor of the defendant, Switzer, in the assessment of damages in this—that they had refused to hear any evidence on the part of the plaintiff to show what was the damage to the land of defendant, and what injury he would sustain by the making of said road through his land as proposed, though the said plaintiff, while the said commissioners were engaged in their assessment of said damages, offered and desired to do so, having the witnesses present for that purpose. To the introduction of this evidence the defendant objected, upon the ground that under the order entered in this cause, at the November term 1873 of the court, the plaintiff could introduce no evidence except to show that the damages assessed by the commissioners to said Switzer were excessive; and that the plaintiff could not move to set aside said report upon any ground but that named in said order, viz: excessive damages allowed 663 to said defendant; *which objection was sustained by the court; and all the evidence excluded except such as related to the question of excessive damages. To which opinion of the court the plaintiff excepted.

After the introduction of the evidence, as to the description of the land, and of a number of witnesses by both parties as to the damages which would be sustained by the making the road through the land of the defendant, who differed widely in their estimate—those of the plaintiff fixing them at from $300 to $800, and those of the defendant estimating them at from $1,100 to $1,200—the court confirmed the report of the commissioners, and ordered the said sum of $1,250 to be paid to Switzer. To which opinion of the court the plaintiff excepted. The company thereupon took the case to the Circuit court of the county, where the judgment was affirmed; and they then applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

Compton, for the appellant.

G. G. Grattan and Robt. Johnston, for the appellee.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion that when the commissioners are appointed by a County or Corporation court, under the provisions of section 6, chapter 56, Code of 1860, for the purpose of ascertaining what will be a just compensation to the tenant of the freehold for land taken for a work of internal improvement, it is the duty of such commissioners to hear all the legal and relevant testimony offered by either party bearing

The principal case is cited in The B. & O. R. R. Co. v. The P. W. & Ky. R. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 847, for the rule that, "All matters affecting the validity of the report and the action of the commissioners are open for investigation without notice, rule or pleading."

upon the question of such compensation; and the refusal or failure of the commissioners to hear such testimony. 664 *when offered in due time, is of itself sufficient to vacate their report.

The court is further of opinion, that when such report is returned to the County or Corporation court, either party may show cause against its confirmation, upon the ground of excessive or inadequate compensation and damages, improper conduct of the commissioners in refusing or failing to hear legal and proper evidence, or by proof of any other fact tending to show that said report ought not to be adopted.

The court is further of opinion, that the rule awarded by the County court of Rockingham at the September term 1873, at the instance of the appellant, did not have the effect of confining the appellant to the specific objection therein suggested to the confirmation of the commissioner's report: but it was competent for the appellant, notwithstanding the rule aforesaid, to impeach said report, by showing the commissioners had improperly refused or failed to hear legal testimony offered by the appellant upon the question of compensation and damage aforesaid.

The court is of opinion that, according to a proper interpretation of the statute, all matters affecting the validity of the report and the action of the commissioners are open for investigation without notice, rule or pleading. The rule awarded as aforesaid in this case was therefore unnecessary, and cannot be held to deprive the appellant of a plain right conferred by the statute. If the County court had just reason to apprehend that the appellee might be surprised by the admission of evidence of matters not mentioned in the rule, it was competent and proper to postpone the investigation to such future day or term, at the costs of the appellant, as might afford the appellee sufficient time to meet the additional grounds of objection.

665 *The court is therefore of opinion that the County court of Rockingham erred in refusing to hear the evidence set out in the first bill of exceptions; and the Circuit court erred in refusing to set aside the judgment of the County court for the error aforesaid.

And this court proceeding to render such judgment as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is considered by the court that the judgment of the County court of Rockingham be reversed and annulled; that a new trial be awarded the appellant, upon which trial the evidence aforesaid, if again offered, is to be received. And the case is remanded to the said Circuit court, for further proceedings to be had in conformity with the views herein expressed.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their attorneys, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the judgment aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that the evidence offered by the appellant, and set out in its first bill of exceptions, was relevant and proper evidence, and the County court of Rockingham erred in refusing to hear the same; and for said error the said Circuit court ought to have reversed the judgment of said County court, instead of affirming the same. It is therefore considered by the court that the judgment of the Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendant in error pay to the plaintiff in error its costs incurred in the prosecution of the appeal and supersedeas aforesaid here. And this court proceeding to render such judgment as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is 666 considered that the judgment *of the County court be reversed and annulled, and that the defendant in error pay to the plaintiff in error its costs by it expended in the prosecution of the appeal and supersedeas before said Circuit court. And it is further considered that a new trial be awarded the plaintiff in error, upon which new trial, if the evidence aforesaid is again offered, it is to be received by the court. And the case is remanded to the said Circuit court, to be proceeded with in conformity with the views herein expressed; which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Judgment reversed.

December 1872, by George Harnsberger and N. K. Trout, executors of Jacob Harnsberger, deceased, against Samuel Simmons, John H. Moore and others, to subject a tract of land sold by the executors to Samuel Simmons, and by Simmons afterwards sold to the other parties. The defendants insisted that the land was sold with reference to Confederate money as the standard value, and that the purchase money should be scaled.

It appears that Jacob Harnsberger died in 1861, and that the tract of land in question, which contained one hundred and forty acres, was appraised by appraisers appointed for the purpose, at thirty-five dollars per acre as its cash value in good money. It was sold by the executors at public auction on the 17th of October, 1862, upon the 668 terms of one-fourth cash, and *the balance on a credit of one, two and three years, without interest, a lien for the deferred payments to be reserved in the deed, and it was purchased by Samuel Simmons. The terms seem to have been in writing and read at the sale, but the writing was lost. Nothing seems to have been said in them as to the kind of money which would be received in payment of the purchase money. On this question and as to the value of the land a great many witnesses were examined by both plaintiffs and defendants. It appears that the land was cried for some time and thirty-five dollars had been bid, when the bidding ceased for ten or fifteen minutes, when the enquiry was made by a bidder in the crowd as to the kind of money which was paid, and an answer was given by one of the executors, the other being present and hearing it. Of the precise form of the question and the answer the witnesses differ. The executors were examined as witnesses, and their testimony is stated by Judge Moncure in the opinion of the court. They and the crier say that they said they would take Confederate money for the cash payment, but they did not say they would take it for the deferred payments. A number of witnesses understood them as consenting to take Confederate money for the whole. After this enquiry was made and answered, the bidding was renewed, and the land was knocked off to Samuel Simmons, at fifty-five dollars per acre. And he thereupon paid the cash payment in Confederate money, and executed his three bonds, each for $1,931.87½, payable in one, two and three years; and the land was conveyed to him, reserving a lien for the purchase money.

As to the value of the land in good money the witnesses, and they were numerous, differed greatly. A number of them 669 fixed it at $35 per acre cash; others *thought it was worth, on the terms of credit given at the sale, from fifty-five to sixty dollars, and this especially if the cash payment was to be made in Confederate money.

There was evidence that after the first bond fell due Moore, one of the purchasers from Simmons, proposed to N. K. Trout, one of the executors, to pay it, but Trout declined to receive it. He however, showed no money to Trout.

The cause came on to be heard on the 4th day of February 1874, when the court held that the bonds sued on in the cause were not, according to the true understanding and agreement of the parties, to be fulfilled and performed in Confederate States treasury notes, and were not entered into with reference to such notes as a standard of value. And it being agreed that the defendants or some of them were entitled to credits on the notes, the cause was referred to a commissioner to take an account of any payments or set-offs to which they or any of them might be entitled. And the commissioner was also directed to ascertain the order of priority in which the lands purchased by Simmons were subsequently sold to the other defendants.

The commissioner made his report, showing that after allowing the parties their credits, there was due on the 15th of April 1874, on said bonds $4,245.65½, all principal, and also showing the order in which the other defendants had purchased from Simmons. And the cause came on to be heard on the 25th of April 1874, when the court confirmed the report, and made a decree against Samuel Simmons for the said sum of four thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-five and a half cents, with interest and costs. And if the said sum was not paid within ninety days, 670 *the lands were directed to be sold, selling the lands last sold first, and so on. And thereupon John H. Moore and the other purchasers from Simmons, applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

John E. Roller, for the appellants.

Compton, for the appellees.

Moncure, P. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the contract made on the 17th day of October 1862, between N. K. Trout and George Harnsberger, executors of Jacob Harnsberger deceased, and Samuel Simmons, for the sale by the former to the latter of a tract of land situated in Rockingham county, containing about one hundred and forty and one-half acres, at $55 per acre, on the terms of one-fourth in hand and the balance in three equal annual payments, with a vendor's lien to secure them, was made and entered into with reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. That the hand payment of one-fourth of the purchase money was agreed to be paid, and was actually paid, in Confederate States treasury notes, is admitted by all parties. And the only question is, as to the deferred instalments of the purchase money, whether they are payable according to their par amount, in good money, or according to the amount due, on the supposition that the contract was made in reference to the said standard of value, as well in regard to the deferred instalments, as in regard to the hand payment of the purchase money. Our opinion, as has already, in effect, been stated, is, that in regard to both, the contract was made with reference to said standard of value.

671 *Beyond all question, if the sale had been entirely for cash, the whole amount of the purchase money would have been received in Confederate States treasury notes, and the contract in that case would have been made in reference to them as a standard of value. But the difficulty arose from the fact, that the payment of three-fourths of the purchase money was by the contract deferred, and there was danger of the depreciation of the currency before the money became payable, and there was doubt as to what the amount of the depreciation would be. In this state of things, it was difficult, if not impossible, to fix upon a certain medium of payment of the deferred instalments which would do justice to both parties. The purchaser was of course unwilling to agree to pay specie or its equivalent, having contracted in reference to a lower standard of value; and the vendors were no doubt unwilling to agree to receive Confederate States treasury notes at par in payment, without reference to the extent of depreciation at the time of the maturity of the deferred instalments respectively. Had the bonds been, in terms, for the payment of Confederate States treasury notes, they might, and no doubt would, have been construed as contracts for the delivery of a commodity, and would have been soluble by the payment of the amount in such notes, however greatly depreciated they might have been at the time of the maturity of the bonds. All that could be done therefore, in justice to all parties, was to make their contract in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. If they remained of the same value at the maturity of the bonds there would be no difficulty. But if they materially depreciated in value by the time of the maturity of the bonds, then justice could be done by the payment of the value of the same

That the contract was made with reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value, is, we think, very obvious; whether we look at the time at which it was made and the surrounding circumstances, or to the evidence in the case. The sale was made on the 17th day of October, 1862, when the only, or almost only, currency which existed was Confederate States treasury notes, and that had been almost the only currency for a long time before. The 1st day of January 1862, nearly ten months before the date of the sale, was the day prescribed by law as the day between which and the 10th day of April 1865 it was made lawful for either party to a contract to show, by parol or other relevant testimony, what was the true understanding and agreement of the parties thereto, either express or to be implied, in respect to the kind of currency in which the same was to be fulfilled or performed, or with reference to which as a standard of value it was made and entered into. Such was the rarity of making a sale of real estate for anything else than Confederate States treasury notes, or, at all events, for specie or its equivalent; and such was the difficulty, if not impossibility of making such a sale for specie or its equivalent, at or about the time of the sale in this case, to-wit, the 17th of October 1862, that strong and clear evidence of an intention to make such a sale at or about that time ought to be required to prove the fact. A sale at such a time, under such circumstances, and in the absence of any such evidence, ought to be construed to be a sale in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value. So far

673 from there being in this *case strong and clear evidence of such an intention, the great mass and weight of the evidence sustains the contrary. A great number of witnesses were examined in the case, some fifteen or twenty on each side. And most of them examined on the side of the purchaser testify to the fact that the sale was made in reference to Confederate States treasury notes as a standard of value, as well in reference to the deferred instalments of the purchase money as the hand payment. Indeed, as we have seen, in regard to the hand payment, it is admitted on all sides that such was the case, and that the money was paid and received accordingly. While many witnesses testify that the sale was according to the same standard of value in reference to the deferred instalments also, only one or two of them testify to the contrary. The most important of these is certainly one of the executors themselves, N. K. Trout, who, no doubt, and as we happen to know, was in all respects worthy of confidence. He admits, however, that his co-executor, a son of the testator, was the chief actor in making the sale; and he testifies as to what was said and done at a sale which transpired many years before he gave his testimony. This witness testifies that "after the land had been up some time, the impression seemed to prevail that we would not take the then currency (Confederate money); there was a suspension of probably ten to fifteen minutes, and we had a conference with the legatees, and announced that we would take the payment of that day, the down payment, in Confederate money, but would not agree to bind ourselves to take the deferred payments in Confederate money. I recollect with great distinctness, while standing by the auctioneer, being asked by some person in the crowd: 'Will you take the payment which is to be made to-day in Confederate

674 *money?' I responded: 'Yes, we will.' The interrogator then said: 'Will you require the deferred payments in gold or

A contract for the sale of $6,000 U. S. 8 per cent. stock, to be delivered and regularly transferred on a future day, for $6,000 current money in hand paid is not usurious. Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 308, 6 Am. Dec. 518.

Sale of Negotiable Note.—Where the maker of a negotiable note, payable to his own order, endorses it and sells it through a third person at a rate of interest greater than that allowed by law, the transaction is not usurious, provided the purchaser does not know the character of the note, or that it is sold for the benefit of the maker. Hansbrough v. Baylor, 2 Munf. 36; Taylor v. Bruce, Gilm. 42; Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand. 333; Brummel v. Enders, 18 Gratt. 878; Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 439; Town of Danville v. Sutherlin, 20 Gratt. 555; Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 421; Bailey v. Hill, 77 Va. 492.

Brokerage.—Where one contracts to pay another certain sums as brokerage to negotiate a loan for him, and also to pay attorney's fees for making abstracts of title to the property whereon the loan is to be secured, such sums, not being for the loan or forbearance of money, do not constitute usury, though they exceed lawful interest. Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 329.

Credit.—On a contract to secure the price or value of work and labor done or to be done, or of property sold, the contracting parties may agree on one price if cash be paid, or on a higher price if time be given, and this higher price may be either a lump sum, or a per cent. on the cash price. In neither case is the transaction usurious. It is not a loan of money, nor the forbearance of a debt, but simply the contract price of work and labor, or property sold. Evans v. Rice, 96 Va. 50, 30 S. E. Rep. 463; Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130.

But where a person, in response to an application to lend money, furnishes, at exorbitant prices, stocks or other property, instead of the money, or as a condition upon which it is advanced, the transaction is a loan and usurious. Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call 62, 1 Am. Dec. 502; Douglass v. McChesney, 2 Rand. 109; Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 132; Clarkson v. Garland, 1 Leigh 147; Raynolds v. Carter, 12 Leigh 166, 37 Am. Dec. 642; Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. 21.

Where a bank had recovered judgments against two of its debtors, and, upon their application, had given them a long indulgence upon their agreement to give real security for the debts, and to pay the attorney of the bank all the costs of the suits and the commission which the bank had agreed to pay him for collecting and securing the debt, the agreement between the bank and the debtors, and, therefore, the note for the commission to the attorney, were held to be usurious. Toole v. Stephen, 4 Leigh 581.

In Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130, the words of the statute were interpreted as follows: "The legislature uses two words, 'loan,' 'forbearance.' It did not use those two words in the same sense. When the word loan was used, it meant 'a delivery of something to another for his temporary use, which he is to return to its owner at the expiration of his term.' A forbearance is the giving of a day for the return of the loan; or, more properly, signifies the giving a further day when the time originally agreed on is past." In this case, where there was a contract to build certain houses which stipulated that the deferred payments should bear 7½ per cent. interest, it was held that if this provision was intended as a part of the consideration for building the houses and not as a device to obtain more than legal interest for the loan or forbearance of money, it was not usurious.

An extension of time, given to a surety in a deed of trust to secure a debt, in consideration of his executing a new deed of trust, is a "loan of money" within the meaning of the statute. Hopkins v. Koonce, 6 Gratt. 387.

Where there is no loan, or forbearance to collect an existing debt, there can be no usury. Myers v. Williams, 85 Va. 621, 8 S. E. Rep. 483.

Profits.—An agreement to set the profits of the mortgaged subject against the interest of the money lent is usurious, if they exceed the legal rate of interest. Robertson v. Campbell, 2 Call 431.

2. A Contract or Assurance for a Greater Rate Than Is Allowed by Law.—It is settled in Virginia that taking the discount in advance, upon discounting a note at bank, is not usurious; and that including the day of payment of the first note in the second, whereby the bank receives under each note interest for the same date, is not usury. Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 132; Crump v. Nicholas, 5 Leigh 251; State Bank of N. C. v. Cowan, 8 Leigh 238; Parker v. Cousins, 2 Gratt. 372, 44 Am. Dec. 388; Bank v. Mandeville, Fed. Cas. No. 850, 1 Cranch. C. C. 52. See statutory provisions allowing interest to be taken in advance by banks, etc., Va. Code, 1887, §§ 2819, 2820. See also, 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 347; Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373.

Interest paid on a bond in advance for three years, this being stated in the bond, but paid in land at a price fixed in reference to the annual interest for three years, is not usurious, and the plaintiff may prove the facts at the trial. Porterfield v. Colner, 1 Gratt. 55.

Nor is it usurious, upon a settlement of accounts, to take a bond or note for the balance due, including interest, and to receive interest on such bond or note. Brown v. Brent, 1 H. & M. 4.

After Maturity.—A bond is not void for usury where it provides for usurious interest only after maturity. Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 676, 22 S. E. Rep. 494.

Interest upon Interest.—An agreement to pay interest upon interest is valid, if made after the interest, which is to bear interest, has become due. Stansbury v. Stansbury, 24 W. Va. 634; Craig v. McCulloch, 20 W. Va. 154; Genin v. Ingersoll, 11 W. Va. 549; Pindall v. Bank of Marietta, 10 Leigh 481; Childers v. Deane, 4 Rand. 406; Fultz v. Davis, 26 Gratt. 903.

Where Principal is at Risk.—"If the principal, or any considerable part, be put in risk, it is not usury; because the excess in the premium is the consideration for that risk." PENDLETON, P., in Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call 54, 1 Am. Dec. 502. Cited with approval in Steptoe v. Harvey, 7 Leigh 522; Smith v. Nicholas, 8 Leigh 350; State Bank of N. C. v. Cowan, 8 Leigh 248; Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. 43; Boulware v. Newton, 18 Gratt. 719; Lynchburg v. Norvell, 20 Gratt. 610; Hilb v. Peyton, 21 Gratt. 386.

It was held in Steptoe v. Harvey, 7 Leigh 522, that a contract to lend 142 shares of stock, to be afterwards repaid with 172 shares of the same stock, was not usurious, since, by a fall in the market price, the lender might have received less than the value of his original shares.

But where the principal debt is not in hazard, or the contingency of its loss is slight, so that there is little or no risk, and the contract is, in substance, a loan or forbearance of money at a greater rate of interest than the law prescribes, it is usury. There are, however, many contracts of hazard, which are recognized by the law as salutary and convenient, such as marine risks, insurances, etc., where the borrowing and lending of money is not the real object of the parties, and which therefore do not come within the statute. Watkins v. Taylor, 2 Munf. 424; Smith v. Nicholas, 8 Leigh 330; Boulware v. Newton, 18 Gratt. 708.

Excess Constituting Part of Purchase Money.—Where the excess bona fide constitutes part of the contract price or purchase money, it is not usury. Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377; Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 180; Evans v. Rice, 96 Va. 50, 30 S. E. Rep. 463; Swayne v. Riddle, 37 W. Va. 291, 16 S. E. Rep. 512; Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 10 S. E. Rep. 375; Craig v. McCulloch, 20 W. Va. 148.

Excess in Nature of a Penalty.—Nor is it usury where the excess over the legal rate is in the nature of a penalty from which the debtor may relieve himself by punctual payment of the debt. Groves v. Graves, 1 Wash. 1; Winslow v. Dawson, 1 Wash. 118; Call v. Scott, 4 Call 402; Pollard v. Baylor, 6 Munf. 433; Campbell v. Shields, 6 Leigh 517; Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 676, 22 S. E. Rep. 494.

Miscalculation.—Nor where the excess is bona fide the result of a miscalculation resulting from the use of tables such as Rowlett's Tables. Parker v. Cousins, 2 Gratt. 372, 44 Am. Dec. 388; Stuart v. Livesay, 4 W. Va. 45.

Expenses and Charges.—Nor where the excess is contracted for in good faith to cover reasonable expenses and charges. Jones v. Hubbard, 6 Call 211; Campbell v. Shields, 6 Leigh 517; Long v. Israel, 9 Leigh 556; Myers v. Williams, 85 Va. 621, 8 S. E. Rep. 483.

c. Statutory Provisions as to Rate.—The rate of interest in Virginia, prior to May 1, 1797, was regulated by the statute of 12 Anne, c. 16. This statute fixed the rate at 5 per cent. per annum and provided that any contract or assurance for a greater rate should be void as to both principal and interest. The rate was increased to six per cent. by act of November 23, 1796 (2 Stats. at Large, N. S., 27), with the same provision as to forfeiture of principal and interest where this rate was exceeded. There was no change in the rate of interest from this time until the act of March 16th, 1870 (Acts 1869-70, p. 19, ch. 19). By this act, six per cent. was retained as the legal rate, in the absence of contract; but it was made lawful to receive any rate not exceeding twelve per cent. per annum, upon which the parties might agree. This statute, also, contained the provision rendering contracts for a greater rate void as to both principal and interest. By act of 1872-73, the maximum rate for which it was lawful to contract was reduced to eight per cent. But the legal rate, in the absence of contract was still six per cent. It was provided also, that all contracts and assurances for a greater rate should be void as to the interest in excess of six per cent. (Acts 1872-73, ch. 336, p. 329; Va. Code 1873, ch. 137, §§ 4, 5.) By act of 1873-74, the present provision as to interest was enacted, providing that the rate should, in no case, exceed six per cent. per annum, and that "all contracts and assurances made, directly or indirectly, for the loan or forbearance of money or other thing, at a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the preceding section (six per cent.), shall be deemed to be for an illegal consideration as to the excess beyond the principal amount so loaned or forborne." Va. Code 1887, sec. 2818.

d. Change in Statute—Where Higher Rate Lawfully Contracted for.—Where a person entered into a contract, which was legal at the time, to pay a certain rate of interest on a bond, he must pay such interest not only up to the maturity of the bond but after maturity till paid, notwithstanding a subsequent law providing for a lower rate. Cecil v. Hicks, 29 Gratt. 1, 26 Am. Rep. 391. The court will compel the payment of interest at such agreed rate, though the debtor's lands are placed in a receiver's hands at the creditor's instance. Strayer v. Long, 88 Va. 715, 3 S. E. Rep. 372. The same rule holds where the contract for a higher rate is lawful because not within the terms of the statute which declares what transactions shall be deemed usurious. Evans v. Rice, 96 Va. 50, 30 S. E. Rep. 463. A debt to be usurious must be so in the beginning. It cannot be made so, by subsequent events. Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 678, 22 S. E. Rep. 494.

Such higher or conventional rate continues, therefore, after maturity till payment, where the excess over the legal rate is in the nature of a penalty from which the debtor may relieve himself by punctual payment of the debt. Pollard v. Baylor, 6 Munf. 433; Campbell v. Shields, 6 Leigh 517; Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 676, 22 S. E. Rep. 494, so where the excess constitutes part of the contract price or purchase money, or for any other reason does not fall within the statute of usury. See Kraker v. Shields, 20 Gratt. 377; Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 180; Evans v. Rice, 96 Va. 50, 30 S. E. Rep. 463.

Where an annuity was bequeathed in 1791, while the legal rate of interest was only five per cent., though the annuity fell in arrear after interest was raised to six per cent. yet only five per cent. should be allowed on such arrears. Thorntons v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh 209.

Though the statute of usury, at the date of the contract, declares it to be null, yet if, at the date of the decree, the statute has been amended and only avoids the contract as to the interest, the decree should be for the principal loaned, with interest from the date of the decree. White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597; Bain v. Savage, 76 Va. 904; Mosby v. Ins. Co., 31 Gratt. 629; Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 509.

e. Usury Purged by Change of Parties.—The usury is purged by a change of parties in a case where a bond executed by three persons for a loan of money at usurious interest is subsequently superseded by another bond, for the same amount, principal and interest, which new bond is signed by two persons as principals, who were strangers to the first bond, and by one of the former obligors, as surety. Drake v. Chandler, 18 Gratt. 909, 98 Am. Dec. 762; Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 458.

Although every subsequent security, however remote or however often removed, given for a note originally usurious, is void, a new note, made by different parties, is purged of the usury, unless the transaction was merely an attempt to avoid the statute. Vaught v. Rider, 83 Va. 659, 3 S. E. Rep. 293; Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 464; Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 701; Martin v. Hall, 9 Gratt. 8; Law v. Sutherland, 5 Gratt. 357. Nor will the taint of usury be relieved where there is in fact the same principal through all the transactions. Mathews v. Trader's Bank (Va.), 27 S. E. Rep. 609.

Code 1873, ch. 137, § 11 does not apply in favor of a mortgagee where a successful charge of usury has been made against a prior mortgagee in a suit brought against them both and such usury has been purged by the court. Christian v. Worsham, 78 Va. 100.

Where a stranger assumes to pay a usurious debt of another, the intervention of this stranger purges the usury, and he cannot set it up against his obligation to pay. Smith v. McMillan, 46 W. Va. 577, 88 S. E. Rep. 288.

f. Usury in Building and Loan Association Contracts.

—In ascertaining the amount to be decreed against the borrowing member of a building fund association whose contract of borrowing has been declared usurious, but who has made no payment within twelve months before suit, a balance should be struck at the date of his last payment, and no charge thereafter made for interest, dues, or fines. He should be credited by his interest payments and the withdrawal value of his stock, and a decree should be pronounced for the balance due, with interest from the date of the decree. Crabtree v. Old Dominion Building & Loan Ass'n, 95 Va. 671, 64 Am. St. Rep. 818, 4 Va. Law Reg. 12, 29 S. E. Rep. 741.

A corporation created by a circuit or corporation court, under the provisions of sec. 1145 of the Code, cannot charge more than the legal rate of interest for the loan or forbearance of money. The legislature alone can grant this power. Crabtree v. Old Dominion Building & Loan Ass'n, 95 Va. 670, 64 Am. St. Rep. 818, 4 Va. Law Reg. 12, 29 S. E. Rep. 741.

Under the Tennessee law, which controls this case, building associations are authorized to lend money at the legal rate, and to take such additional premium as may be bid by the borrower, hence such premium does not render the contract usurious and illegal where the premium paid is the result of open and competitive bidding. Nor is the contract rendered usurious by the fact that the payment of interest and premium for a part of the time is taken in advance. Counselman v. Holston Nat. Building & Loan Association, 97 Va. 261, 83 S. E. Rep. 603.

A New York corporation doing business in Virginia and elsewhere, and entering into contracts within its chartered powers which are valid according to the laws of New York, though usurious according to the laws of Virginia, cannot be held to be seeking to evade the usury laws of Virginia simply because it requires its contracts to be performed in the state of New York. This cannot be said to be a mere device to evade the usury laws of Virginia. Ware v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 680, 64 Am. St. Rep. 826, 29 S. E. Rep. 744.

g. Usury in Negotiable Paper.—Since the passage of the act now embodied in section 2818 of the Code, which declares that usurious contracts shall be deemed to be for an illegal consideration, as to the excess beyond the principal sum loaned or forborne, the plea of usury cannot be sustained in an action on negotiable paper brought by a bona fide holder for value, who acquired the same before maturity in due course of trade. The only effect of such plea is to cast the burden of proof on the plaintiff to show that he is such holder; when he has shown this he is entitled to recover. Lynchburg Nat'l Bank v. Scott, 91 Va. 652, 22 S. E. Rep. 487. See extensive note to this case by Prof. Lile, 1 Va. Law Reg. 363.

An indorser who has knowledge of the usury and voluntarily pays it cannot afterwards recover it of his principal, if the latter relies on the plea of usury. Wallace v. Lipps (W. Va.), 34 S. E. Rep. 731.

In an action of debt by the holder of a negotiable note, against the maker and four endorsers, upon the plea of usury by the endorsers, the jury found that the note was endorsed by the first three endorsers, for the accommodation of the maker, and was sold by him to the fourth endorser, at a usurious rate of interest; who afterwards and before it became due, endorsed it to the holder for value. Upon this verdict the court should render a judgment in favor of the maker and the first three endorsers, and against the fourth endorser, under Code, ch. 177, § 19, p. 783; Moffett v. Bickle, 21 Gratt. 280.

i. In General.—In the case of Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. Rep. 857, KERR, P., in his review of the statute law and Virginia decisions upon the subject of usury says, "In England up to a comparatively recent period the statutes against usury were very radical in their character, and were rigidly enforced. Under their operation the whole of the debt, principal and interest, was avoided at law, but where a borrower came into a court of equity, seeking relief from an usurious transaction, that court, proceeding upon the principle that he who asks equity must do equity, required him, as a condition to the enjoyment of the relief which he prayed, to pay his creditor principal and legal interest, and he was only permitted to recover back the usurious gain or excess. See Browning v. Morris, 2 Cowper 792; Smith v. Bromley, 2 Doug. 697; and note to Jones v. Barkley, in same report.

"This doctrine of the English chancery was adopted in this state, but at an early period it was so far modified that the borrower who appealed to a court of equity for relief from an outstanding usurious transaction was required only to pay the principal debt, without interest. This principle appears in the Code of 1819, p. 374, sec. 2, which declares that 'Any borrower of money, &c., may exhibit a bill in chancery against the lender, and compel him to discover, upon oath, the money or thing really lent, and all bargains, contracts or shifts, which shall have passed between them, relative to such loan, or to the repayment thereof, and the interest or consideration for the same; and if thereupon it shall appear that more than the lawful interest was reserved, the lender shall be obliged to accept his principal money, without any interest or other consideration, and pay costs, but shall be discharged from all other penalties of this act.

"It has constituted a part of our statute law, in substantially the same form, since 1786, and it may be from an earlier period, and is continued in our present Code, without material variation as section 2822."

Under this section it was held, in Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. 415, that in all cases where a party applies to a court of equity for relief against a usurious contract, whether he alleges in his bill that he is able to prove the usury without the defendant's confession, or not, he can only be relieved upon payment of the principal without interest.

From our earliest history down to 1872, nothing could be recovered at law, upon proof of usury, but the whole contract, principal and interest was declared void. During all this period, there was a constant struggle on the part of the courts to harmonize the administration of the law with their idea of justice. The law against usury was virtually repealed whenever the debtor came into a court of equity for assistance. As a result of this struggle, the legislature has changed the penalty of the law, which imposed a forfeiture of the principal and interest, and now provides that usurious contracts "shall be deemed to be for an illegal consideration as to the excess beyond the principal amount so loaned or forborne." For the first time in the his-story of our usury laws, it is now possible to bring into harmony the relief afforded in courts of law and equity. Under the present statute, whether the suit be prosecuted at law or in equity, if usury be established, the lender can only recover the principal sum loaned or forborne. Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. Rep. 857; Greer v. Hale, 95 Va. 583, 23 S. E. Rep. 873.

2. Where Debt Secured by Usurious Deed of Trust—Marks v. Morris*.—In Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, 5 Am. Dec. 481, it was held that a borrower of money at usurious interest, secured by deed of trust containing power of sale, might come into a court of equity and have such sale enjoined until the creditor should, by some proper proceeding, establish the validity of his contract; in which case the injunction was to be dissolved, otherwise, perpetuated. The reason for this decision was that such borrower had no opportunity to make defense in any tribunal; and, though he had tied his own hands, he was considered as not a free agent, but rather as the slave of the lender and, therefore, entitled to the same relief as if the deed had not been made. This decision has given rise to much controversy. It was followed in McPherrin v. King, 1 Rand. 172; Martin v. Lindsay, 1 Leigh 498; Fitzhugh v. Gordon, 2 Leigh 626; approved in Turpin v. Povall, 8 Leigh 98; distinguished in Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 719; Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. 415; and finally overruled in Bank of Washington v. Arthur, 3 Gratt. 173; Bell v. Calhoun, 8 Gratt. 22.

In the Code of 1849, ch. 141, sec. 10, the following provision appears: "Upon a bill, requiring no discovery of the defendant, but praying an injunction to prevent the sale of property conveyed to secure the repayment of a sum of money or other thing borrowed at usurious interest, the court shall cause an issue to be made and tried at its bar by a jury, whether or no the transaction be usurious; on the trial of such issue, neither the bill nor the answer shall be given in evidence. If the jury find the transaction usurious, then the same relief shall be given, as if the party claiming under the conveyance had resorted to the court to make his claim available. But the court may grant new trials as in other cases."

In Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 71 Gratt. 21, this section was construed as embodying the principle of Marks v. Morris (supra), and that the measure of relief, as in that case, extended to the whole debt and interest tainted by the usury. See also, Turner v. Turner, 80 Va. 379.

In Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 246, it was held that this section applied only to bills to prevent the sale of property conveyed by a deed of trust to secure a usurious debt.

This provision was continued as a part of our statute law until the Code of 1887, from which it was omitted, as the same remedy could now be given under the statute both at law and in equity, and there was no longer any occasion for its continuance. See opinion of LACY, J., in Edmunds v. Bruce, 88 Va. 1097, 14 S. E. Rep. 840. "The controversy, therefore, which was waged over Marks v. Morris has ceased to be of any practical value." See opinion of KIRK, P., in Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 455, 23 S. E. Rep. 857.

In Bank of Washington v. Arthur, 3 Gratt. 173, it was held that although the bond and deed of trust be usurious and void, yet if part of the consideration was a pre-existing valid debt, which continues to be a valid debt, the decree should be for the principal of such pre-existing debt, with interest thereon from the time it was entitled to bear interest. See also, White v. Freeman, 79 Va. 597; Rankin v. Rankin, 1 Gratt. 158.

3. Where Whole Debt with Interest Has Been Paid—Spengler v. Snapp*.—The provision of Va. Code of 1819, p. 374, sec. 8, re-enacted as sec. 7, ch. 142 of the Code of 1849, and appearing as section 2822 of the Code of 1887, that a borrower who appeals to a court of equity for relief from an outstanding usurious transaction is required to pay only the principal debt, without interest, does not apply where the usurious loan has already been paid. So it was held in Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 478, where the whole debt had been paid, that a borrower who comes into a court of equity for relief is entitled to recover only the excess above the principal and legal interest, with interest on such excess; for, in order to be relieved from a usurious contract, the borrower must come with clean hands, and he who asks equity must do equity by paying the principal debt with legal interest thereon. "It would seem to follow as an inevitable consequence," says the court in Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, "that, having discharged his obligation, he could, when coming into a court of equity for relief, recover back only the excess over and above the principal and legal interest. He could certainly not successfully invoke the aid of a court to recover more than the court would have permitted him to retain." In support of this principle, that only the excess above the principal and legal interest with interest on such excess can be recovered back, see Clarkson v. Garland, 1 Leigh 162; Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 478; Moseley v. Brown, 76 Va. 419; Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. Rep. 857. It has been adopted as a part of our statute law and appears as sec. 2823 of the Va. Code of 1887, but the relief is there limited to one year. See Exchange, etc., Bank v. Fugate, 98 Va. 821, 23 S. E. Rep. 884. Excess of interest over the legal rate may be recovered back in an action of assumpsit. Norvell v. Hedrick, 21 W. Va. 523.

4. Payments Expressly Applied to Interest—Munford v. McVeigh*.—The case of Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. Rep. 857, 1 Va. Law Reg. 734, overruling Meem v. Dulaney, 88 Va. 674, 14 S. E. Rep. 863, and Edmunds v. Bruce, 88 Va. 1007, 14 S. E. Rep. 840, established the rule that payments upon a usurious contract, expressly applied to the interest, fall within the rule of Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 478, as limited by sec. 2823 of Va. Code of 1887, which provides that "if an excess beyond the lawful interest be paid in any case, the person paying the same may, in a suit brought within one year thereafter, recover it from the person with whom the contract was made, or to whom the assurance was given." Where payments, therefore, have been made upon a debt upon which a greater rate of interest than that allowed by law is reserved in the contract, or received in order to secure the forbearance of the lender, and the borrower himself applies the payment to the interest, or the lender so applies it with the assent of the borrower, the appropriation so made will not be disturbed, unless within one year thereafter a suit be instituted by the borrower for its recovery, or a suit be brought by the lender within that period, in which case the borrower may set it off against the demand for which he is sued.

In this case, Munford v. McVeigh (supra), the borrower had made payments which were expressly applied to the usurious interest, but which in all did not amount to more than legal interest. It was held that these payments should not be credited upon the principal, but that the judgment should be for the principal sum due with interest from the date of the decree. The decision in Munford v. McVeigh (supra) was approved in Crabtree v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 670, 29 S. E. Rep. 741. See also, Moore v. Johnson, 34 W. Va. 672, 12 S. E. Rep. 918.

5. Where No Application of Payments Made.—Where payments have been made upon a usurious contract, which are merely credited on the bond, and not applied specially, the borrower is entitled to have such payments deducted from the principal sum loaned or forborne. Turner v. Turner, 80 Va. 379; Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 10 S. E. Rep. 375; Norvell v. Hedrick, 21 W. Va. 523.

Under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5197, 5198, usurious interest which has been actually paid to a national bank on discounting and renewing a series of notes, cannot in an action by the bank on the last of them be applied in satisfaction of the principal sum due. Bank v. Boylen, 26 W. Va. 556.

6. Where Usury in Contract Itself.—Where there is usury in the contract as distinguished from the reservation of a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law, as where the contract is expressed to be for a greater sum than actually loaned or forborne, in a suit either by the lender or borrower, at law or in equity, it is the duty of the court, usury being established, to eliminate the usurious principal and apply all unappropriated payments in satisfaction of the principal sum justly due, leaving undisturbed such payments as the parties have themselves applied. Upon the principal so ascertained, interest should be allowed at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment or decree. See Munford v. McVeigh, 92 Va. 446, 23 S. E. Rep. 857; King v. Buck, 80 Gratt. 828.

7. Relief against Judgments for.—Relief against a judgment at law on the ground of usury will not be granted unless the matter is put directly in issue. Nor will relief be granted against a judgment by default unless good cause be shown for not defending at law. Brown v. Toell, 5 Rand. 543, 16 Am. Dec. 759. See also, Rankin v. Rankin, 1 Gratt. 151; Martin v. Hall, 9 Gratt. 10; Terry v. Dickinson, 75 Va. 478.

Although the statute now provides that usurious contracts shall be deemed to be for an illegal consideration, instead of void, as formerly, a judgment by default will be set aside for usury. Greer v. Hale, 95 Va. 533, 28 S. E. Rep. 873.

1. Construction.—The question whether or not a contract is usurious is to be decided with reference to the time when it was entered into. Southall v. Farish, 85 Va. 403, 7 S. E. Rep. 534; Pollard v. Baylor, 6 Munf. 433.

The statute, Sess. Acts 1844, p. 54, while in terms applicable to a plea, is also applicable to a replication to a plea. Hope v. Smith, 10 Gratt. 221.

Retroactive.—The act of March 22, 1873, Code of 1873, ch. 57, § 36, p. 544, in reference to the defence of usury by corporations, is retroactive in its operation, and applies to contracts made by a corporation before the passage of the act; and this is true though suit has been brought upon such contract before its passage. And the act is not in violation of the constitution of the United States, or of that of Virginia. Town of Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 663.

Right of Judgment Creditor.—Under Va. Code, sec. 2824, which provides that any judgment creditor who apprehends that he is in danger by reason of usurious dealings on the part of his debtor may file a bill against the party with whom the dealings were had, and compel him to discover all such dealings, and that if more than legal interest has been received such excess shall be applied on the plaintiff's demand, it was held that the judgment creditor first filing his bill has the superior lien on the amount recovered. Ryan v. Krise, 89 Va. 728, 17 S. E. Rep. 128; Clark v. Krise, 89 Va. 739, 17 S. E. Rep. 132.

Where Two or More Bills Are Filed—Priority.—When two or more bills are filed under Va. Code, sec. 2821, the claim of the party first filing his bill takes priority and must be paid first. Clark v. Krise, 89 Va. 728, 17 S. E. Rep. 132. This section was repealed Jan. 1, 1894. Acts 1893-'94, p. 76.

J. Evidence.

1. In General.—The court will never presume a contract to be usurious, unless the usury be proved. M'Guire v. Parker, 1 Wash. 368. The party who pleads usury must prove it. Harnsbarger v. Kinney, 6 Gratt. 287.

Usury is a quasi penal offence and must be strictly proved. Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 676, 22 S. E. Rep. 494. It must be established by a clear and satisfactory preponderance of evidence. Evans v. Riet, 9 Va. 50, 30 S. E. Rep. 463; Ware v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 680, 29 S. E. Rep. 744. To convict a person of usury, the usury must be proved beyond a rational doubt to the contrary. Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. 21; Kelley v. Lewis, 4 W. Va. 456. Usury may be given in evidence under the plea of non-assumpsit. Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373.

2. Answer as Evidence.—It was formerly provided, Va. Code 1873, ch. 137, sec. 12, that upon a bill requiring no discovery but praying an injunction to prevent the sale of property conveyed to secure repayment of money or other thing loaned at a usurious rate, the court should cause an issue to be made and tried at its bar by a jury as to whether the transaction was usurious, and on the trial of such issue neither the bill nor the answer could be given in evidence. "This provision of the statute," says Mr. Barton in his work on Chancery Practice, "was, however, omitted from the Code of 1887. It was doubtless passed to meet the case of Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. 719, wherein it had been held that an answer in such a case would have the like weight as evidence with an answer in any other case in chancery; and it was also designed to adopt the principles of the case of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, which had been overruled by the case of the Bank of Washington v. Arthur, 3 Gratt. 173, and Bell v. Calhoun, 8 Gratt. 22, and it therefore permits such a bill to be filed against the representative of the lender after his death." 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. (2d Ed.) 433. See also, Gilliam v. Clay, 3 Leigh 590; Powell v. Manson, 22 Gratt. 190.

Where the debtor calls on the creditor to answer under oath and discover usury, the answer of the creditor under oath, when responsive to the bill, must be accepted as true, in the absence of other evidence sufficient to overcome such answer. Ward v. Cornett, 91 Va. 676, 22 S. E. Rep. 494.

k. Power of Legislature over Usury Laws.—It is within the power of the legislature to designate what transactions shall be subject to, and what shall be exempt from the laws of usury. It may take away the defense of usury and declare valid contracts which were usurious at the time they were entered into, or it may remove a disability to contract which it had previously imposed. Bosang v. Building Ass'n, 96 Va. 119, 30 S. E. Rep. 440; Smoot v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 686, 29 S. E. Rep. 746; Mosby v. Ins. Co., 31 Gratt. 629. See also, Town of Danville

v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 2, 18 Am. Rep. 663; White v. Building Ass'n, 22 Gratt. 233.

I. What Law Governs.—A contract made in one state, but to be performed in another, is, as a general rule, governed by the law of the place of performance; and, if the rate of interest allowed by the latter is higher than that of the place of contract, the parties may stipulate for the higher rate without incurring the penalties of usury. Building Ass'n v. Tinsley, 96 Va. 322, 31 S. E. Rep. 508; Ware v. Building Ass'n, 95 Va. 680, 29 S. E. Rep. 744; Nickels v. Building Ass'n, 93 Va. 380, 25 S. E. Rep. 8; Nat., etc., Ass'n v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706, 22 S. E. Rep. 521; Backhouse v. Selden, 29 Gratt. 581; Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47.

B. a resident of Virginia, took to Maryland a negotiable note, blank as to date and place of payment, but signed by himself and endorsed by other residents of Virginia. He inserted a proper date and place of payment in Maryland and negotiated the note at a rate usurious in both states. This note was renewed with the same parties and usuriously discounted in Maryland. A renewal note, made, endorsed and payable in Virginia, was given, by the same parties, for the second note. Under the Virginia law at the time, usury avoided the whole contract, while in Maryland it avoided only the excess over the legal interest. It was held, (1) that the taking of the last note was not a novation of the previously existing debt; but that the contract was still a Maryland one, to be governed by the law of Maryland; (2) that the last note was a continuation of the old debt made with reference to the laws of Maryland, and as it was not void there, it could not be avoided in Virginia. Bowman v. Miller, 25 Gratt. 331, 18 Am. Rep. 686.

The laws which subsist at the time and place of the making of a contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of the contract and the legislature has no power to make any law which will impair the obligation of such contract. Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. 207.

The law in force when the verdict was rendered determines the interest to be allowed on the sum found by the verdict, and not the law in force at the rendition of the judgment, unless it clearly appears that the later law is intended to operate retrospectively. Murdock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 33 W. Va. 407, 10 S. E. Rep. 777.

II. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

a. Who May Plead Usury.—Any defendant may plead in general terms that the contract or assurance on which the action is brought was for a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law. Va. Code 1887, § 2821; Code W. Va., ch. 96, § 6. Under this plea the defendant may give in evidence any fact which shows or tends to show that such contract or assurance was for a usurious consideration; and when no plea is made, if the contract or assurance is in writing and provides for usurious interest, judgment shall be rendered for the principal sum only. Turner v. Turner, 80 Va. 379; King v. Buck, 30 Gratt. 323. Usury may be given in evidence under the plea of non-assumpsit. Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373.

The defence of usury is a privilege which is personal to the debtor. If he declines to avail himself of it, no stranger will be allowed to do so. Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 478; Crenshaw v. Clark, 5 Leigh 65; Hope v. Smith, 10 Gratt. 221; Christian v. Worsham, 73 Va. 100; Dickerson v. Bankers', etc., Co., 93 Va. 498; 25 S. E. Rep. 548; Lee v. Feamster, 21 W. Va. 108; Bar- bour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410, 7 S. E. Rep. 1; Moore v. Johnson, 34 W. Va. 672, 12 S. E. Rep. 918; Smith v. McMillan, 46 W. Va. 577, 33 S. E. Rep. 283.

It is provided by statute in Virginia, Code 1887, sec. 2825, that corporations shall not be allowed to plead usury. This statute is retroactive in its effect and applies to contracts made by corporations before the passage of the act. Town of Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 663.

b. Form of Plea.—For form of plea of usury to debt on bond, see Bart. Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 539; 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) pt. 2, p. 1749.

c. What Plea Must Set Out.—Where usury is relied upon by a defendant in equity to defeat the plaintiff's whole claim, the facts constituting the usury must be distinctly alleged, and clearly proved according to the allegation; but it is not necessary to allege them with the formal strictness of a plea of usury at law. Smith v. Nicholas, etc., 8 Leigh 330.

A plea of usury of a foreign state must set out the law of usury of that state. Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47; Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4.

If to a bill brought to foreclose a mortgage, the defendant pleads usury, and the bill itself on its face, and the documents filed with it, present a case of usury, such as is pleaded, it is not necessary for the defendant to take depositions to support his plea. His adversary's bill supports his plea. Lane v. Ellzey, 6 Rand. 661.

d. When Plea May Be Received.—The plea of the "statute against usury" ought to be received in a court of equity, at any time before the decree is final; if there be strong reasons, from the statement in the bill, for believing that the matter of such plea may be true. Ellzey v. Lane, 4 Munf. 66.

e. Answer.—The defense of usury may be set up by answer, and although the averments in such answer be very informal, yet, if taken in connection with the charge in the bill, they make the defense of usury in substance, the answer is good. Smith v. Nicholas, 8 Leigh 330; Kelley v. Lewis, 4 W. Va. 456.

Prior to the present statute, Va. Code 1887, sec. 2822, Code W. Va., ch. 96, sec. 7, providing that the borrower may compel a discovery, but the lender shall only recover the principal due, without interest, the rule was that when the borrower alleged usury in his bill and called for a discovery the lender might demur to the bill and refuse to answer unless the plaintiff waived the penalty and offered to pay the principal with legal interest. The principle of this rule was that a party cannot be compelled to subject himself to penalties and forfeitures by his answer. Belton v. Apperson, 26 Gratt. 214.

Where the answer explicitly denies the allegations of the bill as to usury, and there is no competent evidence to prove it, an injunction obtained to the judgment at law should be dissolved, and, if the cause is ready for a hearing, the bill should be dismissed. Wise v. Lamb, 9 Gratt. 294. See also, Sneed v. Smith, 1 Patt. & H. 46.

As to the effect of an answer as evidence, see ante, "Answer as Evidence."

f. Demurrer.—Where the contract is not usurious on its face, the question of usury cannot be raised by a demurrer to the bill setting out the contract. Brakeley v. Tuttle, 3 W. Va. 86.

It is error to dismiss a bill filed under Va. Code, § 2822, on the ground that the plaintiff has an ample remedy at law. Ruffin v. Commercial Bank, 90 Va. 708, 19 S. E. Rep. 790.

g. Continuance.—A continuance ought not to be granted at law, on the ground that the party, a few days before that appointed for the trial, filed a bill in equity for a discovery of usury, as auxiliary to his defense at law; unless he make affidavit, that the usury therein charged, had recently come to his knowledge. Ross v. Norvell, 3 Munf. 170.

h. New Trial.—Where a bill to set aside a judgment on the ground of usury simply states that the debt was usurious, without stating the usurious interest taken, and the defendant denies the usury, and the charge of usury is not sustained by competent evidence, the court will not, after long delay, set aside the judgment and grant a new trial. Terry v. Dickinson, 75 Va. 475.

705 **Russell v. Randolph & als.*

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Deeds—Unrecorded.—In April 1868 R conveyed land with general warranty to C, and C conveyed it in trust to secure four bonds for the purchase money. The trust deed was recorded, but the deed to C was not, until March 1869. One of the bonds was paid by C. R assigned the other three to W, and B and J, J being the last assignee. In July 1868 D recovered a judgment against R, and afterwards filed his bill to subject a small tract of land of R to satisfy it. In May 1873 C was declared a bankrupt, and upon petition by J the bankrupt court had C's land sold, and fixed the priorities of the creditors, making D the first and J the last, the proceeds of the land not being sufficient to pay all; but directing the fund should be retained until it was ascertained how much D would get from the proceeds of the other tract.

Homestead Exemptions.—In March 1871 R executed a declaration of homestead, which embraced all his personal property; and on the 10th of August 1871 he conveyed this property to P in trust for his wife and children. In January 1874 J having purchased D's judgment, he filed a bill against R and his wife and children and P, in a state court, to subject this personal property to satisfy this judgment; and in April 1874 there was a decree in the bankrupt court, by which the proceeds of C's land was distributed among the assignees of his bonds, it not being enough to satisfy J. And it being suggested to the court, that beside the small tract of land aforesaid, there was personal property of R, which might be subjected to pay the said judgment, which was sufficient for that purpose, it was decreed that no part of the proceeds of C's land should be applied to pay the judgment of D. HELD:

1. Same—Effect as against a Prior Judgment Creditor.—The declaration of homestead by R, having been after D had recovered his judgment, was null and void as to D's debt.

2. Deeds—Consideration Not Valuable—Effect as to Judgment Creditors.—The deed of R to P being not upon consideration deemed valuable in law, having been made after the judgment, was also null and void as to D's debt.

706 *3. Same—Impeachment by Creditor.—Under § 2, ch. 179, of the Code of 1860, D, without having sued out execution at law, might impeach by a suit in equity the deed of homestead and the deed of trust.

*Homestead Exemptions—As against Prior Judgment Creditors.—See V. C., § 3642; Rose v. Sharpless, 33 Gratt. 153; Holt v. Williams, 13 W. Va. 704; 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 912.

4. Decree of Bankrupt Court.—The decree of the bankrupt court directing, that D should not receive any of the proceeds of the sales of C's land until he had exhausted the other land of R, did not satisfy D's judgment.

5. Same—Finality.—The decree of the bankrupt court of April 1874 was a final decree, and obligatory on all other courts; and it was a proper decree, as the judgment of D was a debt of R and not of C, and R's property should be first applied to its payment.

6. Substitution—Warranty.—C's land being only liable to satisfy D's judgment because of his failure to have his deed recorded, if he had paid that judgment, or if it had been paid out of the proceeds of his land, he would have been substituted to all the rights and remedies of D against R; and he would also have had a remedy against R upon the warranty in R's deed.

7. Assignee—Equities—Rights against Assignor.—J being the assignee of R of one of the bonds given for the purchase money of the land, and thus a creditor of C, and having a lien on the land to secure the bond, he has all the equities of C against R, and also an equity against R as assignor of the bond.

8. Marshaling.*—As holder of the bond J had but one fund upon which he can rely for payment, whilst D has two funds for the satisfaction of his judgment, the land and the personal property embraced in the deed of homestead and deed of trust. And a court of equity will marshal the assets, and compel D to exhaust the fund upon which J had no claim, that J may appropriate the only fund within his reach.

9. Substitution.—D is the only person who can complain of being required to resort to R's personal estate to the relief of the land fund, and that only upon showing that such a course would operate to his prejudice. And if D did show this, J might satisfy his judgment and stand in his place. In this case he has done better by taking an assignment of the judgment.

10. Same.—Clothed with the rights and remedies of D, J may properly proceed against the property of R to satisfy R's debt, and against the land of C, to satisfy the debt chargeable upon it.

707 *By deed bearing date the 18th day of April, 1868, Beverly Randolph and his wife, in consideration of the sum of $7,542.50, conveyed, with general warranty, to J. M. Cobb, a tract of land in the county of Clarke. And by deed of the same date Cobb and wife conveyed the same land to D. H. McGuire, to secure the payment of several sums of money, each for the sum of $1,385.62½, with interest payable annually from the 1st of March, 1868, and due respectively on the 1st of September in the years 1869, 1870, 1871 and 1872. Both of these deeds were acknowledged before the same justices of the peace on the 6th day of July 1868, and the deed of trust was admitted to record on the 8th of the same month; but the deed to Cobb, though delivered to him at the time of its acknowledgment, was not put on record until the 10th of March 1869.

At the July term 1868 of the County court of Clarke, Duval, Keigler & Co. recovered a judgment against Beverly Randolph for $631.77, with six per cent. interest thereon, from April 12th 1865 until paid, and $8.46 costs. This judgment was docketed on the 1st of September following; and though an execution of fieri facias was sued out on it, it was not taken from the office.

The bond of Cobb due in 1869 was assigned to James B. Russell, and was paid by Cobb. The second due in 1870, was assigned some time prior to March 1st 1869 to R. B. Wolfe, and considerable payments were made on it by Cobb, to the administratrix of Wolfe. The third bond payable in 1871, was assigned on the 1st of March 1869 to Baker & Co., and Cobb made some payments on it. And about the 21st of September 1869, the fourth bond due in 1872, was assigned by Randolph to James B. Russell; and on that there were only some payments of interest.

708 *This last bond not having been paid when it fell due, the trustee in the deed of trust advertised the land for sale; and thereupon Cobb obtained from the judge of the Circuit court of Clarke county an injunction. And he afterwards, in May 1873, upon his own application, was declared a bankrupt, in the District court of the Western District of Virginia, held at Harrisonburg.

In August 1873, James B. Russell filed his petition in Cobb's proceeding in bankruptcy, in which he set out the foregoing facts, and also that Cobb, after he had been declared a bankrupt, had filed an amended bill, in which he stated that Duval, Keigler & Co. had instituted proceedings and had obtained a decree for the sale of twenty acres of land of Beverly Randolph; that their judgment constituted the first lien on his land which he would have a right to pay off out of his purchase money to Beverly Randolph remaining unpaid, and that no sale of his land could be properly made until the twenty acres of land was sold and the proceeds applied to the claim of Duval, Keigler & Co.

The prayer of the petition was that Cobb might be restrained from any further proceedings in the State court; that the court would settle the amounts and respective priorities of the lien and other debts of Cobb, whether said liens have been proved in bankruptcy or not; that the land of Cobb might be speedily sold, &c. Cobb and his assignee in bankruptcy, Wolfe's administratrix, Baker & Co., and Duval, Keigler & Co. were made defendants to the petition.

Upon the filing of this petition the judge made an order restraining the proceedings in the State courts, and directing the assignee to take the necessary steps to sell the bankrupt's lands.

In October 1873, the cause came on to be heard, *when the court ascertained the liens on the lands of Cobb to be as follows: First, the judgment in favor of Duval, Keigler & Co. for $631.77, with interest, &c.; but there being an unsold tract of land of Beverly Randolph, which had been decreed by the Circuit court to be subject to the payment thereof, said claim was to be credited by whatever might be derived from the sale of said tract of land; second, the claim of Wolfe's administratrix; third, the claim of Baker & Co.; and fourth, the claim of Russell. The amount of each of these claims was set out in the decree, and commissioners were appointed to sell the land of Cobb embraced in the deed of trust, upon terms stated in the decree.

In December 1873 the commissioners returned their report; in which they stated that the land had been sold, and purchased by James B. Russell, at the price of $3,100. And on the 12th of February the court made a decree confirming the report, and directed the commissioners, out of the cash payment for the land, to pay the expenses of sale, and to hold the remainder thereof until it shall be more definitely ascertained, the exact amount of this fund to which Duval, Keigler & Co. will be entitled, as indicated in the former decree; it being suggested to the court, that there has been a sale of the land which they were required to exhaust before they could share in this fund, but said sale has not been acted on by the Circuit court of Clarke county.

The commissioners made their final report, showing the collection of all the purchase money of the land, and the payment to Russell as assignee of Wolfe's administratrix of $551.58, and as assignee of Baker & Co. of $1,241.69—these sums being the amount of their claims—and to Russell $1,094.75, in part of his claim.

710 *And the cause came on to be finally heard on the 2nd of April 1874; and the court referring to its former decrees directing the purchase money to be retained until the court could determine whether Duval, Keigler & Co. or their assignees, by virtue of their judgment should be entitled to any portion of the proceeds of the sale of lands of James M. Cobb, sold under decree in this cause; and it now appearing to the court, that in addition to the land of Beverly Randolph, referred to in the former decrees in this cause, there is personal property of the said Beverly Randolph which may be subjected to the payment of said debt, one or both sources being sufficient for the payment of the same; and the said judgment being a debt of Beverly Randolph, and only binding upon the land of J. M. Cobb, in case it cannot be made out of the personal property of said Randolph, or of land sold by him since the sale to Cobb, it was decreed that no part of the fund derived from the sale of the land of J. M. Cobb, for distribution in this cause, should be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment of Duval, Keigler & Co. or their assignee; but the same should be applied, after paying the costs, to the satisfaction of the debts of Wolfe's administratrix, Baker & Co. and James B. Russell, as ascertained by the decree of the 15th of October 1873; and the report of the commissioner was confirmed.

In January 1874 James B. Russell instituted his suit in equity in the Circuit court of Clarke county, against Beverly Randolph and Mary C. his wife, and R. P. Page, trustee, and their five children, four of whom were infants, and Duval, Keigler & Co. In his bill he stated the judgment of Duval, Keigler & Co., and that on the 10th of December 1873 they assigned the said judgment to him. That on the 17th 711 of March *1871 Beverly Randolph executed a declaration of homestead, and the same was admitted to record in the clerk's office of the County court of Clarke on the 29th of August 1871. This declaration embraced certain personal property therein described as "being all the personal property of which I, the said Beverly Randolph, am possessed." That on the 10th of August 1871 said Randolph, by deed recorded in the said clerk's office on the 29th of the same month, conveyed to R. Powell Page, trustee, for the benefit of Mrs. Randolph and her children, certain personal property, described as being in part the same that was embraced in the deed of homestead exemption. That the consideration of this conveyance is, by its terms, "because of the fact recited, that Beverly Randolph had, by a declaration of homestead, set apart and consecrated as free from levy, &c., for or on account of any debt he might owe, and for the further consideration of one dollar." Copies of these deeds were filed with the bill. He stated, that he was induced to purchase the judgment of Duval, Keigler & Co. by reason of its being complicated with other debts due to him, which rendered it very important that he should be able to control it.

The prayer of the bill was for an injunction to preserve the property, and that the said deeds might be set aside, and that the said personal property, being all the personal property of which Beverly Randolph was possessed, might be sold and applied to the payment of plaintiff's debt, and for general relief.

In February 1874 Beverly Randolph answered the bill. He referred to the proceedings in the cases in the Circuit and the Bankrupt courts. And he referred to another case in the Circuit court of Clarke county, in which the tract of twenty 712 acres of land, referred to *in the decree of the Bankrupt court, had been sold and purchased by Russell, and the proceeds of the sale had been decreed to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment of Duval, Keigler & Co. And he submits whether the said judgment is not now, and was not at the date of the assignment thereof to the plaintiff, fully paid off and discharged; whether the actual sale of the several tracts of land upon which the said judgment was a lien, the confirmation of said sales, the judicial ascertainment of the liens of said judgment, and the decree applying the funds in the hands of the court to the payment of said judgment, is not an actual legal satisfaction thereof; and whether, these lands having been sold for the purpose, this complainant can now, or at any time, by execution upon said judgment, or otherwise, subject any other property to the satisfaction of said judgment.

It was agreed between Russell and Randolph, by their counsel, that the cause should be submitted upon the bill and answer; that the allegation of matters of record should be taken as true, except when the same was contradicted by the records themselves. The allegation of the bill, as to the assignment of the judgment to Russell, the conveyance of the personal property to Page, trustee, the consideration therefor, and the identity of the property conveyed, was admitted to be true.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 3d of March 1874; when the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill as to Beverly Randolph with costs. But upon the application of Russell, and with the consent of Randolph, the cause was retained for a reconsideration and review of this decree by a decree to be made in vacation. And on the 30th of May 1874 the 713 court dissolved the injunction and dismissed *the bill as to all the defendants, with costs. Russell thereupon applied to a judge of this court for an appeal: which was allowed.

Barton & Boyd, for the appellant.

Holmes Conrad, for the appellees.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the declaration and claim of "homestead" made by Beverly Randolph on the 17th of March 1871, is void as against the judgment recovered by Duval, Keigler & Co. at the July term of the County court of Clarke, 1868. That such declaration and claim are invalid as to antecedent debts is fully established by the decisions of this court, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 266.

The deed of trust executed by Beverly Randolph on the 10th of August 1871, for the benefit of his wife and children, and embracing a part of the property claimed as a homestead, is also void as against said judgment. That deed not being upon consideration deemed valuable in law, must be regarded as merely voluntary, and therefore invalid as against the claims of creditors whose debts were contracted prior to its execution.

Under the provisions of the second section, chapter 179, Code of 1860, it was competent for Duval, Keigler & Co., without having sued out an execution at law, to impeach by bill in equity, the deed of homestead and deed of trust upon the ground of fraud, actual or constructive. The appellant Russell being the bona fide assignee of said judgment recovered by Duval, 714 *Keigler & Co., stands in their shoes; is substituted to all their rights and remedies, and entitled to enforce any security they may justly claim.

The court is further of opinion that although the tract of land conveyed by Randolph to Cobb was ordered to be sold under a decree of the circuit court of the United States, rendered on the 15th of October 1873, to satisfy the judgment aforesaid, as well as the claims of Cobb's creditors, it was nevertheless provided in that decree, that Duval, Keigler & Co. should not be entitled to recover any of the proceeds of sale until they shall have exhausted the lands of Beverly Randolph, decreed also to be sold; and should by further proof show to the court that said land has proved insufficient to pay the claim, and the amount of said deficiency."

There is no pretence for saying that this decree operated as a satisfaction of the judgment; for although its priority was recognized, yet the United States court was clearly of opinion, and very properly so, that Randolph's estate ought first to be applied to the judgment before any part of the land purchased by Cobb from Randolph was subjected: And this upon the obvious ground that the judgment was a debt of Randolph for which neither Cobb nor his estate was justly liable.

The same rule was adopted by the United States court in its decree of the 12th September 1874. By that decree the court refuses to order any distribution of the fund whatever, until it could be definitely ascertained what was the exact amount to which Duval, Keigler & Co. would be entitled from the lands of Randolph directed to be sold under previous decrees of the court. And none can fail to believe that if the attention of the United States court had then been called to the fact that 715 *property justly liable to the judgment, that court would have required the holders of that judgment to proceed against that property before subjecting the tract sold and conveyed by Randolph to Cobb. If the United States court was of opinion that a part of Randolph's estate should be applied to the payment of his individual liabilities, it would as a necessary consequence, have held that the whole, if needed, should be so applied.

Randolph was the owner of other

The correctness of this view is conclusively shown by the decree of the same court rendered on the 2d of April 1874. That decree recites, "that it now appearing to the court that in addition to the land of Beverly Randolph referred to in former decrees in this cause, there is personal property of the said Beverly Randolph which may be subjected to the payment of the judgment, and said judgment being a debt of Beverly Randolph, and only binding upon the land of J. N. Cobb in case it cannot be made out of the personalty of Beverly Randolph, or of land sold by him since the sale to J. N. Cobb; it was therefore directed that no part of the fund from the sale of the Cobb land should be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment in favor of Duval, Keigler & Co., or their assignee.

This was a final decree. It disposes of the whole matter in controversy. It deprives Duval, Keigler & Co., or their assignee, of the benefit of the judgment lien upon the Cobb land; it excludes them unconditionally from any participation in that fund, and requires them to resort to such estate as Randolph was entitled to for the satisfaction of the judgment.

It has been suggested, that this decree was obtained by the contrivance of Russell himself, who had then become the assignee of the debt. There is nothing in the record to show at whose instance it was 716 rendered. *It is the decree of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter. It must be held as absolutely conclusive in every other court, unless it is impeached for fraud; of which there is no pretence in this case. If in fact it was entered at the instance of Russell, the matter was easy to be proved by a discovery, or by extrinsic evidence. The record of the decree was filed as an exhibit in this case, and was read without objection in the court below. This court cannot disregard it upon any mere suspicion, or even a suggestion, that the United States court, in rendering this decree, was imposed upon by one of the parties.

But the court is further of opinion, that if the decree is attributable to the action of the appellant Russell, it was nevertheless a just and proper decree under all the circumstances, such as the appellant might well ask and the appellee cannot justly complain of.

As already stated, the judgment recovered by Duval, Keigler & Co. was against Randolph only; Cobb was in no way bound for that debt. The lien of the judgment upon the land of Cobb, purchased from Randolph, was owing to Cobb's failure to record his deed in due time. If the deed had been properly recorded, this controversy would never have arisen, and there would have been no pretence for charging the judgment upon the land purchased by Cobb. But notwithstanding Cobb's neglect in this particular, it was competent for him to insist that Randolph's creditors should exhaust all his real and personal estate before subjecting his (Cobb's) land. And if Cobb had satisfied the judgment, or it had been paid out of the proceeds of his land, he would have been substituted to all the rights and 717 remedies of Duval, Keigler & *Co. against Randolph. Besides this right of substitution, Cobb had his remedy upon the warranty contained in Randolph's deed to him of the 18th April 1868—a contract entered into long anterior to the claim of homestead and the deed of trust.

Now it must be borne in mind that the appellant, Russell, is the holder of one of the bonds executed by Cobb to Randolph for the purchase money of the land. He is therefore assignee of Randolph, and a creditor of Cobb, having also a vendor's lien upon the land for unpaid purchase money. The appellant has therefore all the equities of Cobb, and a strong equity against Randolph, growing out of the assignment.

As the holder of the bond, he has, however, but one fund upon which he can rely for payment, and that is the land. On the other hand, Duval, Keigler & Co. have two funds for the satisfaction of their judgment, the land and the property embraced in the deed of homestead and the deed of trust.

A court of equity will so marshal these securities as to compel Duval, Keigler & Co. to exhaust that fund upon which the appellant has no claim, in order that the latter may appropriate the only fund within his reach.

This is a familiar doctrine of the equity courts: the rule being that if one party has a lien or interest in two funds for his debt, and another party has a lien on or interest in one only of the funds for another debt, the latter has a right in equity to compel the former to resort to the other fund, in the first instance, for satisfaction, if that course is necessary for the satisfaction of the claims of both parties: provided always this course does not trench upon the rights or operate to the prejudice of the creditor entitled to the double fund.

In such cases, the equity of the 718 creditor having *but one fund, is not against the double creditor, but only against the common debtor; that the accidental resort of the paramount creditor to the double fund shall not enable the debtor to get back the second fund discharged of both debts. When, therefore, the paramount creditor is satisfied out of the doubly charged fund, the other creditor has a right of substitution to all his rights against the remaining fund. 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 633; Adams' Eq., mar. 272; Vance v. Monroe, 4 Gratt. 93; Jones et als. v. Phelan & Collander, 20 Gratt. 229.

According to these authorities, Duval, Keigler & Co. are the only persons who can complain of being required to resort to Randolph's personal estate to the relief of the land fund; and they can only object upon showing that such a course would operate to their prejudice. If they made that appear, the appellant would still have the right to satisfy their judgment, and to stand in their place. He has done what is better, he has taken an assignment of the judgment. Clothed with all their rights and remedies, he may very properly proceed against the property of Randolph to satisfy his debt, and against the land of Cobb to satisfy the debt chargeable upon that land. This satisfies all the equities, and attains substantial justice.

The court is therefore of opinion, that if the United States court had rendered no such decree as the one now under consideration, a court of equity having all the parties before it, and with a view to the adjustment of their rights, would now adjudicate these questions precisely as that court has done. The appellee Randolph, and those claiming under him, cannot justly complain that his property is applied to the payment of debts contracted by him long before his right to a homestead accrued, and that his bona fide 719 assignee is *thus permitted to collect his debt out of property liable for its payment.

For these reasons, the court is of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit court must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that the Circuit court erred in dissolving the injunction and in dismissing the bill of the appellant, James B. Russell: wherefore, for the error aforesaid, it is ordered and decreed that the said decree of the Circuit court be reversed and annulled, and that the appellee, Beverly Randolph, pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And this court proceeding to render such decree as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the homestead of the defendant, Beverly Randolph, and the deed of trust executed by him on the 10th day of August 1871 be vacated and annulled, so far as they are in conflict with the debt due to the said James B. Russell, as assignee of the judgment in favor of Duval, Keigler & Co.; that it be referred to one of the commissioners of said court to ascertain and report the exact amount due said Russell as assignee as aforesaid, if the same cannot be agreed by the parties, and a decree to be rendered for the sale of so much of the property embraced in the deed of homestead and deed 720 aforesaid as may be necessary to *satisfy the balance due the complainant; and in the meantime said Circuit court, or the judge thereof in vacation, may make such order touching the custody and disposition of the property aforesaid as may seem just and proper; which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Clarke county.

Decree reversed.

721 *Triplett v. Allen & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Sales of Land by the Acre—Mistake—Compensation.*—A case in which a sale of land was held, upon the written contract and the evidence, to have been a sale by the acre, and not a sale in gross; and the vendor was bound to make good the deficiency in the quantity at the average value of the whole tract per acre.

*Mistake—Compensation.—On this subject, see Bo-back v. Kilgores, 26 Gratt. 442, and note; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 718, and note; also, Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 756.

2. Same—Same—Words "More or Less"—Not a Contract of Hazard.*—The conveyance of the land, after giving the number of acres, adds the words "more or less." These words will not relieve the vendor or vendee, as the case may be, from the obligation to make compensation for an excess or deficiency, beyond what may be reasonably attributed to small errors from variation of instruments or otherwise, unless there be evidence to show that a contract of hazard was intended.

3. Same—Same—Same.—Ten acres, in a tract of 166 acres, where the land is worth fifty dollars an acre, is not one of these small deficiencies to be covered by the phrase "more or less."

This was a bill in the Circuit court of Shenandoah county, by Leonidas Triplett, to enjoin a judgment for $1,635.45 with interest, recovered against him by Lemuel Allen, upon a bond given by Triplett to Allen for part of the price of two tracts of land sold by Allen to Triplett. The grounds relied on in the bill for an injunction, were that the land was sold by the acre, and there was a deficiency in the quantity sold; and that Allen had conveyed to Triplett a right of way from one tract to the other over the land of Tiphen W. Allen; which right of way he did not possess. The injunction was awarded as to $1,000 of the judgment.

Allen answered the bill. He denied 722 that the sale of *the lands was by the acre, and insisted that it was a sale in gross. He denied that he conveyed to Triplett any right of way except that mentioned and reserved to him in his father's will. If Tiphen W. Allen has refused to permit complainant to enjoy said right of way as alleged, as to which he, Allen, is not advised, he is not responsible for the fact.

A number of witnesses were examined as to the circumstances attending the contract between Allen and Triplett, for the sale and purchase of the land; and the cause coming on to be heard on the 25th of August 1874, the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill with costs. And thereupon Triplett obtained an appeal to his court. The facts are stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

M. Bird and H. C. Allen, for the appellant.

*Sales by the Acre—Contracts of Hazard.—In the case of Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 450, JUDGE KEITH delivered the opinion of the court, and citing the principal case, also, Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698; Benson v. Humphreys, 75 Va. 196, said: "These cases not only show that equity will take jurisdiction of this class of cases, upon the ground of mistake, but that 'every sale of real estate, where the quantity is referred to in contract, and where the language of the contract does not plainly indicate that the sale was intended to be a sale in gross, must be presumed to be a sale per acre; that while contracts of hazard are not invalid, courts of equity do not regard them with favor.'" See also, Norfolk Trust Co. v. Foster, 78 Va. 419.

M. Walton, for the appellees.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit court of Shenandoah was erroneous in dissolving the injunction awarded in vacation, and dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The evidence conclusively shows that the sale by Allen to Triplett was a sale per acre, and not a sale in gross. The contract of sale filed with the answer provides "that the said Lemuel Allen doth covenant and agree to sell to the said L. Triplett the home tract of land (with appurtenances thereto belonging), containing one hundred and sixty-six acres, three roods and twenty-eight poles," with certain boundaries described—"together with one hundred and fifty acres of mountain land," for the consideration of ten thousand 723 *dollars. This contract was dated the 3d of November, 1869. It seems on the day before this contract was entered into this land was offered at public auction, and the home tract was offered and bid for by the acre. On that day the bidding went up to some $35 or $40 per acre, and the land was taken down. On the next day (November 3d) the land was again offered at public auction, and the bidding went up to $52 per acre. The bidding was then stopped, and there were certain negotiations between the parties; calculations were made, putting the mountain land at $8 per acre; and propositions to give for the home tract enough per acre (estimating the tract at one hundred and sixty-six acres, three roods and twenty-eight square poles) to make the purchase money for the whole amount to the sum of $10,000. The result of these negotiations was the contract above referred to, by which Allen agreed to sell to Triplett one hundred and sixty-six acres, three roods and twenty-eight poles of what was known as the home tract. A deed was executed on the 2d of December, by Allen and wife, with general warranty, conveying to Triplett this land as described in the contract of sale, except that after the words describing the quantity, are inserted the words "more or less." It turns out upon a survey of the home tract that there is a deficiency of about ten acres.

The court is of opinion that under the contract of the parties and the evidence taken in the cause, the sale was a sale per acre, and not a sale in gross, and that the appellee is bound to make good this deficiency at the average value of the home tract per acre.

But if the contract can be considered a sale in gross and not per acre, the insertion of the words "more or less" in the deed does not affect the case. For it is well settled by repeated decisions of this 724 court, that *the employment of such words will not relieve the vendor or vendee, as the case may be, from the obligation to make compensation for an excess or deficiency, beyond what may be reasonably attributed to small errors from variation of instruments or otherwise; unless, indeed, there be evidence to show that a contract of hazard was intended. In the absence of such evidence, it is to be presumed that the parties contract with reference to quantity. It is an important element in every agreement, and prima facie must be intended to influence the price.

Ten acres in a tract of one hundred and sixty-six acres, especially when worth at least $50 per acre, is not one of these "small deficiencies" to be covered by the phrase "more or less;" and the vendor must be held liable, and the vendee compensated for such deficiency. Nor is the vendor at all relieved from obligation to make good this deficiency by the fact that a part of this land, to the extent of about four acres, was at the time of the sale vested, by proceedings of condemnation, in the Manassas Gap Railroad Company; and that vendee knew, when he bought the land, that said railroad passed through one side of this land. Knowledge of the fact that a railroad passed through the home tract does not alter the question, or change the obligations of the parties. The vendee, under his contract, had purchased one hundred and sixty-six acres, three roods and twenty-eight poles of the home tract. How much of the home tract had become vested in the railroad company was no concern of his. He had a right to presume that the quantity called for by his contract was still left after deducting that in the possession of the railroad company. The company had acquired a fee simple right to the land held by them, for which no doubt

Allen had received full compensation.

725 So far as *this four acres is concerned, Allen stands in the same position as if he had sold and conveyed the four acres to another party before the sale to Triplett; and the fact that Triplett saw and knew that the Manassas Gap railroad passed through this land, could have no more effect on this contract of the parties than if he saw and knew that four acres of the home tract had been sold and possession delivered to a purchaser having a deed in fee simple for four acres of said land. The contract of Allen was to convey to Triplett one hundred and sixty-six acres, three roods and twenty-eight poles, and if he had conveyed a part of it, or had received compensation for a part of it, vested by proper legal proceedings in a railroad company, it was no concern of Triplett, and Allen must make up the deficiency. The court is therefore of opinion that the decree of the said Circuit court was erroneous in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the plaintiff's bill.

The court ought to have perpetuated the injunction certainly, to an amount sufficient to cover the deficiency in the land sold, and have proceeded to declare, upon the evidence in the cause of the value of the land and the deficiency in the value of acres proved, what amount is due to Triplett.

The court is further of opinion, that no deduction in the purchase money can be made on account of the right of way which is claimed by the appellant to have been guaranteed to him by the appellee. The deed conveys Samuel Allen's "right of way across Rhesa Allen's farm now owned by Tipphen W. Allen to the aforesaid mountain land." To ascertain what Samuel Allen's right of way is, reference must be had to the will of Rhesa Allen. The third clause of said will provides as follows: "I further desire that my son Lemuel shall have one hundred and fifty acres of timbered 726 *land, adjoining the lands of Charles Moore, of the mountain tract; and the residue of all lands on the southeast side of the river, or, in other words, the mountain side of the river, shall be Joseph Tipphen W. Allen's land, with the express understanding that Lemuel Allen is to have a right of way to the timbered land." Now this right of way under the will, whatever it may be, has been conveyed by Allen to Triplett. But there is nothing in the record to show that the right of way conveyed, that is, what was conferred by the will of Rhesa Allen, has been denied to Triplett. He (Triplett) is certainly entitled under his contract to the same right of way which was secured to Lemuel Allen under the will of Rhesa Allen. But there is nothing to show in the record, that this right of way has been denied to him.

Triplett, as to his legal rights, can only stand upon such as are secured by the will to Lemuel Allen. It does not appear that these rights have been denied to him. It will be time enough to act upon this question when Triplett has failed to recover his right to the same right of way which the will secures to Lemuel Allen. All that this court now means to decide upon this branch of the case is, that Triplett is only entitled to such right of way as Allen had under the will of Rhesa Allen, his father. What that may be, is a subject of litigation between the parties, and remains to be determined; but the value of the said right of way is still undetermined, and is not to be taken into the estimate of the deficiency for which the appellee is responsible.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the said decree of the said Circuit court, dissolving the injunction and dismissing the plaintiff's bill, is erroneous; and that said 727 decree be reversed, and this cause remanded *to said Circuit court, with instructions to inquire and determine what was the deficiency of the number of acres and the value thereof, and to perpetuate the injunction as to said amount, and dissolve the same as to the balance. The decree must, therefore, be reversed, and the cause be remanded to said Circuit court to be further proceeded in in accordance with the principles herein announced.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel; and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, that the decree of the said Circuit court is erroneous, in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the appellant's bill; the court being of opinion, that the sale from Allen to Triplett was a sale per acre, and not a sale in gross, and that the appellee Allen is bound to make good the deficiency which is shown to exist.

The court is further of opinion, that in taking account of this deficiency, and of what amount the appellant is entitled to recover from the appellee, the value of the right of way is not to be estimated; the court being of opinion, that the appellee conveyed by his deed the same right of way which under the will of his father was secured to said appellee Allen, and there is nothing in the record to show that this right of way has been denied to him.

It is therefore ordered and decreed, that the said decree be reversed and annulled, and that the appellant recover against the appellee his costs expended in the prosecution of his appeal here. And the cause is remanded to said Circuit court, with 728 instructions to *ascertain and determine what is the deficiency in the quantity of the land sold by the appellee to the appellant, and the value of said land appearing to be so deficient; and as to that amount the injunction must be perpetuated, but dissolved in all other respects: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Shenandoah county.

729 *Myers v. Nelson & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Judicial Sales—Payments in Confederate Money.*—M buys land at a judicial sale in 1859, and gives his bonds payable annually down to 1863. He pays all, but the last bond, and pays on that $2,000 in Confederate money; and a few days afterwards offers to pay the balance to the commissioner in Confederate money, who refuses to receive it. M then files his petition in the cause, stating that he owes this balance, and that the commissioner refused to receive it; that he is ready to pay it, and asking that he may be authorized to pay it, and that a commissioner may be directed to convey the land to him. The court decrees that M be authorized to pay to the general receiver the balance due, stating the amount, and upon its payment a commissioner named should convey the land to M. HELD:

1. Appellate Practice.—The decree being a proper decree upon its face, it could not have been altered on appeal.
2. Payments in Confederate Money.—The decree did not authorize M to pay in Confederate money, and a payment to the receiver in that money was not a discharge of M's debt.

In 1858 a suit in equity was instituted in *Judicial Sales—Payments in Confederate Money.—The principal case is cited in Fultz v. Brightwell, 77 Va. 750; also in Purdie v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 840, and note.

the Circuit court of Augusta, by Nelson's widow and others against Nelson's infant heirs, for the sale of a tract of land in which they were the joint owners; and a decree was made in the cause appointing a commissioner to make the sale. In February 1859 a private sale of the land was made to Jacob Myers by one of the adult parties, and this sale was reported to the court by the commissioner, and was confirmed. And the commissioner declining to act further, two of the adult parties *were appointed commissioners, and directed to carry out the contract.

The contract provided that one-fourth of the purchase money should be paid on the 1st of April 1859, and the balance was to be divided into four equal annual instalments, to fall due on the 1st of April 1860, 1861, 1862 and 1863; the title to be retained until all the purchase money was paid.

Myers, in execution of the agreement, paid the amount which was to be paid on the 1st of April 1859, and executed his bonds to the commissioners for the deferred payments, each bearing date the 29th of February 1860, and being for the sum of $3,486.79½. He seems to have paid the three first bonds; and on the 10th of April, a few days after it was due, he paid $2,000 on the fourth bond; and a few days after that, he offered to pay the balance of this bond; but the commissioners refused to receive it; Myers offering to pay that balance, as he had paid the $2,000, in Confederate treasury notes. Myers thereupon, in June 1863, applied by petition in the cause to the judge of the court, to be permitted to pay the balance he owed for the land, and to have a deed for it. This petition, and the proceedings upon it, are stated in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Anderson.

In June 1874, the suit of Nelson & als. v. Nelson's infant heirs, was revived in the names of the then living parties, and on the motion of the plaintiffs and defendants, a rule was made upon Myers to show cause why he should not be required to pay $3,486.79½, with interest, subject to a credit of $2,000 paid April 10th, 1863; the balance due, after allowing said credit, being the amount of purchase money due from said Myers, &c.

Myers appeared and filed his answer 731 to the rule, setting *out what had been done in the cause, saying that he had strictly complied with the decree made upon his petition, and that he had received a deed for the land, which had been duly recorded. And he insisted that the decree of June 1863 was a valid decree by a court of competent jurisdiction; and no attempt having been made to reverse it, it was, after the time which had elapsed, conclusive on all the parties in the cause.

The cause came on to be heard on the 14th of October 1874, when the court held that the order of June 1863, made at the instance of Myers, did not, either under the circumstances, or in its terms, justify or entitle him to discharge his indebtedness for the land purchased by him, by depositing the money in the Central Bank as general receiver of the court in Confederate currency, depreciated at the time to nine for one in gold; nor was the general receiver justified in receiving such currency, nor was Trout, the commissioner, authorized to make a deed to Myers upon his filing the certificate of the receiver: And therefore that said deposit of Confederate currency with the receiver should be wholly disallowed as a discharge of said indebtedness of said Myers, and that the deed made by the commissioner was void, and made without authority; and further, that the order of June 1863 was correct, and could not have been appealed from. It was therefore decreed that the deed from Trout, the commissioner, was null and void; that Myers should pay to the general receiver of the court the said sum of $3,486.79½, with interest thereon from the 1st of April 1863, subject, however, to a credit thereon for $2,000, paid on the 10th of April 1863, with the costs of the rule, which, when paid, will be a full discharge of the purchase money aforesaid due from said Myers.

And said Myers, if he for any cause shall fail to make such payment, do appear here on the 1st day of the next term of the court, to show cause, if any he can, why the said land shall not be re-sold for the payment of said purchase money and costs. And a commissioner was directed to ascertain and report to whom the money thus decreed belongs, and in what proportions. And thereupon Myers applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

A. H. H. Stuart, for the appellant.

G. M. Cochran, for the appellees.

Anderson, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

Appellant's bond for $3,486.79½, executed to A. L. Nelson and William J. Nelson, commissioners, bearing date February 29, 1860, fell due the 1st of April 1863. It was executed for the last instalment on a tract of land which was sold to appellant on the 29th of February 1859, under a decree of the Circuit court of Augusta county, in the cause of Nelson's guardian, against Nelson's infants, and which was confirmed at the June term 1859. The appellant paid $2,000 on this bond on the 10th of April 1863. And, in the month of June following, presented a petition to the Hon. Lucas P. Thompson, judge of the said Circuit court, in which he alleges that he is prepared to comply with the contract on his part by paying up the whole purchase money due on said land, there being about $1,500 due yet, but the commissioners positively refused to receive the money, but require him to keep it unproductive in his hands, and to account for the interest which he alleges is in contravention of the contract and the decree, and grievously unjust to him; and he prays that said commissioners shall be required to receive the money, or some other receiver be appointed to receive it, and that when paid, a deed shall be made to him as provided in the contract.

Certainly the debtor had a right to pay his debt after it was due, and it being a debt contracted with commissioners of the court, and payable to them, they were under the control of the court, and if they refused to receive payment, in compliance with the contract, the court had power to compel them to receive payment, or to order the money to be deposited with the general receiver to the credit of the cause; and upon a certificate of the deposit being filed with the papers in the cause, to order that the commissioner, who was appointed for the purpose, should make a deed of conveyance to the purchaser; and such was the order made by the court.

In execution of said order, the appellant tendered the balance due in Confederate treasury notes, which the commissioners refused to receive. He then deposited them with the bank, as the general receiver of the court, which gave him a certificate to the effect that he had deposited $1,520 in the treasury notes of the Confederate States to the credit of said cause, which would be invested by the bank in 7 per cent. bonds of the Confederate States; and stating that the bank had given the certificate in that form, "because of a notice served upon the bank by John B. Baldwin, Esq., counsel for R. R. Nelson, &c., (filed with the papers in the cause,) forbidding the receipt of Confederate treasury notes, and is intended to charge the bank only with the payment of Confederate States treasury notes, or the Confederate bonds, in which they may be invested." The said treasury notes were then depreciated to nine for one in gold.

734 *There is no error apparent on the face of the decree, and no exception is taken to it by the appellees, and it could not be done in this collateral proceeding. The only question is as to the execution of it. It is contended by counsel for appellant, that the decree viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances, and of the fact which may be judicially known, that at the date of the decree, Confederate currency being the only currency used as the medium of exchange in the ordinary transactions of the country, the decree must be construed as intended to authorize payment to be made in that currency.

Confederate treasury notes were never made a legal tender in payment of debts; and it was not in the power of the courts, as that eminent judge was well aware, to authorize a debtor to pay off a specie debt, or to compel a creditor to receive payment, against his will, of a specie debt, contracted before the war, in a depreciated Confederate currency, worth only when first tendered five and a half, and when deposited with the receiver only nine, for one in gold. The petition of the debtor does not ask that he may be allowed to make payment in that depreciated currency. He makes no offer in his petition to pay in Confederate treasury notes, or any allusion to that currency; but says he is prepared to comply with his contract by paying up the whole of the purchase money due upon said land. It was a contract in effect to pay in specie, and a preparation to pay in that depreciated currency was surely not a preparation to comply with his contract. What he asks for in his petition he was entitled to. And the decree awards it to him. But it does not authorize him to make the payment or tender payment in the depreciated currency then prevailing, which the obligees had positively refused to receive, and

735 which *it was not in the power of the court to require them to do, and which we have seen his petition does not in terms propose. But it only authorizes him to pay his debt, which he had a clear right to do, and upon the payment in full, to receive a conveyance of title to the land. But the decree does not decide the question, if that was before the court, in what medium it shall be paid. It could not be intended by the decree, to authorize the debtor to pay in a medium, or to compel the creditor to receive payment in a medium, which the contract did not authorize or require, or which it was not in the power of the court to do. It will not be presumed that the court intended to do what was forbidden by law, and what it had no power to do, and of which the eminent judge was as well aware as is this court, when it is not so expressed or imported by the terms of the decree. It was doubtless known to him, that Confederate currency was at the time the only circulating medium of exchange; and he may have been aware that the petitioner contemplated making payment in that currency. But as he had not proposed it in his petition, but only to be allowed to make payment in compliance with his contract, which he was clearly entitled to do; and as no question had been raised by the petition as to the medium of payment, or by any pleading or proceeding in the record, he may have deemed it most proper to award to the petitioner what he asked for in his petition, and what he was entitled to, and not to pass upon a question which was not raised by the petition, but which would more properly be raised upon the proceedings in execution of the order. The question appears not to have been raised in the execution of the order, or brought to the attention of the court until

736 it was raised by the rule upon which the decree *was pronounced, which is now appealed from; and it does not appear that Judge Thompson ever passed upon it. It might have been raised by the bank as general receiver, and ought to have been raised and submitted by it to the court when it was notified by the creditor not to receive Confederate currency in payment; and the bank was not justified in receiving the Confederate treasury notes as the general receiver of the court until the question as to its receivability had been submitted to and passed upon by the court. And so it may be said the question might have been and ought to have been submitted by commissioner Trout to the court before he executed the conveyance, as the certificate showed upon its face that payment had been received in Confederate treasury notes by the general receiver against the protest of the parties to whom the payment was due. The court is therefore of opinion that the question not having been passed on by Judge Thompson in his decree, was still an open question, and that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit court of Augusta county of the 14th day of October 1874, and that it be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

*Coffman v. Niswander & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Sales of Land—Verbal—Conditions.—In 1857 C, by a verbal contract, sold to N a lot in D, and N took possession of the lot, built a house upon it and improved it, but did not pay the purchase money at the time agreed. C having become the security of N as the guardian of W and in a debt to K, in April 1861 they entered into a written agreement, whereby, reciting these facts, it was agreed that C should retain the legal and equitable title to the property until the purchase money for the lot and the debts for which C was bound as the surety of N were fully paid. This agreement was not recorded. After the war N became a bankrupt; and in 1868 C filed his bill against N and his assignee, to have the property sold and applied to the payment of the purchase money for the lot and the debts for which C was surety for N; and it was sold, not bringing enough to pay C for his purchase money and what he paid for N to W. Other judgment creditors of N intervene and claim the proceeds of the sale after payment of the purchase money. HELD:

1. Same.—N had neither the legal nor equitable title to the property until the debts were paid.
2. Judgment Creditors—Rights.—The judgment creditors of N have only the equities of N against C; and as against them, the agreement between C and N is valid, though not recorded.

In September 1868 Hiram Coffman filed his bill in the Circuit court of Rockingham county, in which he stated, that in the year 1857 he sold to John Niswander a lot of ground in the town of Dayton, in said county, for the sum of two hundred and seventy-six dollars, to be paid on the 1st of April 1858. That it was a verbal contract never reduced to writing until the 1st of April 1861; but Niswander took possession 738 *of the lot, and built a house upon it, enclosed and made other improvements thereon.

He further states that Niswander qualified as the guardian of his niece Miss Lucy Jane Williams, and gave bond with plaintiff and two others as his sureties, and that as such guardian he received $1,700, for which his sureties are still liable, as plaintiff is advised that no part of said money has been paid to said Lucy. That plaintiff is also Niswander's security on a bond to Harvey

Kyle for $298.83, with interest from the 21st of June 1859, which also remains unpaid.

He further states that in view of these facts and of the unsettled condition of the country in the spring of 1861, plaintiff required Niswander to pay these debts, and he being unable to pay up, they on the 1st of April 1861, entered into a written contract, in which plaintiff's vendor's lien and his aforesaid liabilities are fully set out, and their payment stipulated for; and in which it is provided that the legal and equitable title to said house and lot should remain with the plaintiff until the lien and debts aforesaid were fully paid, and the plaintiff relieved from all liability as such surety.

He states that Niswander is insolvent and has gone into bankruptcy. And he makes him and his assignee parties defendants, and prays for a sale of the house and lot; that the purchase money due to himself be first paid out of the proceeds of sale, and that the balance be applied to the satisfaction of the debts for which plaintiff is surety.

The agreement of April 1st 1861, which is under seal, was filed with the bill. It recites the verbal agreement of 1857, as stated in the bill, and that if the money was not paid on the 1st of April, 1858, the agreement was to be null and void; and that said Niswander had wholly failed 739 to pay the purchase money, *but took possession of the lot and built a house thereon, and desires to be secured in the possession of said lot and buildings. It further recites the liabilities of Coffman as security of Niswander; and then it is agreed that Coffman will make good the title to said house and lot upon the following terms and conditions, which are accepted by the said Niswander, viz: Niswander to pay the purchase money and interest, and to pay off his debts to Lucy Williams and Kyle, so as to relieve and wholly discharge the said Coffman from all liability on said bonds; and then Coffman binds himself to make a good and perfect title to said Niswander for said house and lot. But until Coffman is fully paid off and released from his liabilities as surety as aforesaid, he is to retain the legal and equitable title to said lot.

In October 1868 the court made a decree, directing a commissioner named, after giving notice as directed in the decree, to sell the house and lot mentioned in the bill at public auction, upon a credit of six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months, the purchaser to give bonds with security, bearing interest from the date of sale, and the title to be retained. And in pursuance of this decree the commissioner reported that he had sold the house and lot at public auction, when the plaintiff Coffman became the purchaser at the price of eleven hundred dollars, and had executed his bonds with security.

At the April term 1869 of the court, David Blosser, administrator of Anna Blosser deceased, Jacob Dinkel, administrator of Harriet S. Dinkel deceased, and two others, filed their petition in the cause, in which they set out that they were judgment creditors of John Niswander, and that their judgments had been docketed. They charge that their judgments are liens 740 *upon the land of Niswander; and at the time their judgments were obtained Niswander was the owner of a house and lot in the town of Dayton, which lot he had purchased of Hiram Coffman in 1857, and had built on it a brick dwelling at a cost of several thousand dollars. That he had gone into bankruptcy, and had no personal estate. They refer to the bill of Coffman, and his pretensions under the agreement of April 1st, 1861. They insist that if that agreement was made on the 1st of April 1861, as it purports to have been, it is not valid against them as creditors of Niswander, it never having been recorded, and they having no knowledge of it, and Niswander having been put in possession of the lot long before said pretended contract. They do not believe that said contract was made at the time it bears date; and they insist that their judgments are liens upon the said land, at least after the payment of the $276 and interest for purchase money, to which they ask that Coffman may be required to prove he is entitled. They make Coffman, Niswander and his assignee defendants to their petition, ask that the two first may be required to answer, and that their judgment liens may be enforced and their debts paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the house and lot.

Coffman answered the petition, and averred the agreement referred to was executed on the day it bears date, and was designed to secure him in the payment of the debts therein referred to, as well as the payment of the purchase money of the lot. He did not consider it necessary to record the contract, in as much as Niswander had not even a shadow of title to said house and lot until he had complied with the terms and conditions of said contract, and held no writing of any kind to show 741 that he had even a right *to the property under any circumstances. And he says that the debts and purchase money mentioned in said contract are not yet paid.

In October 1869 the court confirmed the report of the sale, and directed the commissioner to collect enough of the purchase money to pay the expenses of sale and his own fee and commission, and to permit Coffman to retain in his hands the balance of the purchase money until the further order of the court. Subsequently a commissioner, to whom the cause was referred, made a statement of the liens upon the land. From this statement it appeared, the purchase money, principal and interest, to January 1st, 1875, was $554.07; that the judgment in favor of Anna Blosser's adm'or was rendered in August 1866, and, with interest up to January 1st, 1875, amounted to $1,055.56; that in favor of Harriet Dinkel's adm'or was rendered in February 1867, and after allowing a credit upon it paid in 1874,

There remained due $175.74; and that Miller's judgment was rendered in May 1867, and there was due on that $255.86. It was admitted that in August 1870 Coffman paid, as surety for Niswander on his guardianship $1,100.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 8th of February 1875, when the court held that the aforesaid judgment liens were superior to the unrecorded contract; and confirming the report of these liens, it was decreed that the commissioner who made the sale of the house and lot should proceed to collect the purchase money, and after paying the costs of the suit, that he should pay first to the plaintiff Coffman $554.07, with interest on $276 from the 1st of January 1875 till paid; and second, that he should pay the residue of said purchase money to Anna Blosser's administrator, in satisfaction of his judgment for 742 *$1,055.66, with like interest on $527.19 part thereof; and if any balance remained in his hand, that he should apply the same to the satisfaction of the other judgments mentioned in the commissioner's report in the order of their priority; and make report to the court. And thereupon Coffman obtained an appeal to this court.

Berlin, for the appellant.

Compton, for the appellee.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

It is very clear that the contract of 1st April 1861 was not a sale by Niswander to the appellant Coffman; it was not even a surrender by the former to the latter of any interest in the land, for he had none, legal or equitable. It was the mere substitution of a new contract for the old one, which by its own terms was ended, and which the parties did not choose to renew. It was a new sale to the same purchaser upon terms acceptable to each. The arrangement interfered with no liens or incumbrances created by the act of Niswander the purchaser, because none such were in existence. It did not divert the debtor's property from the just claims of creditors, because the vendor only retained the title as a security for what was justly due him, and for other debts of the purchaser for which he was bound as surety. These debts were as valid and meritorious as those due the appellees, and it was eminently just and proper to provide for their payment to the relief of the appellant as surety.

The main reliance of the appellees, however, is upon the failure to record the contract of April 1861. This view is based upon an entire misconception of the 743 *respective position of the parties:

There would be great force in it if Niswander the purchaser was asserting title against Coffman's creditors under a contract never recorded. But in this case it is the creditors of the purchaser who are attempting to enforce their liens against the property. They may stand in the pur-chaser's shoes, and subject his interest, whatever it may be, to their debts; but they have no further claim.

The common law courts, indeed, do not regard the owner of an equitable title as having any estate whatever. They treat a contract to convey merely as a personal covenant, the breach of which is only to be compensated in damages. Courts of equity, on the other hand, consider the purchaser, though without the legal title, as the owner of the land; but this is only where he has fully complied with all the terms of the sale, and is entitled to call for the conveyance without any conditions imposed. This right is in subordination to the legal title. A court of equity will never compel the vendor to part with that title until the conditions are fully performed upon which he agreed to make the conveyance. If the purchaser himself cannot compel a conveyance, neither can his creditors. The failure to record the contract can therefore neither enlarge their remedies, nor diminish the rights of the vendor.

It is improper to say that parties may be misled by the apparent ownership of the purchaser. Persons who deal with one in possession of real estate are required to look to the records. If upon examination they find no evidence of title, they trust the occupant at their peril. Had the appellees searched the registry they would have learned that he had neither a legal nor an equitable title, and that Coffman appeared 744 as the sole owner. Had they applied to Coffman himself *they would have ascertained the nature of Niswander's interest, and the terms upon which he was entitled to a conveyance. If indeed they have been misled, it is the result of their own negligence in failing to make such enquiry as would have placed them in possession of the necessary information.

Occupying no higher ground than their debtor, these creditors can only require the appellant to convey the property when his purchase money is paid and he is indemnified as surety for the debts specified in the article of agreement.

It is recited in the decree, that upon the admission of the parties, the appellant has already paid, since the institution of the suit, the sum of eleven hundred dollars, as the surety of Niswander. And as the property brought only that sum at the sale under the decree, the proceeds of sale in the appellant's hands, as purchaser at that sale, will be more than absorbed by the amount of his claims. It would seem, therefore, that a decree might at once be entered in his favor. Under the circumstances, however, it is deemed most advisable to reverse the decree of the Circuit court, and to remand the case for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by counsel; and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the Circuit court erred in holding that the appellees are entitled to priority over the appellant in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the house and lot sold by the appellant to

John Niswander. It is therefore ad-
745 judged, ordered *and decreed, that so much of the decree of 8th day of February 1875 as directs the payment of the balance of said proceeds to Abraham Blosser, Jr., administrator de bonis non of Anna Blosser deceased, after paying and satisfying the lien of the appellant, be reversed and annulled, and that the appellees do pay to the appellant his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal aforesaid here. And this court, proceeding to render such decree as the said Circuit court ought to have rendered, is of opinion, that the appellant Coffman, out of the proceeds of sale of the house and lot aforesaid, is entitled in preference to the appellees, to be satisfied, first the amount of the purchase money due him, to-wit, the sum of $554.10 cents, with interest on $276, part thereof, from the 15th day of January 1875; second, he is entitled to be repaid whatever sum or sums he may have heretofore paid, or may hereafter pay, or may be justly liable for, as the surety of John Niswander upon the debts of the latter to Lucy Jane Williams and to Harvey Kyle, as set forth in the article of agreement of the 1st day of April 1861; and the residue of said proceeds, if any, to be paid to the administrator of Anna Blosser deceased. And the cause is remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with this decree: which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree reversed.

746 *Hess & al. v. Rader & Wife & als.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

I. Commissioners—Sale under Decree of Court.—Will appointed a commissioner to sell land at public auction, but he is not to act under the decree until he gives bond, &c., faithfully to perform this and any future decrees made in the cause. He does not execute the bond, but he sells the land at private sale to H. which he reports to the court. The court confirms the sale, and directs him to collect the money and invest it; and H pays him the whole purchase money; only a part of which he invests, and dies insolvent. HOLD:

1. Judicial Sales—Confirmation.—The sale having been made by a commissioner under a decree of the court, and that sale having been confirmed by the court, it is a judicial sale.

2. Same—Same.—Whether made at public or private sale, it only becomes a sale at all, when confirmed by the court; that constitutes such sale a judicial sale.

3. Failure of Commissioner to Give Bond—Liability of Purchaser—"Caveat Emptor."—W not having given the bond as required, had no authority to receive the purchase money; and H is responsible to the party who is entitled to the proceeds, for so much as has not been properly invested by W. and cannot be made out of W's estate.

4. Statutory Regulations.—The statute, Code of 1873, ch. 174, § 1, is imperative, that a bond shall be given, and it is the duty of a purchaser at a judicial sale to see that the bond has been given before he pays his money to the commissioner, or he does it at his own risk.

In a cause pending in the Circuit court of Augusta county, in which the committee of Sarah Kratzer, a person of unsound mind, and Elizabeth Kratzer, were plaintiffs, and the said Sarah Kratzer, by her guardian *ad litem was defendant, a decree was made on the 18th of June 1859, by which E. T. H. Warren was appointed a special commissioner to sell a tract of land, in one-half of which Sarah Kratzer had a life estate, and Elizabeth Kratzer was entitled to one-half at once, and to the whole on the death of the said Sarah. And the decree provided, that the said special commissioner was not to act under said decree until he executes and files with the clerk of the court, bond, with security to be approved by said clerk, payable to the Commonwealth of Virginia, in the penalty of $7,000, and conditioned faithfully to perform the requirements of this and any future order of this court in this cause. Warren does not appear to have executed the bond required by this decree; but after two failures to sell the land at public auction, he made a private sale of it to Andrew Hess and Martin Miller for $3,000, payable at different periods up to March 1861. This contract was reported to the court; and on the 14th of June 1860 the court approved and confirmed the contract; and decreed that Warren should take from the purchasers their bonds, and collect the same as they fell due, and pay the costs of suit and sale, and the remainder loan out on good personal security, subject to the future order of the court; and report to the court at the next term.

All the purchase money of the land was paid by Hess and Miller to Warren, as soon as it was due, and he seems to have invested a part of it on personal security. He, however, having gone into the army early in the late war, and having been killed, made no report to the court; and no further steps were taken in the case until November 1864; when Hess and Miller filed their petition in the cause, stating the 748 payment of the purchase money, and asking that a conveyance of *the land might be made to them; and accordingly the court made a decree appointing a special commissioner to convey the land to them; which was done.

In June 1866 Elizabeth Kratzer filed her petition in the cause, in which she states the fact that Warren did not execute the bond required of him by the court, and that he did not leave sufficient estate to discharge his liability for the purchase money received by him; and she asks that the purchasers of the land, Hess and Miller, or the estate of Warren, may be compelled to make up any deficiency, after applying the sums to be received from the borrowers from Warren of a part of the purchase money.

This petitioner afterwards married Adam Rader, and they filed an amended and supplemental bill in the cause, in which they set up the same claim upon the estate of Warren and the purchasers of the land. This bill was answered by Hess and Miller; and accounts were directed and taken, from which it appeared that after applying the moneys lent out by Warren, and so much of his estate as was applicable to this claim, there remained due to the plaintiffs for the land the sum of $2,331.07, with interest on $1,762.14, from the 1st of October 1873, subject to a credit on the interest of $34.50.

The cause came on to be heard on the 11th of April 1874, when the court annulled the deed that had been made to Hess and Miller, and decreed that they should pay to Rader, as receiver of the court, the said sum of $2,331.07, with interest on $1,762.14. And unless said payment was made in sixty days, commissioners named should proceed to sell the land on terms stated in the decree. From this decree Hess and Miller applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

749 *Fultz, for the appellants.

Sheffey & Bumgardner, for the appellees.

Christian, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the sale made to Hess and Miller was a judicial sale, being made under a decree of the Circuit court of Augusta, entered in June 1859. It is true it was not made at public auction, but it was made by a party who had been appointed commissioner of the court; was reported to said court and confirmed as a sale made by the court. It was none the less a judicial sale because made privately, and not at public auction. In either event it only becomes a sale at all, when confirmed by the court. It is the confirmation by the court, and not the biddings or propositions to buy that constitutes such sale a judicial sale.

The court is further of opinion, that the payment of the purchase money to Warren, by Hess and Miller, was without authority, and that such payment does not discharge them from obligation to pay to the appellees such part of the purchase money as has been lost in consequence of the insolvency of Warren.

Hess and Miller, being purchasers at a judicial sale, were bound to take notice of the decrees and other material proceedings, under authority of which the land was sold, and must be presumed to know the law which governs such sales. Now the decree directing a sale, and appointing a commissioner for that purpose, upon its face expressly provides, that "the said commissioner shall not act under this decree until he executes and files with the clerk of the court bond with security, to be 750 approved by said clerk, payable to the *commonwealth of Virginia in the penalty of $7,000, and conditioned faithfully to perform the requirements of this and every future order of the court in this cause." The very decree under which the appellants purchased, informed them that the party with whom they were dealing was not authorized to act until he had given the bond required. It was easy for them to have made the enquiry if the bond had been given; and it was their own culpable neglect in not making such enquiry: and if loss has occurred to them, it was in consequence of their own want of diligence and negligence in not seeing to it, that the party with whom they were dealing was clothed with proper authority.

But beside the express directions of the decree, the statute law, which every party acting under it must be presumed to know, informed these appellants that "no special commissioner appointed by a court shall receive money under a decree or order until he gives bond before the said court or its clerk." Before they paid any part of the purchase money they should have enquired if the bond required by law had been given. Otherwise they might be paying to one who had no authority to receive it. They might as well have paid it to a stranger. Both the decree under which they purchased, and the law governing such decrees, declared that the giving a bond was a condition precedent to any authority of the commissioner in the premises.

Much was said in the argument, about the hardship of requiring parties to pay their money twice in the same transaction, when it had been once paid to a commissioner of the court. It may be answered to this—1st, the hardship arises out of the negligence of the parties; and 2d, they have not paid it to a commissioner of the court authorized to receive it, because 751 the very *authority to receive the money is the execution of the bond required by law.

The provision of the statute referred to, Code 1873, ch. 174, § 1, is one most useful and salutary. It was intended as a shield of protection to all parties, whose property had to be disposed of, and proceeds administered by the court of chancery. These parties are most frequently persons under disability, such as infants, insane, and others not sui juris. The legislature in its wisdom has determined not to leave the matter to the chance of a court's requiring a bond for the faithful performance of the duties of its commissioner, or to the chance of the appointment of an insolvent commissioner; but has declared as the law of every case, that "no special commissioner appointed by any court shall receive money under a decree or order until he gives bond before said court or its clerk."

No case of individual hardship should influence the courts in weakening in any degree the force of this wise and salutary law; but it ought to be constantly maintained and enforced, as one which affords wholesome and safe protection to all parties, whose property is sold under proceedings of a court of chancery. The court is therefore of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the said Circuit court, and that the same should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

752 *Green v. Phillips & als.

[21 Am. Rep. 323.]

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

Fixtures—Machinery.*—The true rule in determining what are fixtures in a manufacturing establishment, where the land and buildings are owned by the manufacturer is—That where the machinery is permanent in its character, and essential to the purposes for which the building is occupied, it must be regarded as realty, and passes with the building; and that whatever is essential to the purposes for which the building is used will be considered as a fixture, although the connection between them be such that it may be severed without physical or lasting injury to either.

This was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit court of Rockingham county, dissolving an injunction which had been granted to enjoin the sale under executions of fieri facias, of certain machinery in the manufactory of the Harrisonburg Lumber Manufacturing and Merchandise Company of Rockingham. This bill was filed by John T. Green, who claimed as the beneficiary in a mortgage given by the company to secure a debt for $1,045, for money loaned, and it was against a number of the creditors of the company, who had recovered judgments and sued out executions of fieri facias, which were levied on some of the machinery in the company's factory. The case is fully stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

Berlin and Harnsbarger, for the appellant.

There was no counsel for the appellees.

*Fixtures—Machinery.—See on this subject, Shelton v. Ficklin, 32 Gratt. 727, and note, collecting cases; also, Patton v. Moore, 16 W. Va. 437, and McFadden v. Crawford, 36 W. Va. 677, 15 S. E. Rep. 410, both citing the principal case with approval.

753 *Christian, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The controversy in this case arises between a mortgagee and execution creditors as to certain machinery in the possession of the "Harrisonburg Lumber Manufacturing and Merchandise Company."

Certain persons having entered into a partnership to build and put into operation a sash, blind and door factory, in the town of Harrisonburg, obtained from the Circuit court of Rockingham a charter of incorporation.

This company purchased and paid for four-and-a-half acres of land in the town of Harrisonburg, and erected a building thereon, putting into said building a steam boiler and engine, and also planing, mortising and moulding machine, and entire machinery necessary to carry out the purposes of the company in the manufacture of sash, blinds, doors, flooring, and other building material.

The company seems not to have been prosperous in their operations, becoming indebted to numerous creditors, who obtained judgments against it at different times for various amounts.

On the 11th November 1869, the company, through its president and secretary, executed a mortgage upon its property, including land, buildings, machinery, fixtures, &c., to W. E. Green, to secure the payment of the sum of one thousand and forty-five dollars. The deed creating this mortgage, (which it appears was for the benefit of John T. Green, the appellant in this case,) was not recorded until December 8, 1870.

In the meantime numerous other creditors had obtained judgments against the company. Upon some of these judgments executions were issued and levied upon certain machinery—one being levied upon 754 what *is known as a shaper—another being levied upon the steam engine, which runs or drives the machinery—another upon a moulding machine and two planing machines.

Upon the levy of these executions the appellant, who is the beneficial mortgagee, filed his bill of injunction addressed to the judge of the Circuit court of Rockingham, in which, after setting forth the incorporation of the company, the objects and purposes for which it was incorporated, the fact that he was a large stockholder in the company, its indebtedness to him evidenced by the mortgage above noticed, and for other debts due him; the levy of the executions upon the machinery attached to the company's building—he alleges that said machinery is all attached to the building, and constitutes fixtures firmly fastened to the sale, and absolutely necessary to the purposes for which the factory was established; and if sold under said executions and removed, the factory would be stopped and rendered valueless. He claimed that the machinery thus levied on, was part and parcel of the realty, and not liable to levy and sale, separate and apart from the building and the land. He asserts that his mortgage is prior and superior to the other judgments, and insists that if there is to be a sale, the whole property levied on, buildings and machinery shall be sold, and the different creditors paid according to the priorities of their respective claims. He also prays for an injunction to prevent the sale of the machinery levied upon, and to enjoin all proceedings under the said judgments until the various debts outstanding against the company, and the different liens and their priorities could be ascertained; and that the whole property might be sold and the creditors satisfied 755 according to *their respective rights.

To this bill the judgment creditors were made parties.

An injunction was awarded according to the prayer of the bill, by the Hon. Robert H. Turner, judge of the 14th judicial circuit. Two of the defendants answered the bill—J. D. Price and R. Ball & Co. Price admitted the large indebtedness of the company, and insisted upon a settlement of its affairs; does not object to a sale of the property to pay its debts, but suggests a private sale, instead of a sale at public auction. He denies the validity of the mortgage set up by the plaintiff in his bill; alleging that the deed exhibited therewith was executed without authority from the company, and was informal, null and void; and that if the debt is due from the company, it must stand upon the same footing as other debts. This allegation, affirmative, in the answer, as to the execution of the deed without authority, is not sustained by any proof, and indeed seems to be abandoned; for when the commissioner reports the debt due to William E. Green as secured by a mortgage, the report is confirmed by the court, without exception.

The only other defendants who answer the bill, are R. Ball & Co. They allege, that they recovered a judgment against the Harrisonburg Lumber and Merchandise Company at the May term of said Circuit court, 1870, for the sum of $460.09, with interest from 31st July 1863, and that on the 10th of June, 1870 they caused an execution of fieri facias to be issued from the clerk's office of said Circuit court, and caused the same to be levied upon sash moulding machines and two planers (Daniel's and Surface's), belonging to said company. They further allege that "they are advised and so answer, that the said property so levied on is, according to 756 *attached—a realty exempted from levy and sale under an execution of fieri facias—but goods and chattels subject to such levy and sale; and they therefore deny that it is part and parcel of the freehold, or real estate; and deny that the factory would be rendered valueless by the removal of the machinery levied on." They deny that there would be any necessary injury to the complainant, or any one else, by a separate sale of the property levied on by the sheriff to satisfy the execution on their judgment, and ask that the injunction be dissolved. The other judgment creditors whose executions had been levied upon the steam engine, and the machine known as the shaper, did not answer the bill. A number of depositions were taken, and it was conclusively shown, both, that the different machines and the engines levied upon were firmly fastened to the building in which they were put up, and that they were absolutely essential to the purpose for which the building was erected as a factory of sash, blinds and doors, and other building material.

Two witnesses were examined by the defendants. One of them, Thomas W. Basford, in answer to the question, "How, if at all, are these machines (planers) attached to the realty?" says, "Only, so far as I know, by leather bands running on the band wheel. They ought not otherwise to be attached, any more than a table. Their weight holds them on the floor." On cross examination, in answer to the question, "Do you know whether the machines of which you speak are actually attached otherwise than by the bands of which you speak?" says, "I cannot tell; I don't think they ever were intended to be attached; they may have been nailed to the floor."

This witness also states, that these planing machines "are essentially necessary 757 to the company for the purpose *of manufacturing, planing lumber, &c., for which they organized."

The remaining witness for the defendants says, "there is a Daniel's planer, another planer, and a moulding machine in that factory. The planers are on a dirt floor, and are only attached to the realty by the bands which run on a wheel attached to a shaft, which shaft is attached to the building. The moulding machine is up-stairs, on a plank floor, and, I think, screwed to the floor. I think the machine stands upon a board, which extends beyond the feet, and it is my impression this machine is fastened to this board. This board is fastened to the floor. It is also attached by bands like the planers. I worked the last machine for some nine months, and I think it ought to be fastened to keep it steady."

William C. Price, a witness introduced by the plaintiffs, says, "From the organization of the company, I was foreman in the wood department of the concern. I assisted, in connection with Mr. Scott, a regular machinist, in placing in position all the machinery except the Daniel planer. * * * There are sills 10x12 inches imbedded in the ground floor of the building, and the planer is fastened down by screw bolts to those sills. It is also connected by belts to the line shaft of the mill. * * * The line shaft is attached to the driving wheel of the engine by a belt which drives the whole machinery."

In reply to a question as to how the steam engine (which was also levied on) is fastened, he says, "There are walls built, on which sills are laid, on which the engine is placed, and fastened by bolts passing through these sills, and secured thereto. A sill then passes from the sills on this foundation to the sills in the main building, and thereto attached, lapped out, keyed 758 and *spiked." As to the Daniel planer he says: "It is placed on ties embedded in the ground floor, to which it is fastened by screws, and also by braces, which pass from the posts of the planer to the joists of the floor above, to which they are fastened by screws and nails."

With regard to the moulding machine or shaper, this witness says: "It is screwed fast to the second floor of the building, and also attached to the main line shaft or belt." He further says: "These machines could not be operated unless they were immovably fixed."

This witness expressed the opinion that these machines can be detached without serious injury to the building or to the machines.

The evidence of this witnesses is fully corroborated by three others, except that one of them says the surface planer could not be removed without tearing up the floor of the building. All the witnesses on both sides agree that all these machines, with the engine levied upon, are absolutely essential for carrying out the purposes for which the company was organized, and for which the land was purchased and the buildings were erected.

Upon this evidence, and upon the answers of the appellees, the case was heard upon a motion to dissolve the injunction; and the Circuit court, by its decree entered on the 4th day of May 1872, dissolved the injunction it had awarded restraining the sale of the machinery upon which the executions of fieri facias had been levied. It was from this decree that an appeal was allowed by one of the judges of this court.

The main question raised upon the pleadings and evidence in this cause, and which we now have to determine, is whether the machinery levied upon is of the nature of personalty, which can be taken under an execution of fieri facias, or whether they are of such a character as the law 759 nominates fixtures attached to *and a part of the realty, which pass to the mortgagee. It is true in this case, the deed relied upon as creating the mortgage conveys the machinery as well as the land and buildings; but as that deed was not recorded until after the levy of the executions, it becomes important and necessary to determine whether these machines, engine, &c., are fixtures, which an execution of fieri facias cannot reach.

It is not necessary in this case to go into a consideration of the general doctrine of fixtures by which the nature and legal incidents of this property must be determined, or to notice the distinctions which arise with respect to this kind of property, as between landlord and tenant, vendor and vendee, and heir and executor; which distinctions are sometimes nice and difficult: but in this case it seems sufficient to lay down the following general rules as to this species of property: 1st. A fixture is an article which was a chattel, but which, by being affixed to the realty, became accessory to it and parcel of it. 2d. The true criterion of a fixture is the united application of the following requisites: annexation to the realty or something appurtenant thereto; application to the use or purpose to which that part of the realty with which it is connected is appropriated; the intention of the party making the annexation to make a permanent accession to the freehold. It is true that many cases may be found which hold, that to give chattels the character of fixtures, and deprive them of that of personalty, they must be so firmly attached to the real estate that the connection cannot be severed without breaking or otherwise injuring the freehold. But the general course of modern decision, both in England and in the American courts, is against adopting, as the criterion for determining the character of chattels 760 *as fixtures, whether the annexation to the realty be slight and temporary, or immovable and permanent, and in favor of declaring everything a fixture which has been attached to the realty with a view to the purposes for which it is held or employed, however slight or temporary the connection between them. See 3 Smith's Lead. Cases, seventh American edition, 202, and cases there cited.

In the present age, the marvelous increase of manufactures have called into existence numerous establishments, in which the building is the mere incident or accessory to the machinery or apparatus which it contains. As was said by Lord Mansfield, in Lawton, ex'or, v. Salmon, 1 H. Bl. 259: In cases of this description, to require substantial or even nominal annexation, would exclude things absolutely essential to the enjoyment or use of the freehold, and include others which are comparatively trivial and unimportant. Whatever is essential to the purposes for which the building is used will be considered as a fixture, although the connection between them is such that it may be severed without physical or lasting injury to either.

In accordance with this doctrine, it has been repeatedly held that a steam engine, erected for the purpose of furnishing the motive power of a manufactory, is to be regarded as a fixture, or, in other words, as a part of the manufactory itself; and there are numerous cases which hold that the machinery of a manufactory is to be regarded as part of the realty, whether it is attached to the body of the building, or merely connected with the other machinery by running bands or gearing, which may be thrown off at pleasure without injury to the freehold. See cases cited in note 2, Smith's Lead. Cases, supra.

761 *In cases where a building is erected for manufacturing purposes, the machinery gives character and value to the building, and not the building to the machinery. Each must lose its vitality and value by a separation from the other. The public good and individual interest are therefore both subserved by regarding them as substantially the same, and keeping them together.

It would seem absurd and inconsistent to make the presence of a ligature, a belt, or screw, or nail, essential to the operation of a rule, which is founded upon considerations of a different nature.

In Winslow v. Merchants Ins. Co., 4 Metc. R. 306, Chief Justice Shaw in an able and well considered opinion says: "The rule that objects must be actually and firmly affixed to the freehold to become realty, or otherwise to become personalty, is far from constituting a criterion. Doors, windows, blinds and shutters, capable of being removed, without the slightest damage to a house, and even though at the time of a conveyance or mortgage, actually detached, would be deemed a part of the house, and pass with it. And so we presume mirrors, wardrobes, and other heavy articles of furniture, though fastened to the walls by screws with considerable firmness must be regarded as chattels. The difficulty is somewhat increased when the question arises in respect to a mill or manufactory, where the parts are often so arranged and adapted, so ingeniously combined as to be occasionally connected or disengaged as the objects to be accomplished may require. In general terms, I think it may be said that when a building is erected as a mill or manufactory, and the water works or steam works relied upon to move it are erected at the same time, and the machinery *to be driven by them are essential parts of it, adapted to be used with it and in it, they are parts of it, and pass with it by a conveyance, attachment or mortgage." See also 1 Ohio 511, and cases there cited.

With regard to factories and the machinery necessary to carry out the purposes for which they are erected, the cases on which the subject differ only in this—some hold that there must be an actual attachment, however slight and temporary, in order to change the character of the chattels from personalty into realty; while others hold that there need be no actual annexation, if the machinery is essential to the objects and purposes for which the building in which the machinery is placed was erected.

In this case these distinctions, often nice and difficult, need not be considered; for in the case before us both of these considerations concur. The machinery was all affixed more or less firmly to the building; and it is admitted on all hands, that the purpose and object of the incorporation of the company, and the purchase of the land and erection of the buildings was to constitute a factory for the manufacture of sash, blinds, and doors and other building material, and that the building was a mere incident or accessory to the machinery and engine necessary and essential to carry out the primary and leading purpose of the manufactory.

The true rule deduced from all the authorities seems to be this: That where the machinery is permanent in its character, and essential to the purposes for which the building is occupied, it must be regarded as realty, and passes with the building; and that whatever is essential to the purpose for which the building is used will be considered as a fixture, although the connection *between them is such that it may be severed without physical or lasting injury to either.

It follows, therefore, that the engine and other machinery in the factory of this company were not personalty, and could not be taken under the executions of fieri facias caused to be issued by the appellees, and that the decree of the Circuit court dissolving the injunction was clearly erroneous.

I am therefore of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit court dissolving the injunction be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein according to the principles herein declared.

The decree was as follows:

This day came again the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decree aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that said decree was erroneous in dissolving the injunction awarded by the judge in vacation on the 21st day of January 1871; this court being of opinion that the motion to dissolve the injunction should have been overruled, and no sale allowed of the machinery levied on under the fieri facias sued out by the judgment creditors; but that said machinery could only be sold with the land and buildings to which they were annexed, and in which they were used; and that whenever it may be proper to decree a sale or lease of the land and buildings for the payment of the debts of the company, the machinery must be sold or leased with them. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that the said decree of said *Circuit court, dissolving said injunction, be reversed and annulled, and that the appellant recover against the appellees his costs by him expended in the prosecution of his appeal here; and that the cause be remanded to said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein. All of which is ordered to be certified to the said Circuit court of Rockingham county.

Decree reversed.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Absent, BOULDIN, J.

1. Practice—Executions.—F recovers judgment against M, on which execution is issued, but is stayed by order of plaintiffs' attorney. It appears, however, that some shares of stock were sold by the officer to satisfy the judgment; but there is no return of such sale by the officer. It appearing further, that the stocks did not sell for enough to discharge the judgment, F may have another execution, or bring another action for the balance still due.

2. Same—Appearance by Counsel—Judgment.—In an attachment suit by F against M, there is no service of process on M, or order of publication; but there is a declaration in assumpsit with a special and general count, and counsel appears for him and pleads, and the cause is tried by a jury and judgment for F. The record affords at least prima facie evidence, that the counsel was authorized to appear for M, and defend the action.

3. Same—Same—Same—Effect.—In a suit by attachment, if the plaintiff recovers judgment against the defendant, without his appearance, such judgment will have no effect in another State, as a personal judgment against the debtor. But if the defendant appears and defends himself in person or by attorney, then the judgment will have the same force and effect everywhere, as a judgment recovered in an ordinary suit.

4. Same—Judgments—Validity—Presumption.—In such a case the record may show upon its face that the debtor did or did not appear; and if it does, the judgment will have effect accordingly. If the record does not show whether he did or did not appear, the presumption is in favor of the validity of the judgment.

5. Same—Same—Effect in Foreign State.—But in such case, if the record does not state that the debtor did or did not appear, or even if it states that he did appear, in a suit upon this judgment in another state, the defendant may by his pleading and evidence aver and prove the contrary.

766 *6. Same—Foreign Attachments in Equity—Affidavit.—In a foreign attachment in chancery, the affidavit required by the statute may be made by the agent of the plaintiff, and it may be made after the suit is brought.

7. Same—Same—Same.—If in such affidavit the affiant swears that the matters and things set forth in the bill are true, he adopts the bill as part of the affidavit.

8. Same—Bill and Scire Facias—Variance.—Where the bill sets out a judgment correctly, as stated in the record of the judgment, there is no variance because a scire facias issued against garnishees, recites it as of a different amount, or that the endorsement on the papers by the clerk, of the proceedings in the cause, of the date of the judgment, is different from that stated in the bill.

*Foreign Attachments in Equity—Affidavit.—The affidavit, required by the statutes to authorize a creditor to sue out an attachment against the effects of an absent debtor, may be made either before or after the bill is filed. *O'Brien v. 9. Same—Suit on Judgment—Conclusiveness.—In a suit upon a judgment, the questions whether it was an illegal contract on which the judgment was recovered, or whether the agent who made the contract was authorized to make it, are concluded by the judgment.

This case was argued in Staunton, but was decided in Richmond.

In January 1871, Fisher & Brother, of Philadelphia, instituted a suit in equity, in the nature of a foreign attachment, in the Circuit court of Frederick, against Clement March, as their foreign debtor, and Richard Parker, the home defendant. In their bill they charge: That in the District court of Philadelphia they recovered a judgment against Clement March for $3,558.61, with costs, the whole amounting to $3,589.11, with interest on $3,558.61 from the 15th of May 1866, on which judgment execution issued, but was not satisfied; and that the said debt remained unpaid. And they file a copy of the record of the case. They say, that March is not a resident of the state of Virginia, but has effects in the county of Frederick. That he has an equitable interest in some land lying near Winchester. They pray that this interest may be sold to satisfy their debt, and for general relief.

The affidavit made by the agent of the plaintiffs when the attachment was 767 sued out being insufficient, *another affidavit was made by the same agent on the 7th of April 1871. In this affidavit he swears that the matters and things set forth in said bill are true; that he verily believes the debt set forth in the bill of $3,589.11, with interest on $3,558.61 from the 15th of May 1866 till paid, against Clement March, is justly due from him to the complainants; and at the time of the institution of this suit they were entitled to recover the said sum of money and interest, and have now a present cause of action therefor; and that the said Clement March is not a resident of the state of Virginia.

Parker answered the bill, stating that March had purchased a tract of land in July 1870 of about sixty-three acres, near Winchester; that he paid the cash payment, and received a deed for the land; and to secure the deferred payments which would fall due on the 4th of July 1871 and 1872, March conveyed the land to the defendant, as trustee, &c.

The record filed with the bill is the record of an attachment in the District court of the county and city of Philadelphia, brought in April 1866 by Fisher & Brother, to attach Clement March, late of said county, by all and singular his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, &c. The writ was endorsed to summon Charles Chamblos & Co., and several other persons as garnishees. The declaration was in assumpsit, and claimed, in a special count, the amount of two checks drawn by the defendant upon the Girard Bank, one, bearing date the 10th day of March, for $581.91, and the other, bearing date the 6th of April 1865, for $3,009.94. There were also the general counts in assumpsit.

There was no process served upon 768 March; but the record states, that the defendant Clement March pleads non assumpsit. J. C. Bullett, for the defendant.

At the May term 1866 a special jury was empanelled, and found a verdict for the plaintiffs for $3,558.61; and the court rendered a judgment for that sum, with costs. Upon this judgment an execution was issued against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of March, for $3,589.11, which included the costs; but proceedings upon it were stayed by order of the plaintiff's attorney.

After the judgment had been rendered, Fisher & Brother sued out a scire facias against Charles Chamblos & Co. as garnishees, in which, after reciting the attachment against the goods, &c., of March, and that the officer had summoned said Charles Chamblos & Co. as garnishees, and the suit had been so proceeded in that the said Fisher & Brother ought to recover from the said Clement March the sum of thirteen hundred and eighty-two dollars and seventy-three cents, which had been adjudged to them in that court, for their damages and costs about their suit in that behalf expended, the officer was directed to summon said Charles Chamblos & Co. to show cause, if any they can, why the said Fisher & Brother should not have execution of the goods, &c., of March in their hands.

Chamblos & Co. appeared in answer to this summons; and, in answer to interrogations, stated that they had in their hands certificates representing 9,275 shares of stock of Pennsylvania Mining Company, of Michigan, which had been left with them by Clement March for safe keeping. A judgment was rendered against them for this stock; and the execution which was issued upon this judgment recited the judgment recovered by Fisher & Brother 769 against March as for $3,589.11. This execution was also stayed by the plaintiffs' counsel.

There was also a scire facias against the Pennsylvania Mining Company, as garnishees, in which the judgment of Fisher & Brother was recited to be for $1,382.72. It does not appear that anything was done upon this proceeding; but it appears in the record, that the sheriff sold the Pennsylvania Mining Company's stock which was in the hands of Charles Chamblos & Co., and that it was purchased by Fisher & Brother at the sum of $742.

March did not answer the bill, but he put in four pleas; to which the plaintiffs demurred; and the court sustained the demurrer as to the first, second and fourth, and overruled it as to the third; and gave the defendant leave to amend the second plea. This second plea the defendant afterwards amended, and filed five additional pleas; to which the plaintiffs also demurred.

The cause came on to be heard on the 8th day of July 1872, when the court sustained the demurrer to the pleas Nos. 1, 5, 6, 7 and 8; held that No. 4 was not sustained by the proofs; but that the amended plea No. 2 and Nos. 3 and 9 were good in law and sustained by the proofs. And it was therefore decreed, that the plaintiffs' bill be dismissed with costs; and that the attachment sued out against the land of March be dissolved. And Fisher & Brother thereupon applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

The pleas, and the evidence in relation to the questions made by them, are sufficiently set out in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Moncure.

770 *George Tucker Bispham and L. T. Moore, for the appellants.

Dandridge and Pendleton, for the appellee.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a foreign attachment suit in equity brought in the Circuit court of Frederick county, by Fisher & Brother of Philadelphia, against Clement March of New Hampshire, for the purpose of subjecting an interest which the said March has in a tract of land in the said county of Frederick, to the payment of a judgment obtained by the said Fisher & Brother against the said March in a foreign attachment suit in the District court for the city and county of Philadelphia, for the sum of $3,558.61, with costs, amounting in the whole to $3,589.11, with interest on the first named sum from the 15th day of May 1866. The said March filed no answer to the bill filed in the suit in Frederick Circuit court, but made his defence entirely by pleas, which he filed at different times during the pendency of the suit, to the number of nine in all. By the final decree, made in the suit on the 8th day of July 1872, six of these nine pleas were not sustained; the demurrers to five of them, to wit: Nos. 1, 5, 6, 7 and 8 having been sustained, and the other of the six, to wit: No. 4, not having been proved; but three of them, to wit, Nos. 2, 3 and 9, were held to be good in law, and sustained by the proofs; and therefore the bill was dismissed with costs, and the attachment sued out in the cause was dissolved.

The errors assigned by the appellants, in the decrees complained of by them, are founded on the action of the Circuit court upon the said three pleas, Nos. 2, 3 and 9, which we will now consider in their order.

771 *Plea No. 2 as Amended.

"And the defendant by way of amendment, by leave of the court, to the pleas formerly filed in this cause, says that the execution upon the judgment on which this suit is based, which appears by the record to have been issued, and under which certain property of said defendant was taken, was never returned to the office from which it was issued, and that until said execution shall have been returned to said office, the plaintiffs have no right to sue upon said judgment; and further, that as, under the execution which was upon the judgment now sued on, it appears by the record that 9,275 shares of Pennsylvania Mining Company stock, belonging to the defendant, was sold by the sheriff, and the same delivered by him to the plaintiffs, the said seizure of said stock, and its delivery to the plaintiffs, must be taken as payment in full of said judgment and execution; and that therefore the plaintiffs have no right to sue; and further, that it appears by the record, that by virtue of the execution issued on the judgment now sued on, from the office in which the same was obtained, 9,275 shares of Pennsylvania Mining Company stock, belonging to defendant, was delivered to plaintiffs; and the acceptance of the said stock must be taken as satisfaction in full of said judgment and execution."

It appears by the record, that only two executions were issued upon the judgment aforesaid, one of them against the defendant in the attachment, Clement March, and the other against the garnishees, Charles Chamblos & Co.; and both of them were returned by the sheriff, with a stay of proceedings endorsed thereon by the plaintiffs' attorney. It does not appear from any re-

772 turn of endorsement on either of *them, that either of them was levied on anything. But it otherwise appears from the record that they were in fact levied upon the shares of stock aforesaid, which were sold by the sheriff and purchased by the plaintiff at 8 cents per share, making the whole purchase money $742, which operated as a credit to that extent, on account and in part of the executions; leaving the entire balance of the debt, interest and costs, for which the said executions were issued, still remaining unpaid. There can be no doubt but that for the recovery of the said balance the plaintiffs had a right to sue out other executions upon the said judgment, or to bring another action or suit thereon, notwithstanding the said levy and other proceedings had under the executions aforesaid.

It follows, as a necessary consequence from what has been said, that we are of opinion the Circuit court erred in holding the said plea No. 2, to be good in law and sustained by the proofs.

Plea No. 3 is in these words:

"And for further plea the defendant says, that it does not appear from the record in this cause, that any process for appearance was ever served upon defendant, in person or by order of publication; and although an appearance by attorney is entered of record, such appearance was unauthorized by the defendant."

It is true that it does not appear from the record in the said cause, that any process for appearance was ever served upon the defendant, in person or by order of publication. But is it true that the appearance by attorney which was entered of record, was unauthorized by the defendant?

We think not. The record shows that a declaration in assumpsit, embracing several counts, both special and the common, was filed in the case; there was a 773 *rule to plead; in answer to which, the defendant appeared by J. C. Bullett his attorney, and filed a plea of non-assumpsit; the issue upon which was tried by a special jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs' claim; on which verdict a judgment was accordingly entered. The record thus shows that the defendant did appear by attorney in the case: and if the record be not conclusive upon that question in this case, it certainly affords very strong prima facie evidence of the fact, and ought to prevail, in the absence of stronger evidence to the contrary de hors the record. So far from there being such stronger evidence to the contrary, we think the evidence de hors the record tends strongly to support, rather than to contradict, the record in this respect. Mr. Bullett, in his deposition taken in the case, says: "I am a member of the bar, and have been for twenty years. I represented Clement March in a judgment obtained by Fisher & Brother against him. I cannot state from my present recollection, at what time I received authority from Mr. March to appear in that case. I had been the counsel of Mr. March prior to that time, and I may have appeared in the case without previous authority; though I suppose I had authority from him. I have no recollection on the subject. (His testimony was given more than six years after the transaction occurred.) It is not very likely that I would have appeared for him without authority." Witness wrote to Mr. March on the day on which the judgment was obtained, and said in the letter: "Judgment was obtained this morning against you for $3,558.61; the debt being proved by your clerk Mr. Hunter. I understand there is more than sufficient in he hands of the garnishees to pay the judgment. I think that you had better send an order to have any amount that is in 774 their hands paid *over to me, after the judgment is satisfied." Witness further says: "I have no recollection whether I ever received any letter from Mr. March in regard to it or not. Mr. March never made any objection to my appearing for him, to my recollection. I have never seen him since."

Mr. Bullett's deposition was afterwards taken again; on which occasion a paper in the case of Fisher v. March and Chamblos, &c. garnishees, taken from the records of the District court aforesaid, and which had been mislaid at the previous taking of his deposition, was shown to the witness, when he testified as follows: "The paper shown me is a copy of an order, signed by Mr. March upon Charles Chamblos, with a receipt of Fisher & Brother attached, and was filed by me, according to my best recollection now, under instructions which I received at the time, I suppose, from Mr. Chamblos. I was at the time representing Mr. March as his attorney in this case. I recollect that I was frequently importuned by the Messrs. Fisher or their counsel, I think by both, to direct Mr. Chamblos to hand over the stock referred to. This I refused to do without Mr. March's authority. Finally the authority was produced, in the shape of the order dated November 13, 1866, a copy of which is set out in the paper now shown me; and I then drew the receipt, or had it drawn by a clerk in my office, which is set out in the paper before me, and endorsed upon that paper the words, 'Filed by consent of counsel for plaintiff, defendant and garnishees,' and signed it as counsel for the defendant and garnishees. I had no doubt at that time, as to my authority to act as attorney for Mr. March in signing that endorsement and making that arrangement. The original order, obtained, as I believe, by Mr. Fisher from Mr.

March, was submitted to me before 775 *I drew the receipt or filed the papers.

I certainly had no doubt of my right to act as Mr. March's counsel, or I would not have acted."

This is certainly very strong testimony to show that Mr. Bullett's appearance as counsel in the case was authorized by Mr. March. Now what testimony is there in the case tending in any way to show the contrary? Only the testimony of Mr. March himself, who certainly does not say that Mr. Bullett was not his counsel in the case. The most that he says is, that he had no recollection of having ever authorized Mr. Bullett to appear and defend any suit brought against him by Fisher and Brother in the year 1865 or 1866, in Philadelphia; and that he had no recollection of having ever received any letter from Mr. Bullett, advising him that any such suit had been brought against him. But he had just said, in qualification of his answer in regard to another part of the same transaction, "I am speaking from recollection of six years' standing, and do not know that I am strictly accurate." And in answer to a question, "Who was your counsel in Philadelphia before you left there?" he said, "John C. Bullett." This testimony of the defendant himself is wholly insufficient to disprove a fact which is so strongly sustained by the evidence on the other side.

We therefore think that the Circuit court erred in holding that plea No. 3 is good in law and sustained by the proofs.

Plea No. 9 is in these words:

"That the judgment now sued on was obtained under foreign attachment proceedings, by virtue of the location within the jurisdiction of the court rendering the said judgment of certain effects of said defendant, to protect which said effects, 776 John C. Bullett, *an attorney practicing in said court, appeared; and that the said judgment was obtained by virtue of and against those effects only; and that therefore no action thereupon can be entered in this court against said defendant."

The ground of the defence involved in this plea is, that the proceeding in Philadelphia was purely an attachment proceeding, having for its object the subjection of certain specific effects of the defendant to the payment of the plaintiffs' claim; that the appearance of the defendant's attorney had reference only to the protection of the said effects, and not to the prevention of a judgment against the defendant personally, for the recovery of a debt, except as a means of protecting the said effects; that a person, whose effects are attached in a state in which he does not reside, has a right to appear for the purpose of defending his effects, without subjecting himself to a personal judgment which may be enforced against him in another state; and that therefore the judgment recovered against the defendant personally, in the attachment proceeding in Philadelphia in this case, cannot be enforced against him in this state under the constitution of the United States, article 4, section 1, and the act of May 26th, 1790, passed in pursuance thereof.

We think that no sufficient authority can be found to sustain this ground of defence, and that it is in conflict with the principle of all or nearly all of the cases on the subject. There may possibly be in some of the states attachment proceedings of a peculiar kind, having reference only to the property and not to the person of a debtor. These proceedings, if there be any such, are altogether in rem, and there is in them no personal judgment against the defendant.

And though he may appear to defend his property against a judgment, such 777 *appearance will not make the judgment which may be rendered against him in such proceeding a judgment, which may be enforced against him personally, even in the state in which it is rendered, much less in any other state.

But such is not the general nature of attachment proceedings. On the contrary, their general and almost universal nature is two-fold—first, to obtain a judgment by a creditor against a debtor for the amount of the debt claimed; and, secondly, to subject by attachment certain property or credits of the debtor to the payment of such debt. The first enquiry in such cases always is, whether there be in fact any such debt, and what is its amount; and that enquiry is governed by the same principles as if the suit were an ordinary one by a creditor against a debtor. If the debtor will not appear and defend himself, in person or by attorney, the creditor will go on to establish his claim in the mode prescribed by law; and if he does so, will obtain a judgment, which will have such effect in the state in which it is rendered as may be given to it by the law of that state; but it will have no effect in another state as a personal judgment against the debtor. The debtor however may appear and defend himself in person or by attorney; and if he does, then the case is tried, as if the creditor and debtor were the only parties to the suit, and as if the recovery of a personal judgment for the debt were the only object of the suit; and the judgment which may be recovered in such a proceeding will have the same force and effect everywhere as a judgment recovered in an ordinary suit between creditor and debtor. The record may show upon its face whether the debtor did or did not appear, and if it does, then the judgment will have effect accordingly.

But it may not show upon its face
 778 *whether the debtor did or did not appear. In that case the presumption would be in favor of the validity of the judgment. But the defendant would have a right in such case, by his pleading and evidence, to aver and prove the contrary; and he would have such right, even though the record should state upon its face that the defendant did appear. Of course we are now speaking of the effect of the judgment elsewhere than in the state in which it is rendered. Its effect there depends upon the law of that state.

In support of the foregoing positions we need only refer to 6 Rob. Pr. 434-439; 2 Smith's Leading Ca. 827, 841, 6th Am. ed.; 2 Am. Lead. Ca., Mills v. Duryee; and the cases cited in those works. See also Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn. R. 380; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. U. S. R. 457; Knowles v. The Gaslight and Coke Co., 19 Id. 58; and Hill v. Mendenhall, 21 Id. 453; and the authorities referred to in those cases.

In the case under consideration, there can be no doubt but that the attachment proceeding of Fisher & Brother versus Clement March, in the District court for the city and county of Philadelphia, was of that general nature which made it proper to ascertain in the first place, whether the debt claimed by Fisher & Brother to be due them by March, was in fact due. The attachment was to appear and answer. There was a declaration in assumpsit filed, containing all the usual counts. There was a rule upon the defendant to plead. He accordingly appeared by attorney and plead non assumpsit. And there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, all in the form usual in an ordinary action of assumpsit for the recovery of a debt. The proceeding was had in the city of Philadelphia, where the cause of action arose; where the defendant had long resided, and had 779 transacted business to an *immense amount—which place he left less than a month before the proceeding was commenced, with the declared intention of soon returning to his former residence and place of business. It does not appear that he had any estate or effects elsewhere. It was therefore manifestly his interest to appear and defend himself in the said proceeding, if he had any such defence to make, and the presumption is he could better make it in Philadelphia, where the transaction occurred, than anywhere else. That such is the nature and effect of proceedings under the foreign attachment law of Pennsylvania, see 1 Brightley's Pendor's Digest, page 716, title "Foreign Attachment," page 721, § 28. It is there expressly declared to be lawful for any defendant in an attachment, at any time before judgment obtained in the attachment, to cause an appearance to be entered for him, and to make defence to the action; in which case the action shall proceed as if commenced by a summons; but the attachment will continue to bind the estate and effects attached; and if judgment be rendered for the plaintiff, such judgment will have the like force and effect as in case of an action commenced by a summons." See also Blyler v. Kline, 64 Penn. St. R. 130.

We are therefore of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in holding that Plea No. 9 is good in law and sustained by the proofs. And this disposes of all the errors assigned by the appellants.

But the appellee assigns errors in the rulings of the court, which it will be necessary to notice. They need however only to be noticed briefly.

In regard to the credit claimed for $742, the proceeds of the sale of the Pennsylvania Mining stock, the Circuit court 780 made no decree upon that subject. *Of course the defendant is entitled to that credit, and will receive it.

In regard to the affidavit to the bill, if it be not now too late to object to it, we think it is substantially sufficient, if it be not in strict and literal compliance with the law. We speak especially in reference to the second affidavit, which was made on the 7th day of April 1871. It is no valid ground of objection to that affidavit that it was made after the institution of the suit, nor that it was made by the agent of the plaintiffs instead of the plaintiffs themselves. The affidavit states that "the matters and things set forth in the bill are true," and thus adopts it as part of the affidavit.

In regard to the pleas, the demurrers to which were sustained by the court, or such of them as to the action of the court upon which the appellee complains. The first of these is the fourth in the series of the pleas, to wit: the plea of no such record. Two grounds seem to be relied on in support of this plea—1st, that the amount of the judgment is differently stated in different parts of the record, whereas the bill in this case states but one of these amounts; and 2dly, that the date of the judgment is differently stated in different parts of the record; in one being stated as in May 1866, and the other as October 21st, 1870. In regard to the first of these grounds, the amount of the judgment is $3,558.61, the amount claimed in the bill; and there is no variance in the statement of the amount anywhere in the record of the judgment; but the special counts in the declaration, and the verdict and judgment, all correspond in that respect. There is an unaccountable variance from that amount in the writs of scire facias against the garnishees; but even that is corrected in the writ of fieri facias against the variance. The apparent variance in the scire facias against the garnishees is immaterial in this case. In regard to the second of these grounds, to wit: the different dates of the judgment, the true date, according to the record, is May 15th, 1866, the date of the verdict. The only apparent variance from that in the record, if it can be said to be in the record, is in the index or minutes of the proceedings, from which it would appear that the date of the judgment was October 21, 1870. But this variance is immaterial in this case, and we must regard the true date as that which is mentioned in the body of the record, to wit: May 15th, 1866.
 781 *garnishees, which is for the true amount of the judgment, as is also the fieri facias on the original judgment. The record sued on is the record of the original judgment, in which there is no

The second of the pleas in regard to the action of the Circuit court on which the appellee complains is the seventh of the series; and, indeed, the eighth involves the same matter of defence, to wit: that the debt is founded on a stock-jobbing and gambling transaction, which is contrary to the law of Pennsylvania, and to public policy here as well as there, and fatal to the claim of the appellants, notwithstanding the judgment recovered by them in the attachment proceeding in Philadelphia. In regard to this ground of defence, the counsel for the appellants in their brief say, "that in the court below the point was made, that the contract upon which the judgment was obtained was a 'time' contract, and that it was prohibited by the laws of Pennsylvania. The point is not perhaps of importance in this court; but it may not be improper to note that the act of assembly prohibiting such contracts was repealed by the act of April 17th, 1862. (Supplement to Pendon's Digest, p. 1,266.) Such contracts are 782 now *constantly enforced by the courts in Pennsylvania. See Smith v. Bouvier, 20 P. F. Smith 325, 70 Pa. St. R. 325." On the other hand, the counsel for the appellee in their brief insist that "there is no repeal of those laws which applies to this case." However that may be, we think it is a sufficient answer to this ground of defence, to say that there is no evidence in the record of the law of Pennsylvania on this subject; and, even if there was, and it was as contended for by the counsel for the appellee, the question would be concluded by the judgment rendered in the attachment case in Pennsylvania, to the judgment of the court, in which case it properly belonged, to decide the question, if it had, as it might have been raised therein.

In regard to the question raised by the sixth plea, as to the authority of Hunter to sign the checks, that question is, of course, concluded by the judgment obtained for the amount of these checks.

Having noticed, as far as seems to be necessary, the errors assigned in the decree of the Circuit court, whether on the side of the appellants or appellee, we are of opinion, that the said court erred in holding that pleas No. 2, 3 and 9 are good in law and sustained by the proofs; but did not err in not sustaining any of the other pleas; and that the said decree ought to be reversed and annulled so far as it is in conflict with the foregoing opinion, and affirmed so far as it is consistent therewith, with costs to the appellants; and the cause remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein to a final decree in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

The decree was as follows:

This case, which is pending in this court at its place of session in Staunton, having been heard but not determined 783 *there, this day came the parties here by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the decrees aforesaid, and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the appellants, Fisher & Brother, are entitled in this suit to a decree against the appellee, Clement March, for the amount of their claim in the bill mentioned, to wit: $3,589.11, with interest on $3,558.61, from the 15th day of May 1866; being the amount of a judgment recovered by said Fisher & Brother against said March in a foreign attachment suit in the District court of the city and county of Philadelphia, of which suit a copy of the record is filed with said bill; subject however to a credit for $742, as of the 17th day of July 1866, being the amount made on that day by a sale of certain stock under execution issued on said judgment; and are further entitled in this suit to a decree subjecting to the payment of said claim, or the balance due thereon after the application of said credit, any estate, debts or effects of the said March in the said county of Frederick; and that the said Circuit court erred in holding that pleas No. 2, 3 and 9 are good in law and sustained by the proofs; and in dissolving the attachment sued out in this cause against the land, &c., of the defendant March; in directing that the sum of one hundred and twenty-nine dollars and seventy-one cents (with its accrued interest), in the hands of the special receiver in the case, be by him paid to A. R. Pendleton, of counsel for said March; in dismissing the plaintiff's bill; and in decreeing that the said defendant recover of the plaintiff his costs in that behalf expended.

Therefore it is decreed and ordered, that so much of the decrees appealed from 784 as is in conflict with the *foregoing opinion be reversed and annulled, and the residue thereof affirmed; and that the said March pay to the said Fisher & Brother their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here. And it is further decreed and ordered that this cause be remanded to the said Circuit court of Frederick county, to be proceeded in to a final decree in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

And it is ordered that this decree be entered on the order book here, and be forthwith certified to the clerk of the Supreme Court of Appeals at Staunton, where the case is pending, who shall enter the same on his order book, and forthwith certify it to the clerk of the said Circuit court of Frederick county.

Decree reversed.

785 *McVeigh & al. v. The Bank of the Old Dominion.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

I. Negotiable Notes—Effect of War—Notice.*—M owned a large real estate in Alexandria, and was president of the Bank of the Old Dominion located in that city. In 1861 M endorsed seven notes made in March and on to June by J, which were discounted at the bank. Before any of these notes fell due the Union forces took possession of Alexandria, and held it till the end of the war. A few days after they came M left the city, and joined his family, who had left some time before; he leaving at his dwelling a white servant, and having had his place of business at the bank. He remained at Richmond, within the Confederate lines, until the end of the war. Two of the notes had been made and discounted for M's accommodation, and he received the proceeds. All the notes were protested for non-payment as they fell due, and notice of dishonor was left at his house, with the white servant left by M there, except one, which was left at his place of business at the bank: and no other notice was ever given him. Held:

1. Same—Same—Notice to Endorsers.—The notice was not sufficient to bind M as endorser on the notes.

2. Same—Same—Same—Accommodation.—On the notes made and discounted for his accommodation, M was liable without notice.

3. Same—Same—Same—Same.—Though the declaration is special upon the note, and avers demand and notice to the endorser, the plaintiff may prove on the trial that the note was made and discounted for the accommodation of the endorser, and that he received the proceeds, and recover in the action, though no notice, or an insufficient notice, was given to the endorser.

4. Statutory Application.—The statute directing how notices may be given, does not apply to a notice of the dishonor of negotiable paper. Code of 1860, ch. 167, § 1, of 1873, ch. 163, § 1.

5. Same—Payment in Confederate Money.—The fact that the makers of these notes paid to the branch of the bank at P, in Confederate money, the 786 full amount of the *notes, under the act of assembly authorizing it, the branch not having the notes at the time, does not constitute a payment; though after the war the bank took possession of all the assets of said branch, including the funds so paid in.

II. Same—Effect of War—Validity.—A note made in June 1861, by a person resident within the Confederate lines, and discounted by a bank located within the Union lines, is illegal and void: unless it was given in renewal of a note made before the war, and by an agent acting under authority conferred before the war.

III. Same—Same—Liability of Joint-Maker and Endorser.—In an action against J & E, partners, as makers, and M as endorser of a negotiable note, the process is served on J and M, but is again and again returned as to E, "not found," or "no inhabitant," and the action is discontinued by the plaintiff as to E.—E is not thereby released from liability on the note, and therefore M, the endorser, is not released; and the plaintiff may have judgment against J and M.

IV. Same—Place of Payment.—J & E, partners, living in the city of Alexandria, made a note dated at Alexandria, and payable at the Bank of the Old Dominion, which is located in the said city, which is endorsed by M, the president of the bank, and discounted by said bank. Held: That it is not necessary to state on the face of the note that it is payable in the State of Virginia, to bring the note within the statute; Code of 1860, ch. 144, § 7, of 1873, ch. 141, § 7; but it may be shown by evidence that the place of payment is within the state.

The facts in this case are set out in the opinions of Moncure P. and Anderson J. There was a judgment in the court below in favor of the Bank of the Old Dominion; and the defendants applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was awarded.

Wattles, Jno. Howard and Beach for the appellants.

Cloughton for the appellee.

Moncure P. This is an action of debt brought by the Bank of the Old Dominion against James H. McVeigh and Edgar McVeigh, late copartners trading under the firm name of J. H. McVeigh & Son, and William N. McVeigh, as drawers and 787 endorser of *seven protested negotiable notes, amounting together to the principal sum of sixteen thousand five hundred dollars. The action was brought on the 18th day of August 1870, in the Corporation court of the city of Alexandria. Process was executed and rules taken regularly, against the defendants James H. McVeigh and William N. McVeigh; but not against Edgar McVeigh, as to whom the process was several times returned "not found," and "no inhabitant;" and after the cause had been for some time continued at rules for service as to him, it appears that on the first Monday in March 1871, on the motion of the plaintiff, an order was made to abate the suit as to the said Edgar McVeigh; though it appears from the record that on a previous day, to wit: on the 10th day of October 1870, the cause was docketed as to all the defendants, including the said Edgar McVeigh. The defendants pleaded nil debet and payment, on which issues were joined, which came on to be tried in July 1871, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, in the sum of $12,323.55, with interest from January 1, 1866, on which verdict a judgment was thereupon rendered by the court; to which judgment, on the petition of the defendants, a writ of error was awarded by this court: and that is the case we now have under consideration.

The errors complained of, if they exist, appear in two bills of exceptions taken by the defendants to certain rulings of the court in the cause. The first presents a single question. The second presents all the other, and the most important, questions arising in the cause, and will be at once considered.

The second bill of exceptions of the defendants states, that on the trial of the cause, the plaintiff, to maintain the issues on its part, gave in evidence to the jury, seven promissory negotiable notes, 788 drawn by *James H. McVeigh & Son, and endorsed by William N. McVeigh, which notes are set out, in haec verba, in the bill of exceptions, also the notarial certificate of protest of the said notes, which certificates are also set out in haec verba, in said bill. The plaintiff then proved that James H. McVeigh and Wm. N. McVeigh were, on the 30th day of May 1861, residents of the city of Alexandria; that after the Federal forces occupied the city of Alexandria, on the 24th day of May 1861, the said James H. and Wm. N. McVeigh, on the 30th of May 1861, left their residences in the city of Alexandria, and went in the Confederate lines, where their families were on a visit; that said Wm. N. McVeigh left at his residence in Alexandria, a white servant and all his furniture, and left also his books and papers at the banking-house of the Bank of the Old Dominion, of which bank he was president; that Wm. N. McVeigh did not resign his office; did not formally notify the directors of his intended absence; that the officers of said bank, however, knew that said Wm. N. McVeigh had left Alexandria, and whilst within the Confederate lines, he was, in 1862, re-elected president of said bank; that Robert Crupper was the confidential clerk and attorney of James H. McVeigh & Son, and that the power from them to said Crupper, authorizing him to draw and endorse notes and checks in their absence, was deposited in the Bank of the Old Dominion; that Wm. N. McVeigh knew of Crupper's agency; that he had been, prior to the war, in the habit of intrusting his signature in blank with James H. McVeigh & Son, and that he had left said blanks with said McVeigh & Son, and that the same were left by McVeigh & Son in the hands of Robert Crupper when McVeigh & Son left Alexandria; that Wm.

N. McVeigh, just before leaving Alexandria in May 1861, *requested Robert Crupper to take care of his property, meaning thereby his real estate; that in June 1863, the said Robert Crupper, claiming to act as the agent of Wm. N. McVeigh, with the bank book of Wm. N. McVeigh in his possession, went to W. H. Lambert, the cashier of the Bank of the Old Dominion, and demanded of him four notes of Wm. Cogan, each for $500, which had been, prior to the war, deposited with said bank by W.

N. McVeigh for collection, and entered on his said bank book; that said plaintiff had previously refused to accept payment of said notes from Wm. Cogan in Virginia currency, because he was not authorized by Mr. McVeigh to do so, and because a rule of the bank prohibited receiving such money in payment of notes deposited for collection, but told said Crupper in the presence of said Cogan, that plaintiff would receive said money, in payment of debts due the plaintiff by Mr. McVeigh; that said Lambert then delivered the notes given by Cogan to said Crupper, taking his receipt therefor signed by him as agent, a copy of which is inserted in the bill of exceptions; that said Crupper collected said notes of Cogan in Virginia currency, and the plaintiff accepted the same of Crupper, and applied the amount, to-wit: $2,379, by direction of said Crupper, to the note sued on, bearing date the 17th day of June 1861; that the firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co., composed of C. A. Baldwin & W. N. McVeigh, drew a check in the city of Richmond on the 29th day of January 1863, on the plaintiff in favor of Maria L. Baldwin, the wife of C. A. Baldwin, which said check is in the words and figures following to-wit:

January 29th, 1863.

Cashier Bank Old Dominion, pay to the order of Mrs. Maria L. Baldwin any 790 money she may call for, *taking receipt for the same on the back of this check, & charge same to our account.

C. A. Baldwin & Co.

Endorsed—Received June 10th 1863 of the Bank of the Old Dominion, eighteen hundred and fourteen 95-100 dollars on account of the within check.

Maria L. Baldwin; that said check was sent through the hostile lines, and Mrs. Baldwin handed it to Robert Crupper, who presented it to W. H. Lambert, the cashier; that Mrs. Baldwin was requested to put her name on the check and did so, but whether before or after the receipt was written thereon did not satisfactorily appear; that said Lambert acting under the direction of Crupper, claiming to be the agent of Wm. N. McVeigh, directed the balance due C. A. Baldwin & Co. from the plaintiff, to wit: $1,814.95, to be applied to the credit of the note sued on, dated the 17th of May 1861; that said Crupper at the time had in his possession the bank book of C. A. Baldwin & Co. and the said check, and that said Lambert thereupon made the entries in the bank book in the following words and figures, to wit: "'63, June 10. By check M. L. Baldwin, $1,814.95;" that the two notes dated 17th May and 17th June 1861 were discounted for the use and accommodation of Wm. N. McVeigh by the plaintiff, and the proceeds thereof were received to his own use; that Mrs. Baldwin never received one cent on said check; that she did not in person direct Lambert to apply the balance due C. A. Baldwin & Co. to the payment of the note of J. H. McVeigh & Son endorsed by Wm. N. McVeigh; that upon her return to Richmond she stated that she did not know what was done with the money —she had put her name on the back 791 *of the check, but had received no money; that said check was cancelled, and the check and bank book returned to Robert Crupper; that Mrs. Baldwin whilst in Alexandria stopped several months with Robert Crupper as his guest, who on her return to Richmond in July 1863, accompanied her to Annapolis; that the receipt on said check above the signature of Maria L. Baldwin, was made by, and is in the handwriting of Wm. H. Lambert; that said Crupper also collected of E. E. Hough $200 rent due from him as tenant of Wm. N. McVeigh, and took also from said Hough a note for $300, which was after the close of the war, sent by James H. McVeigh to Wm. N. McVeigh; that Wm. N. McVeigh was the owner of a large real estate in the city of Alexandria which was confiscated during the war, and said Crupper was apprehensive that the balance due C. A. Baldwin & Co. and the Cogan notes might also be confiscated; that Wm. H. Lambert stated that Robert Crupper acted generally as the agent of Wm. N. McVeigh, and assigned, as the acts of agency within his knowledge, the action of Crupper with the plaintiff in the matter of the Cogan notes, the check of C. A. Baldwin & Co., the payment of the notes endorsed by Wm. N. McVeigh, the possession of Wm. N. McVeigh's bank book, and his renting out one of his houses.

The defendants then proved that after the occupation of Alexandria in 1861 they left their homes in Alexandria as aforesaid, and that C. A. Baldwin & Co., whilst residing in Richmond, gave the check above described to Mrs. Baldwin, to be carried through the lines, or sent it to her through the hostile lines; that after the close of the war, Wm. N. McVeigh wrote to the officers of the Bank of the Old Dominion for his papers and books, which had been 792 left at the bank *when he left his home in 1861. Sometime in 1865 the papers, including the bank book and check, were forwarded to him in Richmond, but by whom it was not known or proved. There was also returned the receipt of George H. Smoot, president pro tem. of the bank, in the following words and figures, to wit: "Received, Alexandria, June 10th, 1863, of J. H. McVeigh & Son, per Maria L. Baldwin, $1,814.95, which sum is endorsed as a part payment of J. H. McVeigh & Son's note for $2,500, dated May 17, 1861, and endorsed by Wm. N. McVeigh, due August 15th-18th, 1861, discounted and due to Bank of Old Dominion, and lying over under protest, as will appear per bank book. Geo. H. Smoot, president pro tem.;" that on the 30th day of May 1864, James H. McVeigh & Son paid to the branch bank of the Bank of the Old Dominion at Pearisburg the full amount of the notes sued upon in Confederate currency, which was received by said branch; that, at that date, the average value of one dollar in gold, compared with Confederate notes, was from eighteen to twenty-one; that the said C. A. Baldwin & Co., upon the receipt of the said papers and book from the Bank of the Old Dominion, on the 12th of February 1866, addressed a communication to the bank in the following words and figures, to wit:

Richmond, Va., Feb. 12, 1866.

Mr. Geo. H. Smoot, President Bank of the Old Dominion, Alexandria, Va.:

Sir,—We hold statement of our account with Bank of the Old Dominion, showing a balance due to us of $1,815.05. No part of that fund has ever been drawn with our authority, and we hold the bank responsible for the same. The amount pretended 793 to have been *paid on check, dated January 29th, 1863, to Mrs. Maria L. Baldwin, of $1,814.95, we repudiate as a fraudulent transaction.

Very resp'y, your ob't serv't,
 C. A. Baldwin & Co."

It was further proved that the plaintiff, in the fall of 1865, sent commissioners to take possession of the assets of the branch bank at Pearisburg, which was done, and the plaintiff, on the 30th of June 1866, published a statement, of which a copy is inserted in the bill of exceptions. It was also proved that J. H. McVeigh & Son were within the Confederate lines during the war, and that C. A. Baldwin and Wm. N. McVeigh were at Richmond during the war, doing business there, and have so continued until the present time (to wit: the time of the trial); that Crupper died in November 1865; that Wm. N. McVeigh was in Alexandria twice after the close of the war, and before the death of Crupper, and saw Crupper on both occasions; that Crupper was an honorable and high-minded gentleman; that the earliest disaffirmance of the agency of Crupper by Wm. N. McVeigh was the letter of C. A. Baldwin & Co. from Richmond, of February 12th, 1866; that the notes of the 8th and 17th of June 1861 were renewals of notes given before the war.

And this being all the evidence, the plaintiff prayed for eleven instructions, of which the court gave the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh and tenth, and refused the rest. The defendants then prayed for twelve instructions, of which the court gave the first, second, eighth, ninth, tenth and twelfth in the form in which they were asked, refused the fourth and fifth in the form in which they were asked, but gave them with a modification, and refused 794 the rest altogether. To *which several rulings of the court, in granting instructions prayed for by the plaintiff, refusing instructions prayed for by the defendants, and giving with a modification the fourth and fifth prayed for by the defendants, the latter excepted.

The jury having returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants moved the court for a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence; but the court overruled said motion; to which ruling of the court the defendants also excepted. And these two exceptions are embraced, and are all that are embraced in the defendants' second bill of exceptions.

I will now proceed to consider the questions presented by this bill of exceptions in the order in which they arise, commencing with the first instruction asked for by the plaintiff, which was given.

The first instruction asked for by the plaintiff is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the notes sued on were duly protested, and due notice of the protest given to the endorser, they must find for the plaintiff, although they believe from the evidence, that the amount of said notes was paid by the defendants at the branch of the Bank of the Old Dominion at Pearisburg in the month of May 1864, in depreciated Confederate currency, while the notes sued on were in the possession of the plaintiff, in the city of Alexandria."

That the court below did not err in giving this instruction, is, I think, conclusively shown by the case of the Bank of the Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 457, which is, in all material respects, identical with this case, in regard to the question involved in this instruction. The counsel for the defendants insists that there was error in granting so much of this instruction 795 tion*as is embraced in these words:

"If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the notes sued on were duly protested, and due notice of the protest given to the endorser, they must find for the plaintiff," &c.; and that whether "due notice of the protest was given to the endorser," was a question of law or a mixed question of law and fact, and ought not to have been indiscriminately referred, as it was, to the jury. Certainly it was a mixed question of law and fact; and so was the whole question involved in the general issue joined on the plea of nil debet, which the jury were sworn to try. The object of that instruction was, not to refer to the jury the particular question of the sufficiency of the protest and notice, but to declare to them that, supposing such sufficiency to exist, they must find for the plaintiff, although they might believe from the evidence that the amount of said notes was paid by the defendants at the branch of the Bank of the Old Dominion, Pearisburg, in the month of May 1864, in depreciated Confederate currency, while the notes sued on were in possession of the plaintiff in the city of Alexandria. In other words, the object was to declare to the jury, that what was relied on by the defendants as payment of the notes, was in fact no payment at all. The question of the sufficiency of the protest and notice was referred to the jury by other instructions. The plaintiff asked for eleven, and the defendants for twelve instructions, which, or such of them as were given, seem to inform the jury upon all the questions of law arising in the case. I think there is no error in the plaintiff's first instruction.

The second instruction asked for by the plaintiff is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the endorser Wm. N. McVeigh, after the making and endorsing of the said notes, left 796 the *city of Alexandria, and was absent from said city at the time of the maturity of said notes; and that notice of demand and protest was left by the notary at the residence of the said endorser, with a white servant of the endorser; such notice is sufficient in law, and the jury must find for the plaintiff; provided they also find, that at the time of said notice, the said McVeigh had a residence in the city of Alexandria."

I think there is no error in this instruction. It merely declared to the jury this plain proposition: that if the endorser's place of residence, both at the date and maturity of the notes, was in the city of Alexandria, and notice of the dishonor of the notes was left by the notary at such place of residence; such notice is sufficient in law; although the endorser, after the making and endorsing of the notes, left the said city, and was absent therefrom at the time of the maturity of the notes. That the word residence was used in two different senses in the same instruction, can make no difference. It is very plain in what sense it is used in each instance; and that it involved a question of law as well as of fact, is an objection that has already been sufficiently answered.

The plaintiff's third instruction is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that after the making and endorsing of the notes sued on, the endorser Wm. N. McVeigh, left the city of Alexandria, and was absent from said city at the time of the maturity of said notes, and the same were duly protested, and due notice of demand and protest left at the place of business of said endorser, with a white person employed at such place, such notice was sufficient to bind the endorser, and the jury must find for the plaintiff; provided they 797 also find that at the time of said notice, *the said McVeigh had a place of business in the city of Alexandria."

I think there is no error in the instruction, for the same reasons which have been assigned in answer to the objections made to the 1st and 2d instructions. It merely declares to the jury the same principle in regard to place of business, which the 2d instruction declares in regard to place of residence. A notice of dishonor is sufficiently served by being left, either at the place of residence, or the place of business of the person entitled to such notice. It is objected by the defendants' counsel, that "there is not a particle of evidence disclosed in the record" to show who Ramsey was, to whom, at the Bank of the Old Dominion, the notice of protest directed to W. N. McVeigh was delivered; whether he was white or black, or what connection he had with the bank or the said McVeigh, &c. I think it may be plainly inferred from the evidence that he was a white person, and an officer of the bank, a part of whose duty it was to receive such notices.

The plaintiff's 4th instruction was: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that any of the notes sued on were made by James H. McVeigh & Son for the accommodation of the said Wm. N. McVeigh, and that they were discounted for the use of W. N. McVeigh, and that he received the proceeds of the same; then no notice of demand and of protest of such notes was necessary to bind the said endorser, and the jury must find for the plaintiff as to such notes."

In the cases supposed by the instruction, Wm. N. McVeigh was in fact the principal debtor, though in form a mere endorser; and it seems to be admitted by the counsel of the defendants (which is certainly true in fact), that in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, the said endorser might be 798 made liable for the debt as a *principal debtor. But it seems to be supposed by the counsel, that in a special action of assumpsit, founded on the endorsement of the notes, there must be, not only an averment, but also proof, of demand, dishonor, protest and due notice of the same to the endorser, to authorize a recovery against him. There can be no doubt but that if the action in such a case be specially upon the endorsement of the notes, the plaintiff might aver that the notes were made, endorsed and discounted solely for the accommodation of the endorser, and such an averment would be a sufficient excuse for not averring demand, dishonor, protest and notice as aforesaid. The only doubt, if there be one, in the case, is, whether it is necessary for the plaintiff, where he sues specially upon the endorsement of the notes, to set forth his matter of excuse specially in his declaration; or whether he may, in the common form, aver therein demand, dishonor and protest of the notes and due notice of the same to the endorser, and prove his matter of excuse on the trial, in support of his averment in the declaration. Would this apparent variance between the allegata and the probata be real and fatal? Certainly the objection is purely technical. Is it valid?

According to the English practice, as it seems to be now settled, if no notice has been given at any time, because the holder had an excuse for not giving it, the excuse ought to be set out on the record—4 Rob. Pr. 443. "If," says Parke B., "it has been given, but at a time which would be too late in usual course, the matter of excuse might, probably, be used to show that it was, under the circumstances, in reasonable time; but if never given at all, the record must show a sufficient excuse." Id; Carter v. Flower, 16 Mees. & Welsb. R. 743. The 799 circumstances amounting to a dispensation *of notice must be pleaded as such. Allen v. Edmundson, 2 Welsb., Hurlst. & Gord. R. 719. Both of these cases are cited in 4 Rob. Pr. 443. On the other hand the American practice seems to be well settled otherwise. Id. 441-2, and the cases cited; 2 Smith's Leading Cases, Wallace's notes, p. 74. In Shirley v. Fellows, Wadsworth & Co., 9 Porter R. 300. the analogous cases are examined, and it is decided that the declaration may be in the ordinary way, and proof of such facts as dispense with the necessity of notice will, in law, be proof of notice. See also Campbell v. Bates, 11 Conn. R. 487, 493; Patton v. McFarlane, 3 Penn. & Watts. R. 419; Spann v. Baltzell, 1 Florida R. 302, 326. Also Norton v. Lewis, 2 Conn. R. 478, and Windham Bank v. Norton, &c., 22 Id. 213; Redfield & Bigelow's Lead. Ca. 417.

I prefer the American to the English practice; as our growing policy has been to discourage technical objections, which are apt to stand in the way of the justice of a case; and there has yet been no decision of this court on the subject. I am therefore of opinion, that the court below did not err in giving the 4th instruction asked for by the plaintiff.

The 5th instruction asked for by him was refused. His 6th is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that Robert Crupper was the agent of Wm. N. McVeigh, during the war, and authorized by him to act as his agent under appointment made while the said Crupper, plaintiff and McVeigh were on the same side of the belligerent lines, and as such agent demanded and received the Cogan notes from the bank; and that the said Crupper, as such agent, collected the amount of the said notes, and paid the amount collected on the note in suit upon which said credit appears en-

800 dored; and that said note was one *that was made for the accommodation of said endorser and the proceeds of which were received by him; such credit binds the said McVeigh, and the jury must find accordingly."

I think there was a sufficient foundation for this instruction in the evidence, and if so there can be no valid objection to it. I therefore think the court below did not err in giving it.

The 7th instruction asked for by the plaintiff is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that Robert Crupper was the agent of Wm. N. McVeigh, under appointment made while the said Crupper, plaintiff and McVeigh were on the same side of the belligerent lines, and as such agent called on the officers of the Bank of the Old Dominion with the check of C. A. Baldwin & Co., written and signed by McVeigh as a member of said firm, and endorsed by Maria J. Baldwin in the form required by the terms of said check, and directed such officer to apply the same to the credit of the note sued on, upon which said credit is endorsed, and that said note is one made for the accommodation of the said Wm. N. McVeigh, and discounted for his use, then such credit is binding upon the said McVeigh, and the jury must find accordingly."

The only objection taken to this instruction is, that it is "clearly in the teeth of Bilgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 393." I do not think that it is. That case might have applied if this suit had been brought upon the check. But this suit was brought upon the note to which the money on which the check was drawn was applied as a credit. By the agency of Crupper, and by the means of the check, the balance standing on the books of the plaintiff, to the credit of C. A. Baldwin & Co., was applied to the credit of a debt due *by Wm. N. McVeigh, one of the firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co. and the draftsman of the check, to the plaintiff. I can see nothing in this transaction, which is contrary to the case of Bilgerry v. Branch. If the plaintiff has given to McVeigh a credit to which he is not entitled, the latter has no good cause to complain of it; and if by that means an improper appropriation has been made of the funds of C. A. Baldwin & Co. in the Bank of the Old Dominion, the latter would still remain liable to the former for those funds. I am therefore of opinion that there was no error in giving this instruction.

The 8th, 9th and 11th instructions asked for by the plaintiff were refused. The 10th was given, and is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the said Wm. N. McVeigh and C. A. Baldwin & Co. were notified of the fact that Robert Crupper, as their agent, had made said transactions with the plaintiff, and did not, as soon as they received such notice, or in a reasonable time thereafter, disaffirm such agency, they are bound by the acts of said Crupper."

This instruction is founded on the well-settled rule of law, that a principal who is informed of the acts of his agent, done under color of his authority, and does not in a reasonable time thereafter object to such acts as unauthorized by the terms of the agency, is presumed to acquiesce in and confirm the said acts. This rule of law is not denied; but it is insisted in behalf of the defendants that the evidence does not warrant its application to this case, and does not afford a sufficient foundation for the instruction. I am of a different opinion, and therefore think the court did not err in giving the instruction.

Having considered all the instructions asked for by *the plaintiff and given by the court, I will now consider the instructions asked for by the defendants and refused by the court, or given with a modification.

The 1st and 2nd instructions asked for by the defendants were given. The 3rd was refused, and is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence aforesaid that the only notice of the non-payment and dishonor of the notes sued on, given to Wm. N. McVeigh, was the notice contained in the notarial certificate of protest, the said notice was invalid and inoperative to bind said Wm. N. McVeigh, and they must find for him."

Supposing the residence and place of business of Wm. N. McVeigh to have been in Alexandria at the times of the maturity of the notes, then certainly notice of dishonor could lawfully be served on him by being left either at his said residence or place of business, and the notarial certificates of protest show that such notice was so served on him according to the rules of the common law on this subject, or, as it is called, the law merchant. But the defendant's counsel contended that the rules of the common law have been modified by the Code of 1860, ch. 167, § 1, (which is the same as the Code of 1873, ch. 163, § 1,) and which provides that "a notice, no particular mode of serving which is prescribed, may be served by delivering a copy thereof in writing to the party in person; or, if he be not found at his usual place of abode, by delivering such copy, and giving information of its purport to his wife, or any white person found there, who is a member of his family, and above the age of sixteen years; or, if neither he nor his wife, nor any such white person be found there, by leaving such copy posted at the front door of said place of abode." By the Code of 1860, ch. 144,

§ 8, (which is the same as *the Code of 1873, ch. 141, § 8,) it is provided that the protest therein mentioned "shall be prima facie evidence of what is stated therein, or at the foot or on the back thereof in relation to presentment, dishonor, and notice thereof." In the petition for a writ of error in this case, the defendants by their counsel argued, that as "the certificates of protest" of the notes sued on in this case "all show that the notices were left at the dwelling of the endorser in the hands of his white servant, without alleging that the servant was over the age of 16" years—"a fact not to be presumed, but to be shown affirmatively"—the said certificates show upon their face that the law was not complied with, and that the notice required was not served in the mode prescribed by law; and therefore that the said endorser is not liable.

The counsel who argued this case in this court seemed not to rely on that ground, and, at all events, I think it very clear that the statute before referred to, in regard to the mode of serving notices, was not intended to embrace notices of dishonor of negotiable paper, which are still governed by the law merchant, as they were before the enactment of the said statute.

The defendant's 3rd instruction seems to have been asked for solely with the view of declaring that the statute aforesaid applied to the case, and that, according to the statute, due notice of the dishonor of the notes had not been given to the endorser, who is therefore not liable.

But one of the counsel who argued the case for the defendants in this court, while not seeming to rely on the said ground taken in the petition, insisted in his argument that the said 3rd instruction ought to have been given on another ground: that "it brought up directly for adjudication the question of the sufficiency *of the formal notices of the demand and protest, left at the abandoned late residence of the endorser, when it was known by the holder that, in the sudden and awful emergency of a great civil war, he had observed his allegiance to their common state, and had joined his family within her bosom, and that communication of notice to him was both illegal and impossible;" "that such a futile formality was, under the anomalous and altogether extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, no notice at all; that notice for the time was impossible, without any misconduct on the part of the endorser; and that impossibility of notice excused delay in giving it, but that the excuse of impossibility was only an excuse for delay until the impossibility was removed. And as the facts upon which the instruction was based were ascertained and undisputed, the question raised was a pure question of law, and should have been decided by the court upon those facts in favor of the defendants, and thus ended the case."

I do not think that the facts upon which it is thus sought to raise that question, from the action of the court in refusing to give this instruction, were ascertained and undisputed; and the court might, therefore, on that ground, have properly refused to give the instruction. But as the question must be considered and decided, if not now at all events when we come to consider the action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial, it may be as well to consider it at once. I therefore proceed to do so.

The question then is, whether, admitting the facts to have been as supposed by the defendants' counsel, this was a case in which notice of the dishonor of the notes, by the holder to the endorser, was duly given or wholly excused; or was a case 805 in which it was impossible *to give such notice at the regular time, by reason of war, and the giving of it at that time was therefore excused; but the excuse was not permanent, and was only for a delay until the impossibility was removed. See 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills 522, 531-2, cited by the counsel for the defendants.

Where the holder and endorser of a negotiable note reside in the same city at the time of the dishonor of the note, notice of such dishonor may be given by being left at the residence or place of business of the endorser; as was done in this case. Where they reside in different cities, or at different places, between which there is a regular mail communication, such notice may be sent by post; and that is the best mode of giving it. Where they reside in different states or countries when the contract of endorsement is entered into, such notice must still be given, or due diligence must be used by the holder to give it. Where the endorser changes his residence from one place to another in the same state, after endorsing the note and before its maturity, he is still entitled to notice of its dishonor, if his new place of residence is known to the holder, or can be ascertained by him by using due diligence; but where such change of residence is from one state to another state or country, the holder is not bound to give such notice, and the liability of the endorser becomes absolute and unconditional without it. Where the holder and endorser reside in different states or countries at the time of the endorsement and maturity of the note, and war arises between such states or countries between those periods, and continues to exist at the time of such maturity, the impossibility which thus arises of then giving such notice is a legal excuse for not doing so. The excuse, however, is not permanent, but is only for a delay

806 until the impossibility *ceases, when due notice must be given. Where the holder and endorser resided in Virginia at the time of the endorsement of the note, but before its maturity the late civil war broke out and a military line was drawn between the places of residence of the two, which rendered it impossible to give notice of the dishonor of the note at the regular time, it was necessary to give it in due time after the impossibility was removed. Where the holder uses due diligence to ascertain the place of residence of the endorser at the time of the maturity of the note without being able to do so, he is altogether excused from giving such notice, and the liability of the endorser then becomes fixed and absolute, and the holder is under no obligation to give such notice, even though he may afterwards discover the place of residence of the endorser. So also, where the holder, using such due diligence, is wrongly informed as to the place of residence of the endorser, and transmits notice by post according to such information, the liability of the endorser becomes thereby fixed and absolute, and the holder is not bound to give any other notice, even though he be afterwards correctly informed as to the residence of the endorser. The foregoing seem to be well settled principles of law, as the following authorities will show: 2 Rob. Pr. new ed., pp. 176, 177, 191, 192, 193, 194 and 195 and the cases cited; 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, pp. 477, 487-490, 522, 527, 528, 531, 532, 448-463; Leading cases upon Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes by Redfield & Bigelow, pp. 404, 410, 447, 450, 452; McGruder v. The Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat. R. 598; Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Peters R. 578; Williams v. Bank of the U. S., 2 Peters R. 96; Bank of Utica v. Bender, 21 Wend. R. 643; Hopkirk v. Page, 2 Brock. R. 20; House v. Adams & Co., 48 Penn. State
807 *R. 261; Taylor v. Snyder, 3 Denio R. 145; Foster v. Julien, 24 New York 28; Adams v. Leland, 30 Id. 309; Lambert & al. v. Ghiselin, 9 How. U. S. R. 553; Farmers Bank of Va. v. Gunnell's adm'r, supra, 131.

The case under consideration is peculiar in some of its circumstances; and the question arises, what principles apply to it, and whether, according to those principles, the endorser is liable?

At the date and discount of all the notes, except two of them which will be hereafter noticed, all the parties thereto, the makers, endorser and holder, resided, and had places of business, in the city of Alexandria, and the holder, the Bank of the Old Dominion, continued to reside, and have its place of business there, until and after the maturity of the notes. But before the maturity of the notes the late civil war broke out, and the forces of the United States invaded and took possession of the city of Alexandria, and continued to hold such possession until the end of active hostilities, in April 1865. A few days after such invasion, the makers and endorser of the notes left the city of Alexandria, crossed the military lines into that part of the state of Virginia which was under Confederate authority, and remained there during the war, engaged in business most or nearly all of the time. When Wm. N. McVeigh left Alexandria, he had been preceded by his family, who then in the neighboring county of Fauquier, on a visit, where they were rejoined by him. It does not appear that he left with any intention to change his residence; at least unless he should be compelled to do so, by the continuance and effects of the war; but, on the contrary, no doubt he expected the war to terminate much sooner than it did, and intended to return and continue to reside, and 808 transact business in, Alexandria. *He was president of the Bank of the Old Dominion, and his place of business was the said Bank, when he left in May 1861; and at the expiration of his term of office he was re-elected president in 1862. He left a white person in care of his mansion house, and an agent, Robert Crupper, at least to watch over and preserve his real estate, of which he had a great deal in the city. Under all these circumstances, no doubt both the Bank of the Old Dominion and Wm. N. McVeigh considered, that the latter continued to have his place of residence and of business in the city of Alexandria at the time of the maturity of the said notes; that he had left there cum animo revertendi; and that he would soon be able to return, and would return, to the said city. The first battle of Manassas was fought in July 1861, and won by the Confederates; and about the same time but shortly thereafter all these notes were protested for non-payment. After that victory was won, no forward movement was made by the enemy for a long time, and the highest hopes were indulged by us that the war would soon be ended in our favor. Accordingly notice of the dishonor of the notes was left at the said residence or place of business of the said endorser McVeigh in Alexandria; the notice in the former case being left in the hands of his white servant at his said residence, and in the latter being delivered to G. W. D. Ramsey at the said bank; the said servant and said Ramsey being respectively informed at the time, that said endorser was held liable for the payment of said notes respectively. In all of the cases except one the notice was left at his said residence, or "dwelling" as it is called in the certificates of protest, "in the hands of his white servant." If due notice was given, or due diligence used to give it, according to the circumstances existing at *the time of the dishonor, the rights of the parties then become fixed, and are not changed by a change of circumstances afterwards.

Now the question is, did the holder, the Bank of the Old Dominion, do all that was necessary to be done to fix the liability of the endorser McVeigh and make it absolute? Certainly that was the case if it can be considered that at the time of the maturity of the notes McVeigh's place of residence and of business continued, in contemplation of law, to be in Alexandria; at least for the purpose of giving notice of dishonor?

How far then, if at all, is the case altered by the facts aforesaid, in regard to the removal of McVeigh from Alexandria, and his crossing the military lines into that part of the state which was under Confederate authority, and remaining there until after the war? Did those facts render it necessary that notice of the dishonor of the said notes should be given to him after the end of the war, to make his liable as endorser?

Certainly I do not doubt his perfect right, if it was not his duty, to leave Alexandria, cross the military lines, and remain on the Confederate side during the war, as he did. And certainly I do not think that he ought to be punished for having done so.

But the question is, who ought to bear the loss of these dishonored notes, the holder or the endorser; and that question must depend upon the settled rules of law. Each of these parties has his rights, which must be accorded to him. The holder advanced the amount of the notes on the faith of the liability of the endorser; which liability, it is true, was merely conditional. But has not the holder performed the condition? Did he not give due notice

810 of the dishonor? *And has he not done everything that due diligence required of him? If the endorser did not actually know that the notes were not paid at maturity, and that he was held liable for their payment, (the makers of the notes, his brother and nephew, I believe, having left Alexandria at the same time and for the same cause with himself, and having remained on the same side of the military lines with him,) he could easily have ascertained that fact by enquiry, at least after the war was over. And under the circumstances, was it not incumbent on him to make such enquiry if he was interested in knowing the fact, and did not already know it, as he no doubt did? The holder, the Bank of the Old Dominion, was certainly not in fault in bringing on the war and producing the cause which induced the endorser to leave Alexandria and cross the military lines. And when the notes were dishonored, the holder gave all the notice of such dishonor which could then possibly be given. How then can it be said that the holder was in default?

The endorser had, undoubtedly, a right of election to remain in Alexandria or to cross the lines. Had he remained in Alexandria, the notice of dishonor which was given by the holder would certainly have been sufficient. He chose to cross the lines, and in doing so, no doubt acted patriotically. But he thereby took upon himself the burden of enquiring into the fact of the payment or non-payment of the notes at maturity, and did not throw upon the holder the burden, of not only giving such notice as they could and did when the notes were dishonored, but also a new notice to the endorser after the war was over. If he did not actually appoint an agent to receive such notices during his absence, he might and ought to have done so.

I have seen no case, and we have 811 been referred to *none, precisely in point with this, and those which seem to bear the closest analogy to it, are McGruder v. The Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat. R. 598; Redfield & Bigelow's Leading Cases 447, S. C.; and the cases which have followed it, referred to in the note to that case in the Leading Cases p. 449; and the cases referred to in 2 Rob. Pr. (new) p. 176. In that case it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the removal of the maker of a note after its date and before its maturity, into another jurisdiction from that in which the note was executed, will excuse the holder from making a personal presentation and demand. For the same reason, a like removal of an endorser will excuse the holders from giving notice of dishonor. In the note, Id., it is said that "the doctrine of the above case is well settled. See Taylor v. Snyder, ante p. 145, and note; Adams v. Leland, 30 New York R. 309; Foster v. Julien, 24 New York R. 28. But the question, whether, in case of removal into another jurisdiction, presentment should be made at the payer's last abode, has given rise to some conflict;" and cases on each side of the question are referred to in the note. But as the notices in this case were left at the endorser's last place of abode, except one of them which was left at his last place of business in Alexandria, it is unnecessary to examine those cases. In the case of McGruder v. The Bank of Washington, supra, presentment was made at the maker's last place of abode, which was of course held sufficient; but it was not decided in that case, because the question did not arise, that such presentment was necessary. That it was sufficient, however, is enough for the purposes of this case.

I have not relied upon the case of Ludlow v. Ramsey, 11 Wall. U. S. R. 581, 812 although it seems to show *that if this case were before the Supreme Court of the United States, the judgment would be affirmed on the grounds on which that case was decided. But I am unwilling to place the decision of this case upon those grounds, the correctness of which I do not admit; and I think the grounds on which I have relied, and about the correctness of which I have no doubt, are amply sufficient to sustain the view I take of the case.

I am therefore of opinion that sufficient notice of the dishonor of the notes was given by the holder to the endorser in the case, and the former was under no obligation to give any other, to fix and make absolute the liability of the latter.

As the subject I have just been considering is, by far, the most important branch of the case, I will, at the risk of some repetition, present the following additional views thereon, which have been suggested to my mind since I wrote the foregoing, and which seem to me to be not only appropriate but conclusive.

There can be no commercial intercourse between persons on different sides of a belligerent line, during the war; and a civil war, such as our late war, stands in this respect, on the same footing with a war inter gentes. These are well settled propositions, and are affirmed by the late decisions of this court in Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 393; and Taylor v. Hutchinson, 25 Id. 536. I was one of the court when each of these decisions was made, and concurred in each; and I do not now, at all, doubt their correctness.

But this case involves a very different question from the one involved in those two cases. Here, there was no commercial or other intercourse between persons on different sides of a belligerent line. Here, the question is: Was the notice of dishonor 813 sufficiently served by being left at the residence or place of business *of the endorser? Or, if not, was the giving of such notice excused, under the circumstances of the case?

1st. Was the notice sufficiently served as aforesaid? Such a notice is always sufficiently served by being left, in due time, at the place of residence, or place of business of the endorser, whether it be ever actually received by him or not. If the endorser in this case had personally remained in Alexandria until after the dishonor of the notes, certainly such service of the notice would have been sufficient, notwithstanding he was attached to the Confederate cause. Suppose that on leaving Alexandria in May 1861, after the Federal forces had entered that city, he had informed the directors of the bank (he being then the president thereof,) that he expected and intended in a short time to return; and had requested, that if any notes endorsed by him and discounted at the bank, should be protested during his absence, notices of such protest should be left at his dwelling in said city, with a white servant he would leave there; would not notices left accordingly, have been sufficiently served? There cannot I presume, be a doubt that they would. Was not that precisely the effect of what actually occurred? He left Alexandria with a manifest expectation and intention to return as soon as the cause which induced his departure ceased to exist. He did not resign his office of president of the bank. He knew he was the endorser of several notes which had been discounted at the bank, and which would soon become due there, and no doubt could be protested, and that he would be looked to for payment. He gave no express instruction as to the manner in which he should be served with notice of protest in such cases. Why did he not do so?

Plainly because he knew, or had 814 the *best reason to believe, that such notice would be left with his white servant at his dwelling house, as the best possible mode of giving such notice to him. That mode was precisely the one which he desired to be pursued. If he did not so desire, was it not his duty as president of the bank, its chief officer, to leave such instructions on the subject as were proper with the officers of the bank who were to remain at their posts? Was it not necessary for him to do so, in order to conserve and to guard those interests which had been intrusted to his care? The interests of widows and orphans and others who owned the stock of the bank? Was not his counsel peculiarly called for in this trying exigency? If he considered it to be his duty as a patriot to leave Alexandria at that time and cross the belligerent line, was it not equally his duty, as an honest man and faithful officer, to advise his board of directors what to do in regard to the notes due to the bank on which he was an endorser, in order to ensure his liability for them? Was there any conflict in this case between patriotism on the one hand, and honesty and fidelity on the other? Could he not be patriotic, and at the same time honest and faithful? I think he could; and I think he intended to be so. I think he intended and expected the bank to do what it did do, in regard to these notes; and that the notice of dishonor was sufficiently served. But whether he so intended and expected or not, I think the notice was sufficiently served. He manifestly left Alexandria intending to return to the city as soon as the Federal forces left it; which he and everybody else interested in the subject, expected soon would be the case. Alexandria continued to be his place of residence when the notices of dishonor were left with a white servant in his dwelling house there. And therefore they were 815 *sufficiently served. But if not, I proceed to consider, 2dly. Was the giving of such notices excused, under the circumstances of the case?

When the federal forces entered and took possession of Alexandria, it did not thenceforward cease to be a part of Virginia, though the control of the state authorities over it was temporarily suspended during such hostile occupation, the prospective duration of which was wholly uncertain. It might terminate at any time. The citizens of Alexandria at the time of such occupation, or most of them, were attached to the Confederate cause. Many of them crossed over the belligerent line to the Confederate side, especially of those who were of suitable age to render military service.

But many, and probably most of them, especially of those who, from their age or otherwise, were non-combatant, remained at their homes; and remained with perfect safety, notwithstanding their natural and known predilections in favor of the Confederate cause. It does not appear from the record whether the plaintiff in error was of suitable age to render military service. The presumption is he was not, as it does not appear that he actually did engage in such service after he crossed the line. Had he so engaged, he would doubtless have brought the fact into the record. But I consider the fact as wholly immaterial. Whatever may be said, in a patriotic point of view, in regard to the propriety of a removal from Alexandria at that time to the Confederate side of the belligerent line, of those who were friendly to the Confederate cause, it cannot be said that there was any necessity for such a removal. It was purely a matter of voluntary election, however strong the patriotic motive may have been to make such removal, especially with those who could render military service.

In a commercial sense, and according 816 *to the lex mercatoria in regard to dealings with negotiable paper, the removal was voluntary. The Bank, the holder of the negotiable notes in this case, could not, legally, be expected to know what motives induced the endorser to cross the belligerent line, or what he intended to do after crossing it, or how long he intended or expected to remain there, and when he intended or expected to return to his home and place of business in Alexandria. And the necessity of giving notice of dishonor, and the manner of giving it, cannot depend upon considerations of that kind. The law merchant is a certain law, and its rules, especially in regard to negotiable paper, are fixed and definite. Here then the endorser, after endorsing these notes and before their maturity, voluntarily left his home and his place of business and crossed the belligerent line, whereby he interposed an insuperable barrier between himself and the bank, and made it impossible for the bank, at the time of the dishonor of the notes, to give him notice thereof, either personally or by communication through the mail. Was not the duty of giving such notice thereby excused? What did he lose by not receiving such notice? It would have been notice only of a fact which he well knew without such notice. And if he wished to know it better, if possible, or to be otherwise informed of it, he could easily have informed himself, at least after the war and as soon as notice could then have been given to him. It is true that it is immaterial under the law merchant, whether he was actually damaged or not by the failure to give notice, and he is entitled to his discharge irrespectively of that question, if, according to the certain and definite rules of that law his liability is not fixed. Still the question is a material element in determining whether, according to those rules, the 817 *duty of giving such notice is excused under the circumstances. If he desired to cross the line and remain on the Confederate side during the war, it was a small price to pay for the gratification of such desire, that the holder's duty of giving him notice of a fact which he already knew, should be dispensed with, and that he should be subjected to the little trouble of informing himself after the war was over, in regard to the dishonor of the notes, if he desired to be further informed on the subject; rather than the bank should be subjected to that trouble which it had no agency in causing. I am therefore of opinion that the duty of giving such notice was excused. But if it was not I am of opinion, and I think I have already demonstrated, that sufficient notice was actually given.

There could have been no difficulty in regard to demand of payment of the notes at the Bank of the Old Dominion, arising from the fact, that at the time of the maturity of the notes the makers and endorsers were on the Confederate side of the belligerent line. They could not, of course, cross the line to make such payment, nor send the money across for that purpose. But they could either have remained until after the maturity of the notes where they were when the notes were executed; or if they preferred it, as they did, they could have crossed over the line, taking care in the latter case to provide for the payment of the notes at maturity by the appointment of an agent for that purpose before they left Alexandria. Certainly it was the right and duty of the bank to receive payment of the notes at maturity from any person who might make such payment, provided there was nothing unlawful in the act of payment, as there certainly would not be in either of the two alternatives above stated. There is no necessity for any actual demand of 818 payment *of the notes in such cases by the holder of the maker, nor is any such demand ever made. It is only necessary that the notes should be at the bank at the time therein named for payment, ready to be delivered to the payer upon such payment. If payment be not made the notes are dishonored, and may forthwith be handed to a notary for protest, and notice to the endorsers. Thus there is, in all this operation, no need for any communication between persons on different sides of a belligerent line, and no necessity for any violation of international or other law. But whatever difficulty the war may have interposed in the way of payment of these notes at the time of their maturity, and even though it may have been impossible in consequence of the war to make such payment, the makers were not thereby legally discharged from their obligation to pay; them according to the terms of their contract; but both they and the endorsers were liable for all the consequences of non-payment, just as if there had been no war. Neither the act of God, nor of the public enemy, was sufficient to discharge or excuse them from the obligation to perform their contract. Such has been the settled law of the land ever since the leading case of Paradine v. Jane was decided by Chief Justice Rolle.

In every view of this question, therefore, I think the endorser is liable.

The 4th instruction asked for by the defendants was in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence, that on and after the 7th day of June 1861 the said James H. McVeigh and Wm. N. McVeigh were residing within territory held in the firm occupation of the forces of the Confederate States, and so continued to reside until the close of the war; and that the said plaintiff had its domicile from 819 said date, *and ever since in the city of Alexandria, held in the firm occupation of the forces of the United States during the war; then that the two notes sued on, one bearing date the 8th of June 1861, and the other June the 17th, 1861, are illegal and void, and they must on these notes find for the defendants." The court refused to give the instruction in this form, but gave it with the addition of these words: "Unless they also find that said notes were given in renewal of notes made before the war, and by an agent acting under authority conferred before the war."

The evidence tended to prove the facts stated in the addition made by the court to the instruction, and such being the facts, the court would have erred in giving the instruction as asked for, but did not err in modifying it and giving it in its modified form as aforesaid. An accommodation note given to be discounted at bank is generally given for a certain number of days, say 60 or 90, with the understanding that the accommodation is to be continued for a much longer time by a renewal of the note from time to time until the end of the period of the accommodation. In such case the successive renewals are not considered as new debts or contracts, but merely continuations of the original one; and though the original debt could not have been created between belligerents, yet if the original debt had been created between them when they were at peace with each other, and before they became belligerents, with an understanding and agreement between them that the accommodation should be continued beyond the time named in the note, by a renewal of it from time to time, then a note given for such renewal by an agent acting under authority conferred before the war, such agent and the holder being at the time

820 of such renewal on *the same side of the military lines, would be legal and valid.

The 5th instruction asked for by the defendants is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence aforesaid, that the said notes bearing date respectively the 8th and 17th days of June 1861 were made by the defendants whilst residing within the lines occupied and firmly held by the forces of the Confederate States, and that said notes were discounted by the plaintiff whilst the said defendants were within the Confederate lines as aforesaid, and that the plaintiff was at the time of the making and discounting of the said notes located and doing business within the lines firmly held and occupied by the forces of the United States, then that said making and discounting were illegal and void, and not binding on the defendants." The court refused to give the instruction in this form, but gave it with the addition of these words: "Unless said notes were given in renewal of notes made and delivered before the war, by an agent residing within the lines of the same belligerent with the plaintiff, and acting under an authority conferred before the war."

For the same reasons assigned in regard to the 4th instruction and modification thereof as aforesaid, I am of opinion that the court did not err in refusing to give the 5th instruction as asked for by the defendants, nor in giving it with the modification thereof as aforesaid.

The 6th and 7th instructions asked for by the defendants are in these words:

"6. If the jury shall believe from the evidence aforesaid, that the defendant, James H. McVeigh, in the year 1864 paid the notes sued on to the branch bank of the Bank of the Old Dominion at Pearisburg 821 *in Giles county, Virginia, and that said payment was accepted by said branch bank, then that said payment is a discharge of the said notes, although the same was made in Confederate money."

"7. But if said branch bank at Pearisburg had no lawful right to accept said payment in discharge of the notes sued on, yet if the jury shall believe from the evidence aforesaid, that after the close of the late civil war the plaintiff took possession of all the assets of the branch bank at Pearisburg, amongst which were means and assets acquired during the war by dealing in Confederate currency, and in which were embraced the payments made by James H. McVeigh & Son, and appropriated said assets to their own use, then such appropriation is an adoption and ratification of the act of the said branch at Pearisburg, and they must find for the defendants."

That the court did not err in refusing to give the said 6th instruction, is, I think, fully shown by the case of the Bank of the Old Dominion against McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 457, and by what has been already said in regard to the 1st instruction asked for by the plaintiff. Nor did the court err in refusing to give the said 7th instruction. If the defendants can have any claim against the plaintiff, arising from the latter's taking possession of the assets of the branch bank at Pearisburg, as stated in the said instruction (which is not admitted), their remedy for its recovery is not by way of defence to this suit, in which no such claim has, if it could have, been put in issue.

The 8th, 9th, 10th and 12th instructions asked for by the defendants were given by the court. The 11th was refused, and is in these words: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence aforesaid, that the check of

C. A. Baldwin & Co. on the plaintiff, 822 dated the 29th *day of January 1863, was drawn by the firm of C. A. Baldwin & Co. at that time in the city of Richmond, with a view of being sent through the hostile lines, and was so sent, received and acted on by the plaintiff, then such appropriation of the proceeds of a balance due C. A. Baldwin & Co. by the plaintiff, to the note of James H. McVeigh & Son, was illegal and void."

This is not an action brought upon the check, in which the legality of the check would be a material question. If, as the evidence tends to prove, Crupper, as agent of the parties concerned, with authority, conferred before the war, applied the balance in the Bank of the Old Dominion standing to the credit of C. A. Baldwin & Co., to the payment of the note of James H. McVeigh & Son, as mentioned in the instruction; such appropriation of the said balance was not illegal and void, even though such check may have been used in making it. But a sufficient reason for refusing this instruction is, that the defendants, instead of being prejudiced, are benefited, by the appropriation aforesaid; and if C. A. Baldwin & Co., who are not parties to this action, are injured by said appropriation, they have their remedy against the Bank of the Old Dominion, which, in that view, would still owe the said balance to them.

Having noticed all the instructions on both sides which are subjects of exception on the side of the defendants, I will now notice their exception to the ruling of the court refusing to grant a new trial because the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. The main, if not the only, question relied on in support of the motion for a new trial seems to be, as to the want or insufficiency of notice to the endorers of the notes. This question has already been fully considered by me in disposing of the 823 subject of the instructions, *and especially the 3d instruction asked for by the defendants. I will not therefore repeat here what I have already said in this opinion, in regard to this question. One of the counsel of the defendants contends that the verdict of the jury should have been in their favor, in conformity with the first and second instructions asked for by them and given by the court. I think both of these instructions ought to have been refused by the court; the first being in conflict with the case of McGruder v. The Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat. R. 598, and other cases of that class before cited; and the second being also in conflict with those cases, or else being a mere abstraction, and if given at all, ought at all events to have been so modified as to make it applicable to the evidence in the case. The jury no doubt considered from the evidence, that at the maturity of the notes, the endorser had not abandoned his residence in the city of Alexandria and acquired a residence within the lines of the forces of the Confederate States, but was only temporarily absent with the intention and expectation of soon returning to his home and place of business in Alexandria. According to that view of the facts, which was no doubt the view of the jury, they properly found a verdict for the plaintiff, even considering the law to have been correctly expounded in the first and second instructions asked for by the defendants. In any view of the law, however, I am of opinion that the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

In regard to the defendants' first bill of exceptions, it presents a question which seems to have been abandoned by them, as they have taken no notice of it in this court. I will therefore only say that I think it is not well founded.

Another objection taken by the de-824 fendants, for the *first time in this court is, that the action having been discontinued against Edgar McVeigh by order of the plaintiff; one of the principal debtors was thus released by the creditor, which operated, necessarily, a release of the endorser, Wm. N. McVeigh, who was a mere surety. Certainly a voluntary release of a principal debtor by a creditor, without the consent of the surety, operates a release of the surety. But has there been any such release of a principal debtor in this case? I think not. At common law, in a joint action against several defendants, ex contractu, it was a general rule that the judgment must be against all or none. There were exceptions to the rule; as in the case of the infancy, or bankruptcy, of one or more of the defendants; in which case they were entitled to be discharged on personal grounds, while the other defendants remained liable to judgment. So also, where one or more of the defendants died pending the action, it abated, as to them, and judgment was rendered against the survivors. Formerly, the joint debtors who died pending the action leaving others surviving them, were forever discharged from liability, at least at law; and the action could not be revived, nor a new action be brought against their representatives. Afterwards the law was changed in this respect by statute, and the representatives of one of several joint debtors or partners who died in the lifetime of another or others were declared to be liable for the debt. Code, ch. 141, sec. 13, page 988. So also, formerly, in a joint action ex contractu against several defendants, as it was generally necessary to obtain judgment against all or none, the plaintiff had to mature his action for judgment against all the defendants; and if some of them could not be found, they were proceeded against to outlawry, and the action was thus matured

825 against them. This proceeding *by outlawry being found inconvenient, a substitute for it, by proclamation and publication, was adopted by statute. 1 Rob. old Pr. p. 175.

Formerly, it was provided by statute that where the sheriff or other proper officer, returning the truth of the case upon any original or mesne process to him directed, shall make return that any defendant is not an inhabitant of his county or corporation, the suit shall abate and be dismissed as to such defendant, if the court from which such process issued have jurisdiction over such county or corporation only. Id. 174. In a case which arose under this statute, McCall v. Turner, 1 Call 133, the writ issued against three defendants, but was executed on one only; the other two being returned, "no inhabitant." As to those two the suit abated, and there was a plea by the other and a verdict and judgment against him. It was objected, that the action was on a joint bond, and that the plaintiff ought to have pursued all the obligors, and not entered an abatement as to those who were non-residents. But this court decided that the abatement was a regular and proper proceeding, and affirmed the judgment of the court below. So also, in Brown v. Belches, 1 Wash. 9, the writ was against two partners, but an abatement was entered as to one upon a return of "no inhabitant," and verdict and judgment were rendered against the other. The abatement which had been entered as to one was held to be regular, and the judgment against the other was affirmed. 1 Rob. old Pr. 174. Afterwards, by an act passed April 2, 1839, entitled, "An act regulating the proceedings against joint defendants," it was enacted, "that whenever an action shall hereafter be commenced against several defendants who may be bound jointly, or jointly and severally, and the process shall have 826 been executed on one *or more of them, and not executed as to the others, the plaintiff or plaintiffs may proceed with his or their cause against those defendants who have been arrested, and discontinue the same as to the others, or proceed against them separately, as they shall from time to time be arrested, until judgment be obtained against all, and executions may issue upon such judgments respectively, when obtained, as in other cases." This act was afterwards embodied in the Code of 1849, and continued in the Codes of 1860 and 1873; in the last of which, it may be found in ch. 167, sec. 50, p. 1096, in these words: "Where, in an action against two or more defendants, the process is served on part of them, the plaintiff may proceed to judgment as to any so served; and either discontinue it as to the others, or, from time to time, as the process is served as to such others, proceed to judgment as to them, until judgment be obtained against all." The same language is used in each of the Codes, and though it somewhat differs from the language of the act of 1839, the substance is the same.

In this case, after process had been served on all the defendants except Edgar McVeigh, and several times returned, "not found." or "no inhabitant," as to him; the plaintiff, in pursuance of the said provision of the Code, discontinued the action as to the said defendant McVeigh, and proceeded to judgment as to the other defendants. Certainly, it was never intended by the legislature that a defendant as to whom an action might be thus discontinued, should be thereby discharged from liability for the debt. The object of the law was to enable a plaintiff to obtain judgment against the defendants in a joint action as he might be able to mature his action against them; without being compelled, as formerly, 827 *to wait until he could mature the case for judgment against all at the same time. And it gives him the right, after taking judgment against such of the defendants as may have been served with process, to proceed in the same action to have it matured against the rest, and as matured to take judgments against them; or, at his election, to discontinue the action against the rest. In which latter case, the plaintiff may bring a new action against the defendants as to whom the original action may have been discontinued; who may, in such new action, make the same defence they might have made in the original action, whether served with process originally or afterwards. They would have the same advantage in making their defence in a new action, as they would have in the original one; and there is as much reason why the plaintiff should have a right to bring a new action against a defendant as to whom the original action may have been discontinued, as to proceed to have the original action matured and tried against the same defendants.

To be sure the act does not expressly reserve to the plaintiff the right to bring such new action. But the legislature could not have intended, if even it had the power, to discharge the defendant as to whom the action is discontinued, from liability. And it is more reasonable to infer an intention to reserve such right than an intention to give such discharge. Formerly, as we have seen, the law directed an action to be abated as to a defendant against whom the process was returned, "no inhabitant," and authorized the plaintiff to proceed to trial and judgment against the defendants who may have been served with process. Suppose the action was for a joint debt; could the law have intended that the defendant as to whom the action was thus abated, 828 should be discharged *from the debt?

The abatement, in that case certainly, was involuntarily on the part of the plaintiff, and was a legal necessity. It occurred very frequently, and whenever joint debtors resided in different counties and were sued in one of them. Could the legislature have intended, in every such case, to deprive the creditor of a part of the security for the payment of the debt due to him by his joint debtors? I think not. It may be said that the discontinuance is voluntary on the part of the plaintiff. But it stands in the place of an abatement on a return of "no inhabitant" under the former law. Each was intended for the benefit of the plaintiff, and to facilitate his remedy, though neither was intended to do any harm to the defendant as to whom the action is abated or discontinued; and certainly none could be done to him by leaving his liability for the plaintiff's claim just where it was before such abatement or discontinuance, and fully reserving to him all his rights of defence. This is not like the case in which a creditor voluntarily takes a bond of one of several joint debtors by simple contract; 5 Rob. Pr. p. 808; or brings an action and obtains a judgment against one of several joint debtors; Id. 622; in which cases, according to the common law rule, the debt would be merged in the bond or the judgment. But it is a case in which the common law rule is modified under the operation of a statute, and the doctrine of merger does not apply. Id. 823; Mason v. Eldred &c., 6 Wall. U. S. R. 231.

I am therefore of opinion that the discontinuance of the action against Edgar McVeigh does not affect the validity of the judgment against the other defendants.

Only one question more remains to be disposed of, and that question was argued 829 with great ingenuity by *the learned counsel for the defendants. It is, whether the notes come within the meaning of section 7, of chapter 144 of the Code of 1860; for, if they do not, it is argued that they do not come within the meaning of section eight of the same chapter, and the protest is not therefore legal evidence; and that being the only evidence introduced by the plaintiff to prove presentment, dishonor and notice thereof, there was no evidence before the jury of these indispensable facts to sustain their verdict; which ought, therefore, to have been set aside.

The Code of 1860, ch. 144, § 7 (which corresponds with the Code of 1873, ch. 141, § 7), is in these words: "Every promissory note, or check for money payable in this state at a particular bank, or at a particular office thereof for discount and deposit, or at the place of business of a savings institution or savings bank, and every inland bill of exchange payable in this state shall be deemed negotiable, and may upon being dishonored for non-acceptance or non-payment be protested, and the protest be in such case evidence of dishonor, in like manner as in the case of a foreign bill of exchange."

Section 8 (which is like the corresponding section of the Code of 1873) is in these words: "The protest, both in the case of a foreign bill, and in the other cases mentioned in the preceding section, shall be prima facie evidence of what is stated therein, or at the foot, or on the back thereof, in relation to presentment, dishonor and notice thereof."

It is argued that a promissory note or other instrument, to come within the meaning of § 7 aforesaid, must on its face be expressly payable in this state.

Now it is certainly true that such note, &c., must on its face be payable in this 830 state, because the section so *requires.

But it does not require that the state shall be expressly named in the note, &c. It is sufficient if the note, &c., on its face be "payable in this state," according to the legal rules for the construction of written instruments. The same rules which apply to the construction of wills, deeds and contracts, apply to the construction of promissory notes, &c. In all such cases the court of construction, in order to ascertain the meaning of the words used in the instrument, must, when necessary, be placed in the situation of the author of the instrument at the time of its execution, in the midst of all the circumstances which then surrounded him, and then read the instrument in the light of these circumstances. In that way the meaning, where at all doubtful on the face of the instrument, may almost always be ascertained with unerring certainty; and this is especially the case where there is a latent ambiguity:—as, for instance, where a city or a bank is named in the instrument, without designating therein the state in which the city or bank referred to is located. And it turns out, as is very often the case, that there are cities and banks of the same name in other states and countries than ours. Here is a plain and common case for the introduction of extrinsic evidence to remove the ambiguity which extrinsic evidence has disclosed; and almost always such evidence does remove it beyond all controversy.

Applying these rules to this case, it is perfectly certain that the Bank of the Old Dominion in the city of Alexandria in the state of Virginia, is the place at which these notes, on their face, are payable. They are dated at "Alexandria." They are payable at "Bank Old Dominion." There is a Bank of the Old Dominion in the city of Alexandria, in the state of Virginia. These notes were dis-831 counted at that bank, *were presented for payment and were protested for non-payment at that bank. They, or some of them, were renewals of notes previously discounted at that bank. All the parties to the notes, makers and endorsers, resided and transacted business at the time of the discount of the notes in the city of Alexandria, Virginia; and the endorser was president of the Bank of the Old Dominion there, and had his place of business at the said bank. Is it not then perfectly certain that these notes, dated at "Alexandria," and payable at "Bank Old Dominion," were in fact payable "in this state?" Would not such have been the construction of these words had they been used in any will, deed, or other written instrument, executed by an author surrounded by the same circumstances?

But it seems to be supposed, that because these notes are made negotiable, it was intended that everything which affected the question of their negotiability should expressly appear on their face; so as to exclude all possibility of the existence of any extrinsic fact which would show them not to be negotiable. If the legislature had intended to make so great a difference as this between the construction of these and other written instruments, it would surely have said so in plain terms. But where is the necessity for such a difference? If parties choose to express their meaning in their notes in such words as to make it doubtful, without the aid of extrinsic evidence, whether they were intended to be payable in this state, and therefore to be negotiable, this might make it necessary for parties to whom the notes were offered to be endorsed, to enquire, and satisfy themselves as to the fact of negotiability. This would, of course, make the currency of the notes more difficult. But that would be the only consequence. The notes

 832 being in *fact "payable in this state," according to the legal rules of construction, they would be in fact negotiable; just as much as if the state were expressly named on their face. In this case there could have been no doubt in regard to the place at which the notes were payable. They were not made for general circulation, but for discount at the Bank of the Old Dominion in Alexandria, Virginia, and it must have been perfectly well known by all the parties that they were payable in this state.

But they would have been negotiable had they been payable in another state, as the 11th section of the same chapter of the Code plainly shows. So that the omission of the name of the state on the face of the notes, could not possibly have affected or impaired the negotiability of the notes; and at most could only have affected the question as to the extent to which the protest would be evidence on the trial of an action upon the notes. Surely so small a consideration would be insufficient to account for so radical a change in the rules of construction of written instruments in regard to this class of them, when such change is not expressly made by law, and if made at all, must be matter of mere inference.

I am therefore of opinion that the notes sued on in this case are "promissory notes payable in this state at a particular bank," within the meaning of section 7 of the chapter of the Code referred to, and the certificates of protest accompanying them are, prima facie, evidence of what is stated in them, as provided by the 8th section of the same chapter.

Upon the whole I am of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Corporation court for the city of Alexandria, and that it ought to be affirmed.

833 *Anderson J. James H. McVeigh & Son, of the city of Alexandria, Va., were the makers of seven promissory notes, amounting together to $16,500, which were made payable at the Bank of the Old Dominion, to Wm. N. McVeigh, who was then also a citizen of Alexandria. The notes are as follows: one for $2,500, bearing date March 30, 1861; one for $1,200, bearing date April 20, 1861; one for $5,000, bearing date April 27, 1861; one for $800, bearing date May 11, 1861; one for $2,500, bearing date May 17, 1861; one for $2,000, bearing date June 8, 1861; and another for $2,500, bearing date June 17, 1861; each payable ninety days after date, and maturing in July, August and September 1861. The last two were renewal of notes, and one of which, and the one of date May 17th, are alleged to have been made and discounted for the accommodation of the endorser. All the rest were made and discounted as accommodation notes, for the benefit of the makers. It is alleged that each of them was duly presented at maturity, demand made, and refused, and thereupon protested, and notice thereof given to the indorser. And this suit was brought by the Bank of the Old Dominion in August 1870, against the makers and endorser, to recover the amount of said notes, with interest and charges of protest.

Said notes were made and indorsed whilst the makers and indorser were residents of the city of Alexandria, before the beginning of the late war, or before the parties were separated by belligerent lines—except the last two. But before their maturity war was flagrant between the northern states and the state of Virginia, which had withdrawn from the Federal Union, and had united with the Confederate States. And ment and demand *of payment is alleged to have been made and refused and protest, and the alleged notice to the indorser, the enemy had invaded and taken military occupation of said city, to wit: on the 24th of May 1861; and James H. McVeigh and Wm. N. McVeigh had left the city, to wit: on the 30th of May, and gone within the Confederate lines, with the knowledge of the officers of the bank (the family of the latter having preceded him), and neither of them had returned to Alexandria, but both remained within the Confederate lines during the war—Wm. N. McVeigh engaged in business in the city of Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy.

The record does not show the precise time when Edgar McVeigh, the son and partner of James H. McVeigh, left; whether before or after the departure of his father. But it is certified as a fact proved, that James H. McVeigh & Son were within the Confederate lines during the war.

The existence of war was recognized by the government of the United States more than a month before the invasion and military occupation of Alexandria. On the 19th of April 1861 proclamation of the blockade was made by the president. This was of itself conclusive evidence that a state of war existed. The Prize Cases, 2 Black's R. 635; Cuyler v. Ferrill, 8 Amer. L. Reg., N. S., p. 100. In Bigler v. Waller & al., a Circuit court case (Amer. L. Times Rep., vol. 3, No. 9, p. 159), Chase, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The actual beginning of the war against the United States doubtless preceded the proclamation of the president of 15th of April 1861, calling out the militia to suppress insurrection; but the proclamation declaring the blockade of the ports of the insurgent states, must be regarded as existence of civil war by the national government. That proclamation was issued on the 19th of April, and that date therefore must be taken as the date of the commencement of the war."

It would be needless and a waste of time at this day to argue that the late conflict between the American states was a war, in the legal sense, with all the incidents and consequences of a war, as they are known to the international law, since it has been so held repeatedly by the highest Federal and State courts.

In Brown v. Hiatts, 15 Wall. U. S. R. 177, 184, Mr. Justice Field says, speaking of the late war, "it is sufficient to state, that the war was accompanied by the general incidents of a war between independent nations; that the inhabitants of the Confederate States on the one hand, and the loyal states on the other, became thereby reciprocal enemies to each other, and were liable to be so treated without reference to their individual dispositions or opinions; that, during its continuance, all commercial intercourse and correspondence between them were interdicted by principles of public law, as well as by express enactments of congress; that all contracts previously made between them were suspended," &c.

In Harden v. Boyce, Brady, J. said: "The following cases establish the proposition that in the late rebellion there existed between the government of the United States and the Confederate States a state of civil war, in the sense of the international law, which brought with it the common incidents of war, and arrested all commercial intercourse and communication between the citizens of those states respectively. He cites the Prize Cases, 2 Black's R. 635; The Venice, 2 Wall. U. S. R. 258; The Wm. Bagaley, 5 Wall. U. S. R. 377; Hanger v.

Abbott, 6 Wall. U. S. R. 532; Allen 836 **v. Russell*, 12 Amer. L. Reg. 362.

To which may be added Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 425, and numerous other and more recent cases.

After the invasion of Alexandria, and its subjugation by the United States, although it was a city of Virginia, and claimed by the state to the last, its status and that of the Bank of the Old Dominion, and of all the inhabitants of the city, whatever might have been their individual dispositions or opinions, was that of hostility to the Confederacy and to the rest of Virginia which adhered to the Confederate government and to the inhabitants thereof. Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, supra; Brown v. Hiatts, supra, Mr. Justice Field; and the consequences and incidents of a war inter gentes applies to them. The foregoing propositions will hardly be controverted. With regard to them we are all of one opinion. They being conceded,

It is equally incontrovertible, that the McVeighs having cast their fortunes with the Confederacy, and thrown themselves under the protection of its government, to which they were giving aid and comfort, and living upon its territory, whilst the Bank of the Old Dominion remained on the United States side of the belligerent lines, within the power and under the government and control of that belligerent, it would have been unlawful for the makers to pay, or for the bank to receive payment from them of the notes in question at their maturity.

When the McVeigh's abandoned their homes in Alexandria, after they had been overrun by the northern power, and removed to keep within the Confederate military lines and under the Confederate flag, there can be no question which side they had espoused, the north or the south, the United States or the Confederacy; to which government they felt that their 837 *allegiance was due, to which they were friends, and to which they were foes. It matters not whether they abandoned their residences in Alexandria with the intention of returning or not. They evidently had no intention of returning as long as the city remained in the occupancy and under the dominion of the government of the United States waging war against their native State and the Confederacy. They were enemies to that government as long as it maintained the attitude of hostility and waged war against their country. On the other hand, the Bank of the Old Dominion adhered to the government of the United States. It remained on its side of the military lines, and continued subject to its power and control during the war; whilst the McVeigh's, from the time they left Alexandria as before stated, continued subject to the government of the Confederacy as long as the war lasted. They were thenceforth, upon well established principles of international law, enemies.

It was not lawful for the makers, whilst this relation subsisted, to pay the notes in question, or for the holder to receive payment from them. There is perhaps no principle of international law in relation to wars inter gentes, better established than this. In Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. R. 438, Chancellor Kent says, The idea that any remission of money may lawfully be made to an enemy is repugnant to the very rights of war. The law that forbids intercourse and trade must equally forbid remittances and payments. Payments or remittances of money by a subject or citizen of one belligerent to a subject or citizen of the other during the war is unlawful. See also Hoare v. Allen, 2 Dallas' R. 102; Willison v. Patterson, 7 Taunt. R. 438; Conn. v. Penn., 1 Peters C. C. R. 496. This principle has been repeatedly applied to 838 our war. **Life Ins. Co. v. Hall*, 7 Amer. L. Reg. 606; Coppell v. Hall, 7 Wall. U. S. R. 542, 557; Billgerry v. Branch & Sons, 19 Gratt. 397.

This being established, I hold that it was not lawful for the holder to demand payment, or to cause the notes to be dishonored for non-payment. It could not be lawful to demand of another what it is not lawful for him to pay or for you to receive. And the makers could not be held to be in default for not paying at maturity when the law forbade them to make payment and the holder to receive payment. In this I am sustained by this court in the case last cited. It follows that the protest was illegal and void.

Whilst demand of payment is not necessary where the place of payment is named in the instrument, to give the holder right of action against the maker of the note, it is necessary to give him right of action against the indorser, and to fix his liability. The indorser by his contract, only undertook to pay the note in case it was not paid by the maker upon due presentment and demand and refusal, and upon due notice thereof to him. They are precedent conditions, and unless complied with by the holder, there is no contract or undertaking, by the indorser to pay the note. Edwards on Bills & Prom. Notes, pp. 265, 268. The holder is required to do two distinct acts in order to charge the indorser. First, to make presentment and demand of payment of the maker; and if not paid, second, to give notice to the indorser of the dishonor of the note. Id. p. 483. In this case, we have seen, that it was unlawful for the makers to pay, or the holder to receive payment, by reason of their being separated as enemies by war; and therefore the makers could not be held in default for non-payment. A man cannot be held in default for not doing 839 what *the law forbids. "No default can arise from a compliance with the law." And the indorser by his contract only undertook to be liable in case of the default of the makers. To hold him liable because of the non-payment by the makers when by the intervention of the war, which he did not create and was powerless to prevent, it was made unlawful, not to say criminal, for the makers to pay or the holder to receive, it seems to me, would be unreasonable, unjust, and arbitrary.

But if there had been a lawful demand on the makers, and protest of the notes in question, has there been due notice of their dishonor, so as to make the conditional undertaking of the indorser absolute and to fix his liability to pay them? It is true the protest states that notice was left at his residence in Alexandria, with his white servant, in all the cases except one, and in that one at the Bank of the Old Dominion, which is described as his place of business.

At the date of the first notice the existence of the war had been formally recognized by the government at Washington, more than two months, and at the date of the last it had been raging for nearly five months and a half; nearly as long as it took, in the late French and German war, to overthrow one of the most powerful empires in the world. And when those notices to McVeigh were left at his house, or the Bank of the Old Dominion, in Alexandria, they, together with the whole city had been in the military occupation of the enemy, and subject to its control and dominion for thirty odd days, to near five months, and had ceased to be the residence and place of business of Wm. N. McVeigh, for about the same length of time; he being with his family, within the Confederate lines, and separated from them as by a wall of fire: And this was known to the officers of the bank at the *time.

How could such acts be regarded as notice to him? They were but idle forms.

Dean v. Nelson, 10 Wall. U. S. R. 158, was a proceeding in Memphis, during the late war, whilst it was in the occupation of the United States, to foreclose a mortgage of shares of stock, which had been executed by Nelson to secure a debt of which Dean, a northern citizen, was then assignee. A portion of the stock had been assigned by Nelson to Benjamin Day, and the residue to his wife, and they with Nelson were made defendants to the proceeding. All the defendants were then within the Confederate lines, and it was unlawful for them to cross them. Two of them had been expelled from the Union lines, and were not permitted to return. The other, Benjamin Day, had never left the Confederate lines. Held, that the notice was a nullity. Mr. Justice Brady, speaking for the court, said: "A notice directed to them and published in a newspaper was a mere idle form. They could not lawfully see it, nor obey it. As to them the proceedings were wholly void and inoperative. How much better would have been a notice left at their late residence or place of business in Memphis?"

In a recent case decided by the Superior court of Chicago (Life Ins. Co. v. Hall & al., 7 Amer. L. Reg., new series, p. 606), it was held that the publication of notice in a newspaper in Chicago, of a suit depending in that city, addressed to parties residing in Louisiana, within the Confederate lines, during the late war, has no validity, and is void. The court said: "The only principle upon which it could be justified would be, that the debtor, being an enemy, had no rights which a court of justice was bound to respect." To divest a man of his rights or property on such a notice, the court says, "could rest only on a basis of robbery."

*How much better would be a notice left at his abandoned place of business or residence than in the hands of his enemy?

The New York case of Harden v. Boyce (59 Barb. Supr. Court R., p. 426) is still more directly in point. That was an action against the indorser of a negotiable note made in New York October 1st, 1860, and payable at the Bank of the Republic twelve months after date. The note at maturity, in October 1861, was presented at the Bank of the Republic, and payment demanded and refused, and thereupon protested. Notice of the dishonor of the note to the defendant, the indorser, who was a resident of Greenville, South Carolina, and within the Confederate lines at the date of the protest, was deposited in the post office, directed to him at his residence. It was held that the notice was a nullity. Brady, J. who delivered the opinion of the court, in a very clear and condensed opinion, says: "When a war is commenced between nations it arrests eo instanti all commercial intercourse and voluntary communication with the enemy without permission of the government; and the citizens or subjects of one belligerent become the enemies of the other, and of all its citizens or subjects." (Citing Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. 438; The Rapid, 8 Cranch 161; and The Julia, Id. 193.) "And these results of war inter gentes (he says) were substantially applied to the citizens of the Confederate States during the late war." Then referring to numerous cases sustaining this proposition he thus concludes: "The existence and character of the hostilities mentioned, and the consequences flowing therefrom, rendered the attempted service of notice of protest on the defendant a nullity. The defendant's engagement was a conditional one, to be made absolute upon the observance of such formulae as are prescribed by law, unless waived or rendered unnecessary by facts and circumstances attending the maturity, demand and refusal of payment recognized by commercial law. In this case there was no pretence that notice of dishonor had been waived or was necessary (unnecessary), and the defendant was therefore entitled to it. The plaintiff was under no obligation to send it as long as the impediment occasioned by war existed. * * * It was his duty, however, to send it when the interruption of intercourse ceased." And such is declared to be the law by Chitty and Edwards. Edwards on Bills and Promiss. Notes, 458-9. See also 3 Wend. R. 488; 6 East's R. 16.

I think it must then be conceded, upon reason and authority, that the attempted service of notice on the indorser in this case was wholly inoperative and void; and that to fix his liability, in other words, to make absolute his conditional contract to pay the notes, it was necessary that the holder should have notified him of their dishonor in a reasonable time after the impediment was removed, by the termination of the war.

This conclusion is irresistible unless it can be successfully maintained, that Wm. N. McVeigh by abandoning his residence and place of business in Alexandria to keep within the Confederate lines and under the protection of the Confederate government, forfeited his right to notice and made his contracts absolute.

He violated no condition or requirement of his contracts, expressed or implied, by removing from his residence and place of business in Alexandria before the maturity of the notes,—nor did the makers. If he (the indorser) chose to leave Alexandria and remove to any part of Virginia, or to another State, or beyond the seas, he would thereby have violated no obligation of his contract.

And it would have been necessary for the holder to have followed him with notice of the dishonor, in order to hold him liable, if he knew where he was, or could find out by reasonable inquiry, and due diligence. Story on Promis. Notes § 316. Wm. N. Mc-

Veigh, like Benjamin Day, in Dean v. Nelson supra, never left the Confederacy. He was in the Confederacy when the war commenced, at the place where the notes were made, indorsed and payable, and like Day he never left it.

It was not leaving his home and place of business, which he had a right to do under his contract, which prevented its execution, or caused its suspension. It was the war, for which he was not responsible, and which he doubtless regarded as a great public calamity. But as it had burst upon the country it threw upon him, as it did upon others, the necessity of deciding questions of duty and responsibility for himself as a citizen. It was a war which divided states and communities, and individuals, that were before under one common federal government. But these individuals were also amenable to their local state governments, which still retained their powers of sovereignty, except only so far as they had delegated a part of them to the general government by the bond of union. To their respective state governments the citizens of each owed allegiance, qualified only by the powers which had been delegated to the common government. In this unhappy conflict between states and sections the citizen had to decide for himself, on which side of the conflict his duty placed him. And it being a civil war, and having been previous to the removal of the McVeighs from Alexandria, recognized as such by the government at Washington, the citizen had the right of election, to which side he

844 would *adhere. It was so held by the Supreme court of the U. S. Inglis v. Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Peters R. 99. Mr. Justice Thompson delivering the opinion of the court says, "This right of election must necessarily exist in all revolutions like ours, and is so well established by adjudged cases, that it is entirely unnecessary to enter into an examination of the authorities." Mr. Justice Story, who dissented from the opinion of the court on some points, concurred on this point. He says, "Under the peculiar circumstances of the revolution, the general, I do not say the universal, principle adopted was, to consider all persons, whether natives or inhabitants, upon the occurrence of the revolution, entitled to make their choice, either to remain subjects of the British crown, or to become members of the United States." (The italics are mine). Again he says, "It appears to me that there is sound sense and public policy on the doctrine, and there is no pretence to say that it is incompatible with the known law, or general usages of nations."

But the decision of this question is not necessary to the decision of this cause. For if in a political aspect the McVeighs had not the right of election, and were guilty of an offence against the public in electing to go with the Confederacy, for which they might be held responsible in a prosecution, they cannot by reason thereof be held liable to this private party beyond their undertaking in the contract.

It seems that McVeigh elected to adhere to his native state of Virginia, which had withdrawn from the Federal union and united with the Southern Confederacy. And earnest and deep and overpowering must have been his convictions of duty 845 to have impelled *him to so great a sacrifice of property, comfort, and material prosperity, as he made by this decision.

It is not like the case of a man absenting himself from his home, or absconding, to evade notice, or to avoid a just responsibility. Wm. N. McVeigh by leaving, sacrificed large pecuniary interests and left a valuable estate at the mercy of the invader. It cannot be doubted, that he was impelled to this great pecuniary sacrifice by a high sense of duty and moral feeling; like thousand of as generous, virtuous, honorable and patriotic men, as ever lived in any age or in any land—many of whose names, by their exalted virtues, will adorn the annals of time till time shall be no more. No one will be disposed to attribute ignoble motives to Wm. N. McVeigh, or McVeigh & Son, whether they regard them as right or wrong in their convictions; a question which it is not necessary to decide, and which it would be futile and to no purpose to investigate in this opinion.

As McVeigh violated no requirement nor condition of his contract, to hold that he forfeited it to the bank by an infraction of a public duty would be tantamount to subjecting him to confiscation, not to the government, but to a private party to a contract which he had not violated; a conclusion which must be repulsive to every fair mind. If he were liable to this sort of punishment or forfeiture, how would it be with those Confederates who did not recede before the advancing armies of the United States, but met them, and invaded their territory?

I cannot see that the McVeighs differ from all other non-combatant Confederates who were hostile to the United States as a power that was waging war against their state. They did not leave their country to carry on hostilities against it. And 846 if they had, the public offence *could not create an obligation on the part of Wm. N. McVeigh, to pay to a private party a debt which his contract did not bind him to pay. He did not leave his state. He elected to adhere to the Confederacy in the conflict of arms, and endeavored to keep within its military lines and under the protection of its flag. If he were wrong, it could not entitle a private party to coerce him to pay further than his contract bound him. Nor can we say that the McVeighs of their free will abandoned their homes in Alexandria. It cannot justly be said, that a man voluntarily does that which if he did not do he would be in danger of loss of life or liberty from a power which it was impossible for him to resist, or be required to subject himself to moral degradation. Such the McVeighs most probably regarded the alternative presented to them. And if so, though they were mistaken, it cannot be said that they voluntarily abandoned their homes.

But however Wm. N. McVeigh's removal from Alexandria may be regarded as a political question, in that respect we have nothing to do with it. We have seen that by his removal he violated no part of his contract with the holder of the notes in question, and that if guilty of an infraction of a public duty that could not create in him a private obligation to pay money to the holder which by his contract he is not liable to pay. He is not asking aid of the courts to relieve him from the operation of legal proceedings, or from the effect of his absentsing himself from his home. And in this there is a broad distinction between our case and Ludlow v. Ramsey.

I am further of opinion, that the court erred, in overruling the motion for a new trial, the verdict being plainly contrary to the law, as herein expressed, and to the first

847 and second instructions given by the *court for the defendant. It is said that the McVeighs had not been domiciled in Virginia outside of the Union lines, because they left their homes in Alexandria with the intention of returning. Let it be that they did—that they expected the enemy would be expelled, and they would be able to return even before the maturity of their notes. They were grievously disappointed. They found that at the date of the maturity of these notes, and before and afterwards, as long as the war lasted, there was an impassable barrier between them and their former homes in Alexandria and the holder of these notes. But did we not hold, in Hutchison v. Taylor, 25 Gratt. 536, Judge Christian delivering the opinion, that Hutchison had changed his domicil, and become domiciled in Virginia although he may have left Washington with the intention of returning? and that he and his partner Taylor, who remained in Washington, thereby became enemies; and upon that ground that the partnership was dissolved? One rule ought not to be applied to Hutchison, and a different rule to McVeigh, under substantially the same circumstances.

As well might it be held that General Lee had not changed his domicil, and that a notice left at Arlington after it fell under the dominion of the enemy, as his place of residence, was a good service, as to hold that the notice was good in the case before us. He brought his family away; but suppose he left furniture, books, papers and servants too, as I think he did, would that validate the notice?

The grave question for this court to determine, is the legal liability of Wm. N. McVeigh under these contracts as indorser. And if it were a fact that orphans and widows would be affected by our decision, 848 and I do not know whether they will or not, I am at a *loss to know what aid it can give us in coming to a right conclusion. If Wm. N. McVeigh is not liable to pay them by his contract, as implied by his indorsation, according to commercial law and usage, there is no obligation on him, moral or legal, to pay them, even though orphans and widows had an interest in them. He only undertook to pay them, as we have seen, on the compliance of the holder with certain precedent conditions, one of which was due notice of their dishonor. And in as much as the holder could not comply with that condition by reason of the war, the contract was suspended, and the holder was excused from giving the notice until the impediment was removed, which, in this case, was the termination of the war. In such case Chief Justice Marshall says, in Hopkirk v. Page, 2 Brock. R. 20-34: "To charge the drawer, notice of the dishonor of his bill ought to be given within a reasonable time after the removal of the impediment."

Notice to the indorser cannot be presumed, as has been contended, from the fact of payment to the branch bank during the war in Confederate money. The payment was made by the makers, and accepted by the branch of the Bank of the Old Dominion on the 30th of May 1864. The makers, of course, then knew that they had not been paid. And if the fact of payment was communicated to the indorser, which is also probable, the inference for him was plain that they had not been previously paid. But it is not fair to presume from that fact that he inferred, or had reason to believe, that they had been protested at maturity, when he knew that no demand of payment had been made, or could have been made. It was natural that the makers, knowing that the notes were not paid, would avail 849 themselves of the authority given by the *act of assembly in such cases to pay them, if they had the means to pay them, and the branch bank was willing to receive payment in such currency as all the other banks of the commonwealth were receiving.

No presumption can be raised from this fact, in connection with the fact, that subsequently, said act of assembly was held to be unconstitutional by a majority of this court, so far as it authorized payments to be made in such cases to the branch bank, that the indorser knew in a reasonable time after communication was restored by the termination of the war or had any reason to believe, that said notes were unpaid, and that the bank looked to him for payment. That decision was made more than five years after the termination of the war; and until then no judicial doubt, had ever been suggested, as to the constitutionality of the law, or as to the validity of payments made by its authority. But it had received high judicial approval and sanction as far as it had been passed on by the courts.

No notice had been given to the indorser by the mother bank within a reasonable time after the termination of the war, that she repudiated the payment made by the makers of her branch, and looked to him for payment. But on the contrary, as soon after the war as the fall of 1865, the mother bank appropriated all the assets of her branch, including the proceeds of the payment made by the makers of these notes, without even an offer, so far as this record shows, to return to the makers the value of the Confederate money paid by them, or to credit it on their notes.

So far from these facts raising a presumption, that the indorser had notice in a reasonable time, after the termination of the war, and the restoration of communication *between him and the bank, that the notes in question had not been paid, and that they had been dishonored, and that the bank looked to him for payment, the presumption is the other way. They raise a strong presumption amounting in fact to an assurance, that the notes were discharged, and that the bank did not look to him for payment. Judge Marshall says, in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. R. 213-14, "He," meaning the drawer, "has a right to expect notice of its non-performance, because his conduct may be materially influenced by this failure of the drawee. He ought to have notice that his bill is disgraced, because this notice enables him to take measures for his own security." The same is applicable to the indorser of a note. And if Wm. N. McVeigh had received due notice of the non-payment of the notes, and that the bank looked to him for payment, he might have taken measures for his security.

But it is said, it was the duty of the indorser to have made inquiry himself, of the holder of the notes whether they had been paid, or whether they had been dishonored and he was looked to for payment, and that inasmuch as he did not do so he is liable to pay. This, it seems to me, would introduce a new principle into the commercial law, and totally change the character of an indorser's contract, as it has already been explained. The fact that the indorser was the president of the bank cannot affect the question of his liability. He stands precisely upon the footing, as to his rights and liabilities that he would if he were not president, and can be held liable no further than his contract makes him liable. Did we not hold but recently, in a case decided at Staunton, and not yet reported, Christian

J. delivering the opinion, in which 851 *we all concurred, the case of Tardy v. Boyd, that Boyd as indorser was discharged from liability to pay the debt, for want of notice of its dishonor, although he was a director of the bank, and afterwards offered to pay it in Confederate money? But McVeigh in fact ceased to be president of the bank before any of these notes matured; was never afterwards privy to its proceedings, and was cut off from all communication with it.

With regard to the instructions, as this opinion has already occupied so much of our time, I will only say, that so far as the instructions are in harmony with the principles herein declared, they are proper to be given to the jury, and so far as they are in conflict with them, they ought to be refused.

I am of opinion upon the whole to reverse the judgment of the court below with costs, and to remand the cause, to be proceeded with in conformity with the principles herein declared.

Christian J. concurred in the opinion of Moncure P.

Staples J. was of opinion that the notices left at the defendant Wm. N. McVeigh's house and the bank were not sufficient; and that notice of the dishonor of the notes should have been given after the close of the war in a reasonable time. He concurred in the opinion of Anderson J. on the question of the sufficiency of the notice. In all other respects he concurred in the opinion of Moncure P.

Bouldin J. concurred in omnibus in the opinion of Anderson J.

The judgment was as follows:

852 *The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the judgment of the court below is erroneous, and that whilst it did not err in refusing to give the fifth, eighth, ninth and eleventh instructions moved by the plaintiff below, or in giving the first, second, fourth, fifth, eighth, ninth, and tenth instructions moved by the defendant, it did err in giving the second and third instructions moved by the said plaintiff. The court is further of opinion that the notices addressed to Wm. N. McVeigh, delivered to his white servant at his residence in Alexandria, and the notice delivered to Ramsay at the Bank of the Old Dominion, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record, were insufficient in law; and that in order to bind the said McVeigh as indorser, it was incumbent upon the defendant in error, within a reasonable time after communication was restored between the parties by the termination of the war, to give the said indorser notice of the non-payment and dishonor of the notes in controversy, which were indorsed by him for the accommodation of the makers. And as to the other two notes which do not appear to have been indorsed for the accommodation of the makers, there is no error in the fourth instruction given by the court for the plaintiff with regard to them; and that for the foregoing reasons which are more fully set forth in the opinion filed with the record as aforesaid, the court erred in refusing to give the defendant's third instruction, and also in overruling his motion for a new trial.

It is therefore considered that the judgment of the Corporation court of the city of Alexandria be reversed and annulled, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a new trial awarded the plaintiff in error. And 853 *that the defendant in error do pay to the plaintiff in error his costs expended in the prosecution of his writ of supersedeas here. And the cause is remanded to said Corporation court for further proceedings therein in conformity with the principles herein declared, and in the opinion of the court filed with the record.

Judgment reversed.

854 *West Rockingham Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Sheets & Co.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Absent, BOULDIN, J.

1. Fire Insurance—Pleading.—In an action on a policy of insurance on buildings, if the declaration is framed as authorized by the statute, Code of 1873, ch. 36, § 44, it ought regularly perhaps to notice the fact, that the policy or a sworn copy of it is filed with it.

2. Same—Same—Objections to—Appellate Court.—But when it does not so appear that the policy was filed with the declaration, yet if the parties proceed in the case without its being called for by the defendant, and it is obvious that the defendant knew what it was without calling for it, the objection that it was not filed with the declaration cannot be taken for the first time in the appellate court, though there was a demurrer to the declaration.

3. Same—Construction of Policy—Notice of Loss.—S & Co. have a policy of insurance against fire on buildings in a company of which R is president. The buildings are burned; and two days after the fire S writes to R describing the fire, and stating the loss, and then referring to what will be necessary to be done by the company, and expressing himself as wishing to comply strictly with the rules and regulations of the company. Upon the receipt of this letter by R the company proceed to act upon it. The letter having been intended by S as the notice required by the policy, and the company having acted upon it as such, the fact that it was not signed by S & Co., or addressed to R as president of the company, or to the company, as required by its rules, will be considered as waived, and the letter is competent evidence of notice.

4. Same—Same—Proofs—Waiver.—If the evidence shows that the preliminary proofs, required by a policy of insurance, have been waived by the company, the insured is entitled to recover, though no such proofs were in fact taken.

5. Same—Same—Same—Same.—Where, when an insurance company is informed of a fire by the insured, and the company not saying any-

855 thing about the preliminary *proofs, proceed to enquire whether the insurance is valid upon a specific ground independent of these proofs, and decide that upon this specific ground the insurance is not valid; this is a waiver of all objection to the insufficiency of these proofs.

6. Same—Constitution of Company—Creditors.—By the constitution of a Mutual Assurance Company, no person who has claimed a homestead exemption shall be a member of the company. One of the members of the firm of S & Co. has claimed his homestead; and S & Co. sign the constitution and take out a policy on their partnership property. The fact that one of the partners has claimed his homestead does not impair the validity of the policy issued to the partnership.

See note on "Fire Insurance Generally," appended to Mut., etc., So. v. Holt, 29 Gratt. 612.

7. Same—Same—Failure to Voluntarily State Title.—

If a policy of insurance does not require that the insured shall give in the liens or incumbrances on the property insured, or state what is his title to it, and no questions are asked of the insured by the insurer, the policy is not avoided by the failure of the insured, without any fraudulent intent, to mention a lien upon it.

8. Same—Misrepresentations of Insured.—If there be a warranty, or a representation, which amounts to warranty, that there are no incumbrances on the property insured, whether such warranty or representation be given in answer to a question or not, if it be untrue the policy is void, even though the insured was not guilty of actual fraud.

9. Same—Performance of Conditions—Waiver.—In the declaration on a policy of insurance framed under the statute, plaintiffs say they have performed on their part all the conditions of the policy, and have violated none of its prohibitions. Under this declaration they may prove a waiver of performance of the conditions of the policy by the insurer; and this will be equivalent to proof of the performance of such conditions.

This case was argued at the September term of the court at Staunton, and was decided at the November term in Richmond. The case is sufficiently stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

Compton, for the appellants.

Jno. Paul and Haas, for the appellees.

Moncure P. This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Rock-
856 ingham county, rendered on *the 16th day of September 1874, affirming a judgment of the county court of said county, rendered on the 10th day of June 1873, in an action of assumpsit brought by Felix T. Sheets & Co. against The West Rockingham Mutual Fire Insurance Company, founded on a policy of insurance whereby the said company insured a certain paper mill, machinery and buildings connected therewith, belonging to the said plaintiffs. The declaration contained but one count, which was special, though in the general form authorized by the Code, chap. 36, sec. 44. There was a bill of particulars filed with the declaration, charging the defendant as Dr. to the plaintiff, "1872, July 17th. To loss by destruction of paper mill and machinery by fire, and of damage of house designated in policy of insurance as No. 3, $6,266."

The defendant demurred to the declaration, and plead non-assumpsit; and the plaintiff joined in the demurrer, and replied generally to the plea. The demurrer being argued was overruled by the court. The defendant then offered to file several pleas, to which the plaintiffs objected; but the court overruled the objection, and permitted the pleas to be filed; to which the plaintiffs replied generally, and thereupon the issues were tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages at $4,930.44, with interest from the 7th of September 1872 until paid. The defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; which motion the court overruled; and judgment was accordingly rendered on the verdict.

Three bills of exception were tendered by the defendant and signed by the court, during the progress of the trial of the case, which will be noticed in detail hereafter.

The defendant applied to the judge of 857 the *said Circuit court for a supersedeas to the said judgment of the County court; which was accordingly awarded. The Circuit court afterwards heard the case upon the said supersedeas, and affirmed the said judgment of the County court. The defendant then applied to a judge of this court for a supersedeas to the said judgment of the Circuit court; which was accordingly awarded: and that is the case which we now have to dispose of.

Sundry errors in the judgment of the Circuit court, affirming the judgment of the County court, are assigned in the petition to this court for a supersedeas; which errors we will notice in the order of their assignment.

"First—The County court erred in overruling the demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The act of assembly, approved February 8, 1872, which simplifies declarations on policies of insurance, and on which the plaintiff relied, requires the plaintiff to file with his declaration the original policy of insurance or a sworn copy thereof; neither of which was done in this case. The declaration therefore was not sufficient under the statute. The declaration should, therefore, have set forth every condition or promise of said policy, and an averment that the plaintiff had observed the same, seriatim. Code of 1873, chapter 36, sec. 44, page 372. The demurrer therefore should have been sustained."

It does not appear from the record whether the policy was filed with the declaration or not. It ought regularly perhaps, to have been noticed in the declaration as having been filed therewith. It was in possession of the plaintiffs, and might, easily, have been filed therewith; and the plaintiffs could have had no motive for not filing 858 it. They intended that it should *be considered as so filed; for they filed their declaration in the form authorized by law in case the plaintiff files with his declaration or complaint the original policy, or a sworn copy thereof. If it had not been actually filed, the defendant might have called for it, and compelled its production. It was not so called for, either because it was already filed, or because the plaintiff well knew what it was, without calling for its production. It was in the form prescribed by the defendant, and in the same form with the other policies entered into by the defendants. It was before the defendant when the special pleas were prepared, in which the terms of the policy, or some of them, are set forth, and it was the first evidence which was introduced by the plaintiffs on the trial of the issues by the jury. It is too late to object, for the first time, in the appellate court, that the policy was not filed with the declaration. If it was not so filed, and there was any error in that respect, it did not prejudice, and was in effect waived by the defendant.

"2nd. The County court erred in permitting the private letter of F. T. Sheets to John H. Rolston to go to the jury as proof of notice of the loss. The letter was not addressed to the company, nor to said Rolston in his official capacity as president; nor was it in the form required by the conditions annexed to the policy; and it was not signed by said firm of Felix T. Sheets & Co., and was not intended as a notice of loss. The 4th condition annexed to the policy required the notice to be given forthwith 'to the company;' and intended that the notice should be addressed to the company, and signed by the insured."

This is the subject of the first of the three bills of exception aforesaid.

The notice given by the letter here 859 referred to was *certainly given in due time. The loss occurred on the 7th of July 1872; the letter bears date two days thereafter, on the 9th of July, and was duly sent by mail, and received by the president of the company, to whom, personally, it was directed. It is very specific in detailing the facts in regard to the fire, and refers, unmistakably, to a loss under the policy of insurance in question. It was clearly intended to be a notice given in pursuance of the policy. After detailing the particulars in regard to the fire, the writer says: "The old mill is burnt, and it will be necessary to have some commissioners appointed to assess the machinery on hand; though not worth much, yet it should have a value attached; and I am informed that that duty devolves upon you," &c. "Wishing to comply strictly with the rules and regulations of the company, I shall not attempt to move or change anything until further advised by yourself or the authorities of the company."

It is objected, that this letter was signed only by F. T. Sheets, one of the firm of F. T. Sheets & Co.; and was addressed only to John H. Rolston (personally), and not as president of the company. But it was intended by the writer, and perfectly understood by all persons concerned, to be a notice under the policy; and the company derived from it all the benefit which they could possibly have derived from such a notice written in the most perfect form. The company forthwith took action upon it as such a notice, and after proceeding, as invited by the letter, to assess the value of the machinery remaining on hand, and to consider the subject and consult counsel in regard to their liability, they base their defence to the claim on a ground entirely independent of the question of notice. Thereby any formal objection that might have been made to the notice, such as 860 is the objection now made, was *clearly waived; as is shown by the authorities referred to in the argument of the counsel of the appellees. Flanders on Insurance 518-520; May on Insurance 567; and cases cited.

"3d. The County court erred in refusing to give the first instruction as asked for by the defendants' counsel, which correctly embodied the law. See Angell on Fire and Life Insurance, page 257, sections 226, 227 and 228; also Columbian Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. R. 507; and the Circuit court erred in refusing to reverse said judgment of the County court upon said ground."

The defendants' objections to the action of the County court, upon the instructions asked for, are the subject of the 2d of the said three bills of exception.

The first instruction relates to the necessity of giving the notice and furnishing the preliminary proofs required by the policy. As asked for, the 1st instruction is in these words:

"1st. That it was the duty of the plaintiffs, within a reasonable time after the fire, to give the defendant notice of their loss and damage, and as soon thereafter as possible to deliver to the defendant as particular an account of the loss and damage as the nature of the case admitted, signed with their own hands; and also to accompany the same with their oaths or affirmation, declaring the said account to be true and just, showing also the ownership of the property insured; what was the whole cash value of the subject insured; in what manner the buildings insured, or containing the subject insured in the several parts thereof, were occupied at the time of the loss; who were the occupants of the building; and when and how the fire originated, so far as they know or believe. And also to produce a certificate under the hand and seal 861 of a magistrate or *notary public, most contiguous to the place of fire, and not concerned in the loss; stating that he had examined the circumstances attending the fire, loss or damage alleged; that he is acquainted with the character and circumstances of the claimants; and that he verily believed that such claimants had by misfortune, and without fraud or evil practice, sustained loss and damage to the subject insured to the amount which such magistrate or notary should certify; and unless the jury is satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiffs complied substantially with these requirements of the conditions annexed to the policy, and made part of it before they brought this suit, they must find for the defendant."

The County court modified this instruction by adding at the end of it these words: "Unless they believe from the evidence the defendant waived said preliminary proof;" and then gave it with that modification.

Undoubtedly if the defendant waived the preliminary proof the plaintiff was not bound to furnish it; and if there was evidence before the jury tending to show that the defendant did waive the said preliminary proof, then it was proper for the County court to make the said addition; and the jury would have been misled by giving the instruction without it. Was such evidence before the jury?

I think there was. The fire occurred on the 7th of July 1872. Two days thereafter, to wit: on the 9th of July, the letter before referred to, from F. T. Sheets to Rolston, the president of the company, was written, giving notice of the loss, which was sent and received in due course of mail. The said Rolston, in consequence of said letter, called a meeting of the board of directors of said company, which met accordingly in *Harrisonburg on the 15th 862 of July, just eight days after the fire, and six after the date of the letter. At that meeting, the burning of the mill of Sheets & Co. being presented for consideration, "a committee of five was appointed to investigate the matter as to the firm having taken the homestead;" and a general meeting of the company was called to take place in the courthouse July 29th, and notice of it was directed to be published in the Rockingham Register. On the 29th of July it seems there was a general meeting of the company according to the notice; and there were also, at the same time and place, two meetings of the board of directors; at one of which, the committee appointed to investigate the matter of the homestead, reported that the homestead of Vanlear (one of the firm of F. T. Sheets & Co.) was on record in the clerk's office, Staunton, Va., but the homestead of Sheets (the other member) was not recorded. At the same meeting of the board, the case of Sheets & Co. was placed in the hands of Woodson & Co., as counsel of the insurance company, and said counsel were to report to the board at a future day.

After the adjournment of the meetings held on the 24th of July 1872--at which the only subject of discussion was, whether the plaintiffs, or either of them, had taken the benefit of the homestead law--F. T. Sheets met with A. S. Byrd, who was an agent of the insurance company, to obtain policies of insurance, and asked him what had been done in the meeting. Byrd told Sheets that the meeting had turned the case over to Woodson & Compton as counsel of the company for their opinion; that he thought there was an article in the constitution which operated against the claim of the plaintiffs. Byrd then read the 11th article 863 of the constitution and by-laws of the *company forbidding any one to become a member who had taken the benefit of the homestead or bankrupt law, when Sheets remarked, "that knocks us out; if I had read that article I would not have signed the constitution." Sheets at the same time remarked that his partner, Vanlear, had taken the benefit of the homestead law, and had it recorded; but that all that he (Sheets) had done was to get his counsel, N. K. Trout, to write a note to the sheriff that he (Sheets) claimed the benefit of the homestead law, which notice Sheets signed and delivered to the sheriff, and said Trout told him to be effective it must be recorded; but Sheets did not execute any deed of homestead for record, and the notice was given in the year 1870 prior to the passage of the homestead act of June 1870. The notice was exhibited on the trial, and is copied in the record.

In August or September 1872, the plaintiff Sheets met with Rolston, president of the insurance company, in Harrisonburg, and remarked to him that he had heard that the counsel of the company had decided against his claim; to which Rolston replied, that he had so understood, and that he did not see how the company could pay him unless the matter was tested by a suit; and Sheets then informed him that he would sue the company; and directed his counsel to bring suit. The letter of July 9th, 1872, was the only paper which passed between the plaintiffs, or either of them, and the company, until after the suit was brought on the 3d of October 1872; and no reference had been made in any conversation between the plaintiffs, or either of them, and the insurance company, or any of its agents, about the sufficiency of said letter as notice of the loss, or upon the subject of the preliminary proofs required by sect. 4th of the conditions of insurance, until after the 6th 864 *of November 1872, more than a month after the suit was brought.

The company had not refused to pay the plaintiffs their claim for insurance, but was holding the same under advisement until after they were sued; and they did not finally refuse to pay until a meeting on the 24th of February 1873, when they resolved that F. T. Sheets & Co. had forfeited their rights to become members of the company under article 11th of the constitution, by having taken the benefit of the homestead, and that therefore their policy was null and void and of no effect. In all the conversations between the plaintiffs and the officers and agents of the company, and in the company meetings, the only question discussed or mentioned was, the effect of the alleged taking of the benefit of the homestead law by the plaintiffs upon their policy, and no other objection to their claim was stated.

I think, according to the authorities referred to by the counsel for the appellees, the facts proved as before stated show, that the appellant waived the preliminary proofs. In Flanders on Fire Insurance, pp. 541, 542, that writer says: "The insurer may waive, in whole or in part, any of the ordinary proofs. Their requirement is a formal condition, introduced solely for his benefit, and their waiver, in effect, strikes the condition out of the contract. The waiver need not be express. It may be inferred from the acts of the insurers which evidence a recognition of liability, or from their denial of obligation exclusively for other reasons. That is, if the refusal to pay the loss is put upon grounds other than the insufficiency or defectiveness of the notice or proofs furnished, the insurers will be held to have waived objections of that character." "The refusal to recognize the existence of 865 any claim, *or a general refusal to pay, renders the delivery of notice and proofs a useless ceremony, and is treated as waiving a strict compliance with the condition as to preliminary notice and proofs, both in respect to form and time."

In May on Insurance, pp. 573, 574, that writer says: "A distinct denial of liability and refusal to pay on the ground that there is no liability, is a waiver of the condition requiring proof of the loss. It is equivalent to a declaration, that they will not pay though the proof be furnished; and to require the presentation of proof in such a case, when it can be of no importance to either party, and the conduct of the party in favor of whom the stipulation is made, has rendered it practically superfluous, is but an idle formality, the observance of which the law will not sustain."

The cases cited by these writers fully sustain them in the views they present. They are collected in Littleton & Blatchley's Digest of Fire Insurance Decisions, Baiter's edition, title Waiver pp. 700-709. Among them are the cases of Taylor v. The Merchants Fire Insurance Co., 9 How. U. S. R. 390, and Blake v. Exchange Mutual Insurance Co., 12 Gray's R. 265; which have a strong bearing on this case.

I have examined the authorities cited on the other side, but they do not show that the law is not as above stated. The case of the Columbian Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Peters R. 25, is explained in 9 How. U. S. R. 390, 404; where it is said that "the doctrine of the case in 2 Peters on this point of waiver, was virtually overruled in the same case reported a second time in 10 Peters R. 507. The case of O'Neal v. Buffalo Fire Insurance Co., 3 Comst. R. 122, sustains the views contended for on the side of 866 the appellees. Home Ins. Co. v.

Cohen, 20 Gratt. 312, is certainly not in conflict with them, but rather the contrary. Nor is what is said in Angell on Fire and Life Insurance, sec. 226 and 227, in such conflict.

I therefore think the County court did not err in refusing to give the 1st instruction, as asked for by the defendant; nor in giving it, as modified by the court.

"4th. The County court erred in refusing to give the second instruction asked for by the defendant. The substance of this instruction was, that the mere taking into consideration of the question of the homestead was not of itself a waiver of the preliminary proof of loss. In other words that there was no waiver unless there was an intent to waive the preliminary proof. This instruction was wholly refused. See Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence; also Home Ins. Co. v. Cohen, supra; and the Circuit court should have reversed said judgment on that ground."

The question raised by this assignment of error has already been disposed of. The 2nd instruction therein referred to states the facts, proved by the evidence and concludes that this state of facts does not constitute a waiver of the preliminary proofs and the jury should find for the defendant. I have already stated that I think the facts proved show that the appellant waived the preliminary proofs. It follows, therefore, that in my opinion the County court did not err in refusing to give the 2d instruction asked for by the defendant.

"5th. The Circuit court should have reversed the action of the County court in refusing to give the 3d instruction asked for by the defendant. It was a fraud on the company for Van Lear & Sheets to sign the constitution and seek to become members of the company, when they had taken 867 the benefit of the *homestead law, which was prohibited by said constitution. See Angell on Life & F. Ins., page 223, sec. 188."

The 3d instruction, as asked for, is in these words: "3d. If the jury believe from the evidence, that the plaintiffs or either of them, had, prior to their signing the constitution of the West Rockingham Mutual Fire Insurance Company, taken the benefit of the homestead law of Virginia, they should find for the defendant."

The County court modified this instruction by adding at the end of it these words: "unless they further believe from the evidence, that the defendant, or its agents, undertook and intended to insure the property of the plaintiffs as a firm, regardless of the homestead prohibition;" and then gave it with that modification.

Nothing is said in the policy of insurance about taking the benefit of the homestead law of Virginia, unless the constitution of the company be regarded as a part of the said policy; and all that is contained in the constitution on the subject is embraced in article 11th of the constitution, which is in these words: "No person shall become a member of this company who has taken the benefit of the homestead or bankrupt law; and any person that may hereafter take such steps shall forfeit his policy."

Conceding for the purposes of this case, that the constitution is a part of the policy, and that a violation of the 11th article of the constitution would vacate the policy or render it void; then the question arises, whether F. T. Sheets & Co., when they became members of the company, and obtained the policy, had taken the benefit of the homestead law?

D. N. Vanlear, one of the two members of the firm of F. T. Sheets & Co., and 868 who, it seems, owned but *one-sixth of the property insured, had taken the benefit of the homestead law, and had his deed recorded. But F. T. Sheets, the other member of the firm, and who, it seems, owned the remaining five-sixths of the property, only gave notice of his claim of homestead to the sheriff who had an execution against him, and never perfected his claim by executing a deed and having it recorded according to law.

But F. T. Sheets & Co. signed the constitution and obtained the policy in their partnership name, and the insurance was of their partnership property. They became members of the company as partners, and in their partnership name of F. T. Sheets &

Co., in which name they signed the constitution. They had not taken, and they could not take the benefit of the homestead law as partners. Only one of them, and he owning a comparatively small interest in the subject, took such benefit as an individual. But if both had taken it as individuals, still it could not have been said that they took it as partners, or that the partnership took it. There is a wide difference between these two persons as individuals, and the trading partnership formed of the two. The former might be worth nothing, while the latter might be worth a great deal. All the property of the former might be covered by a claim of homestead, while none of the property of the latter could be covered by such a claim. All the debts of the latter, including their debts and liabilities to the insurance company, must be discharged before the individual partners or their individual creditors can have a right to appropriate the partnership property to their benefit. "As the language of an insurance policy is the language of the company, and they can therefore provide for every proper case, it is to be taken in the sense 869 most favorable to the assured." *Flanders on Insurance p. 72, and cases cited. See also p. 209 and seq.

Then the policy has not been vacated or avoided by anything done under the 11th article of the constitution; and the County court did not err in refusing to give the third instruction as asked for by the defendant. Though the said court may have erred in giving it with an addition thereto; but that error, if any, is not to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error, who cannot complain of it.

"6th. The Circuit court erred in refusing to reverse the action of the County court in refusing the 4th instruction asked for by the defendant."

The 4th instruction as asked for is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence, that the plaintiffs, at the time of the procurement of the alleged policy of insurance on which this suit is brought, made any material concealment from the defendant or its agent, in regard to the title, or liens or incumbrances on the property insured, they must find for the defendant, no matter whether questioned in regard to liens, title or incumbrances or not."

The County court modified this instruction by inserting therein the words: "wilfully, with intent to deceive or defraud," before the words: "made any material concealment," and then gave it with that modification.

The concealment referred to in this instruction was of a vendor's lien on the mill property insured of about $1700. which lien existed at the time of the insurance. The insurance company contends that the mere omission, without more, on the part of the insured, to give notice of this lien to the company, avoids the policy. While the plaintiffs, Sheets & Co., contend that such omission has not that effect, unless 870 *it occurred "wilfully, with intent to deceive or defraud." And the question involved in this issue is the one presented by the 6th assignment of error now under consideration.

There is nothing in the policy which requires a disclosure by the insured of the liens upon the insured property. There was no question propounded by the insurers to the insured in regard to the existence of such liens. The insurers might have examined the records for such liens, and made enquiries about them, either of the insured or others. But they failed to do so. Can they now avoid the obligation of the policy, on the ground that the insured, without being enquired of, and without any fraud, omitted to give notice of the lien at the time of obtaining the policy? I think they cannot.

In Flanders on Fire Insurance, p. 277, that writer says: "In general the insured is only required to disclose the matters inquired about, and not the particulars of his title, unless interrogated in respect thereto, or unless it is made imperative upon him by a condition of the policy." "But an untrue answer in an application for an insurance, in reply to a question respecting incumbrances, or the interest of the insured, renders the policy void; and this, whether the company has a lien on the property or not. By asking the question, it would be manifest that the company deemed the information material, and it would be material that the applicant should answer it truly." Many authorities are cited in support of what is here said and fully sustain it. Without repeating the citations here, they can readily be found by referring to the notes to that work. In one of them, Tyler v. Ætna Ins. Co., 12 Wend. R. 507, Nelson J., in stating the reason why a disclosure of title 871 is not *essential, says: "The rights of the insurer are sufficiently guarded by having it in his power to exact, by enquiry, a description of the interest of the applicant, and by the recovery being limited, in case of loss, to the value of the interest proved on the trial."

Again, on p. 338, the same writer says: "A policy cannot be avoided for encumbrances, unless upon the applicant's false and fraudulent answers to interrogatories," &c.

Of course if there be a warranty, or a representation which amounts to a warranty, that there are no incumbrances on the property, whether such warranty or representation be given in answer to a question or not, if it be untrue the policy would be void even though the insured might not be guilty of actual fraud.

In 2 Fire Insurance Cases by Bennett, p. 665, is a report of the case of Delahay v. Memphis Ins. Co., 8 Humph. R. 684, in which it was held in 1848, that a failure on the part of the assured to disclose the existence of a mortgage on the property, is not a circumstance material to the risk and will not avoid the policy. See the many cases cited in the note to that case.

In 3 Id., p. 527, is a report of the case of Morrison's adm'r v. Tennessee Marine & Fire Ins. Co., 18 Missouri R. 262, in which it was held in 1853 that the failure of the insured to disclose the state of his title, or the extent of his interest in the insured property, where there is no enquiry, will not avoid the policy, unless there is a fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation. The court in this case refer to the conflict which seems to exist between the decisions of the Supreme court of the United States on this subject, or some of them, and especially the case of Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Peters' R. 25.

872 and the decisions *in New York and Massachusetts, or some of them, on the same subject, and gives a decided preference to the latter. After stating the grounds relied on in support of the latter, the court say: "These views commend themselves to our judgment by their justice, and we are satisfied will effect more solid justice between the assured and the insurer than the contrary doctrine. It cannot have escaped observation, that at first sight many of the principles of the law of insurance are seemingly very arbitrary, and their necessity and policy can only be seen and felt by those who are called upon to give them a practical application. The man without guile, who asks for insurance on his property, is not aware of the necessity of disclosures which long experience in insurance offices has shown to the underwriter to be necessary; and to hold his policy void for not making disclosures of the importance of which he is not aware, would be gross injustice. If applicants for insurance are to be held to a strict representation and proof of the nature and extent of their interest in property on which they apply for insurance, they will almost invariably lose the benefit of their policies. Are the liens of taxes, judgments, and such like, to avoid policies, unless they are disclosed, when they may be entirely out of mind and forgotten? If from a want of knowledge of the law the assured mistakes the nature of his title, although he may have one equally valuable, is his policy to be avoided? It is no answer to say that the misrepresentation must be material. What is material must be determined from the circumstances of each case. What is material in one case may not be so in another, and so a wide field for litigation will be opened. The ends of justice will be best subserved by holding the assured only responsible for fraud. Insurance companies may 873 *protect themselves by enquiries in relation to these things, and after filling their policies with so much detail and such minutiae of information in regard to other matters, as to create the impression that they are satisfied, to hold that they are not bound by their contract unless information of another kind is communicated by the assured, which is not sought for, would be enabling them to commit the rankest injustice."

These views are very strong, and I am decidedly of opinion that they are correct. Nothing more need be added to them. If the company by the terms of its charter had a lien on property insured by it for its dues, as is the case with some mutual assurance companies, and as was the case with the Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings in the State of Virginia, there would be more reason in holding that a party applying for insurance was bound to disclose the existence of incumbrances on the property, whether enquired for by the insurers or not. The disclosure might be considered as material in that case, and as necessary to the validity of the policy. Sections 187 and 188 of Angell on Fire and Life Insurance illustrate the distinction between cases of a failure to disclose incumbrances where the insurer acquires no lien, and where he acquires one on the property insured. As to cases in which the insurers had a lien on the property, see May on Insurance, § 563, and cases cited; and Shirley v. Mutual Assurance Society, 2 Rob. R. (Va.) 705.

The insurance company in this case have no lien, either by the terms of the charter or any other law, or by any contract on the property insured.

I am therefore of opinion that the County court did not err in refusing to give 874 the 4th instruction as asked *for by the defendant, or in giving it with the addition made thereto by the court.

"7th. The Circuit court ought to have reversed the judgment of the County court for refusing to give the 5th instruction asked for by the defendant."

That instruction is in these words: "In this action, the proof of the plaintiffs must correspond with the allegations of the declaration, and the plaintiffs having averred in their declaration that they have complied with all the conditions of the policy sued on, they must prove the same, and are not permitted to avoid performance of said conditions by proof of waiver of performance on the part of the defendant; if therefore the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs have failed to prove a substantial compliance with all the conditions and requirements of said policy, they must find for the defendant."

When the plaintiffs say in their declaration that they have on their part performed all the conditions of the policy of insurance and have violated none of its prohibitions, of course they mean such as were not waived by the defendant. Such as were waived are, in effect, as if they had never been inserted in the contract. If the act of 1871-2, ch. 79, § 1, p. 58, Code ch. 36, § 44, p. 372, had not been passed, proof of waiver of performance of any of the conditions of the policy would have been equivalent to proof of performance of such conditions under a declaration averring such performance. I think that the American authorities, or a decided preponderance of them, show that to be a correct rule with us, while the English rule appears to be different. See 4 Rob. Pr. 443; and 2 Smith's Leading Cases, Wallace's Notes p. 74, and the cases cited. See also Ketchum v. Protection Ins. Co., 1 Allen N. B. 136; and Lycoming 875 County Mut. *Ins. Co., v. Schellenberger, 44 Penn. St. R. 257, cited in the brief of the counsel for the appellees; and 5 Rob. Pr. 252; and 1 Greenleaf sec. 2, cited in the brief of the counsel for the appellees. I prefer the view taken of this subject in the American cases, as tending, more than the English view, to favor justice against technicalities, which is the growing tendency of our courts.

But under the act aforesaid, which was passed to simplify the form of declarations on policies of insurance, and in pursuance of which the declaration in this case was prepared, I do not think there can be a doubt but that proof of waiver of performance of any of the conditions of the policy was admissible in this case.

I therefore think the County court did not err in refusing to give the 5th instruction asked for by the defendant.

"8th. The Circuit court erred in refusing to reverse the action of the County court for refusing to give the jury the 6th instruction asked for by the defendant."

That instruction is in these words: "If an insurance company takes into consideration, the loss or damage sustained by a policy-holder, and decides that they will not pay the loss or damage and put their refusal to pay on other grounds than defects in the preliminary proofs or want of such proofs, this is a waiver of the necessity of furnishing the preliminary proofs required by the policy; but if the company take the matter into consideration, and make no decision as to whether they will or will not pay until after the suit is brought against them by the party insured; this does not operate a waiver of the preliminary proofs required by the policy."

I think the conduct of the defendant 876 in placing its *defence solely upon the ground that the plaintiffs or one of them had taken the benefit of the homestead law before they obtained the policy, and in its proceedings in regard to the claim of the plaintiffs, amounted to a waiver of the preliminary proofs required by the policy, although the company may not have formally decided until after the suit was brought, that it would not pay the claim on the ground aforesaid. After the company had had the claim under consideration for two or three months, the president informed the claimants that he understood the counsel of the company had decided against the claimants, and that he did not see how the company could pay it unless the matter was tested by a suit. They then informed him they would sue the company, and accordingly instructed their counsel to bring such suit. The only matter referred by the company to its counsel, was the matter in regard to the homestead, and that was no doubt the matter which the plaintiffs understood was to be tested by a suit.

I am therefore of opinion that the County court did not err in refusing to give the 6th instruction asked for by the defendant.

"9th. The Circuit court should have reversed the judgment of the County court for failing to set aside the verdict of the jury on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence."

This assignment of error involves only questions which have already been considered by me; and for reasons already given, I think the County court did not err in overruling the motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

"10th. The instruction asked for by the plaintiff and given to the jury was calculated to mislead the jury, and did not apply to the case."

877 *That instruction was: "that if they believe from the evidence, that the defendant resisted the payment of the plaintiffs on the ground that they had taken the benefit of the homestead, and no other, that is a waiver of defective notice of loss and preliminary proofs."

There was no error in giving this instruction, as I have already sufficiently shown. And upon the whole I am of opinion that there is no error in the judgments, either of the Circuit or County court, and that they ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure P.

Judgment affirmed.

878 *Darnall & Wife v. Smith's Adm'r & als.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

I. Married Women—Separate Estate—Charging with Debts.*—A married woman, possessed of a separate estate, may charge the same with her debts in like manner and to the same extent as a feme sole.

II. Same—Same—Same—Intention.—The liability of the separate estate of a married woman can only arise out of the supposed intention of the wife. And no pecuniary engagement can be a charge upon the wife's estate which is not connected by agreement, either express or implied, with said estate.

III. Same—Same—Same—Same.—If a married woman having separate property enters into a pecuniary engagement, whether by ordering goods or otherwise, which if she were a feme sole would constitute her a debtor, and in entering into such an engagement she purports to contract not for her husband but for herself, and on the credit of her separate estate, and it was so intended by her, and so understood by the person with whom she is contracting; that constitutes an obligation for which the person with whom she contracts has the right to make her separate estate liable: and the question whether the obligation was contracted in this manner must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

*Married Women—Separate Estate—Charging with Debts.—The cases on this subject have been collected in Annotations to Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 153; Garland v. Pamplin, 32 Gratt. 305; Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 411; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 565; Ropp v. Minor, 33 Gratt. 97; Frank v. Lillienfeld, 33 Gratt. 877. These cases with their notes are practically exhaustive of the law in Virginia on this still important subject. In West Virginia the principal case is cited with approval in Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 658.

IV. Same—Same—Same—Same.—As the charge is a mere question of intention, the wife may extend it to the whole, or confine it to a part of her separate estate. If no specific part is appointed for the payment of the debt, the fair implication is, that the whole estate was intended to be made liable. If, on the other hand, only a part of the estate, expressly or by fair inference, is designed to be charged, no liability whatever can attach to the residue.

V. Same—Personal Liability.—A wife is exempt from all personal liability, and from all personal decrees and judgments upon her contracts. Her undertaking, so far as it is recognized by the courts, is not that she will pay the debt, but that her separate estate shall be answerable for it. And that is bound so far only as she has agreed it shall be bound.

879 *VI. Facts—Married Women—Separate Estate—Liability.—W was insolvent, and E, his wife, owned a separate estate, part of it under her father's will, which was given in trust for her. In August 1860 W and E purchase a crop of tobacco from S, and they execute a paper by which they bind themselves to convey to S a sufficient interest in the Peatross estate to secure him for the tobacco. In October 1860, E directs her agent L, to give to S an order from her on the Peatross estate for $4,153.22, to be drawn on whoever the court may appoint to distribute the estate. In 1862 S's adm'r files her bill to sell E's separate estate for the payment of this debt, and claims that E's whole separate estate is liable. E and her present husband do not answer, but her trustee does, and denies her estate is liable. And without directing any enquiry as to the Peatross estate, or what had been done with E's interest in it, there is a decree for the sale of E's land for the payment of the debt. Held:

1. Liability of Married Woman's Separate Estate.—Prima facie E's interest in the Peatross estate is alone liable to the payment of the debt.

2. Same—Burden of Proof.—If plaintiff insists that the other separate estate of E is liable, and that her interest in the Peatross estate was only taken as collateral security, the burden is on the plaintiff to establish the fact.

3. Same.—Before the plaintiff can subject the other separate estate of E, she must show that due diligence has been used by S in pursuing the interest of E in the Peatross estate, and that he has failed to make the debt out of that interest.

4. Same—Defendants.—Though a married woman is to be treated as a feme sole, so far as the capacity to charge her estate with her pecuniary engagements is concerned; yet if in a litigation involving that question, the husband does not choose to defend her interests, and the trustee is negligent of his duty, it is incumbent upon the court to direct such enquiries as will prevent the sacrifice of her rights.

5. Same—Practice.—The plaintiff having failed to furnish the necessary evidence as to S's prosecution of his claim as assignee of E's interest in the Peatross fund, ordinarily the bill should be dismissed. But as it is apparent that the case has not been investigated upon its merits, a result attributable to the conduct of the defendants in a very great measure, the cause will be remanded for further proceedings in conformity to the views expressed by this court.

880 *This was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit court of Pittsylvania, made in a cause depending in said court, in which the personal representative of A. A. Smith was plaintiff and Andrew M. Darnall and Eliza P. his wife, Wm. J. Fulton, her trustee, and others were defendants. The bill which was filed in 1866, charged that Robert W. Williams, deceased, was in his lifetime the husband of said Eliza P. Darnall; and that he was utterly insolvent. That the said Eliza P. held a separate estate; and that the said Robert W. Williams and his wife Eliza P. made a joint purchase of a crop of tobacco of A. A. Smith, for the sum of $4,153.22, in the year 1860; that said contract of sale was made on the part of said Eliza P. on the faith of her separate property. That at the time of said sale she was possessed and entitled to several tracts of land, derived under deeds, referred to, and also an interest in the estate of her father, Joseph Martin, Sr., deceased. The prayer of the bill is that the said Eliza P. be required to pay the claim of the plaintiff, out of the rents and profits of the said real estate, and for general relief.

The bill was taken for confessed as to Darnall and Eliza P. his wife. Fulton the trustee, answered. He says he knows nothing of the alleged purchase of tobacco by Williams and wife from the plaintiff's testator; except that a crop was bought by one or both said Williams and wife; the terms of said contract he knows not. He is advised that no such contract as that stated in the bill could have been made to bind the property mentioned in the bill, as will be seen by reference to the deeds mentioned. He does not admit that any property coming to the said Eliza P. by the will of her father, is liable to the plaintiff's demand; but is advised that it comes under 881 *the same trust as that declared in the deed from her father to Joseph Martin trustee.

By deed bearing date the 20th of November 1849, Joseph Martin, Sr., conveyed to Joseph Martin, Jr., a tract of land of seven hundred and sixty-one acres, a number of slaves and other personal property, in trust to the sole and separate use of Eliza P. Williams, during her life, and for the education and rearing of such children as she then had or might thereafter have. And after a provision for her husband Robert W. Williams, if he survived her, it was provided, that on her death the property should pass to her children and their descendants; or if she died without descendants it should revert to his estate. There were two other conveyances of small tracts of land to a trustee upon the same trusts, which were paid for out of the rents and profits of the property first conveyed.

By the 6th clause of his will, Joseph Martin, Sr., gives to his daughter Elizabeth, to be secured in trust to his son William Martin, an equal portion with his other children, after deducting what he had theretofore advanced to her and her husband Robert W. Williams.

In November 1868 the court directed a commissioner to take an account of the administration of the estate of Joseph Martin, Sr., by his executor Wm. Martin, so far as to enable the commissioner to report what amount and description of property was devised and bequeathed to his daughter Eliza P. (in trust or otherwise) under the 6th clause of Joseph Martin's will; which the commissioner was directed to report to the court.

The commissioner reported that Mrs. Darnall had received under the 6th clause of her father's will one tract of land of three hundred and fifty acres, valued 882 *at $8 per acre, $2,800; that there was due to her from the executor $994.48, of which $949.25 was principal; and there were outstanding debts due to the estate of which her share was $318.18 2-11.

The plaintiff proved that her testator A. A. Smith, in 1860, sold to Robert W. Williams and his wife his crop of tobacco made on two plantations; and introduced as evidence two papers, the first signed by Mrs. Williams, and the other wholly in her handwriting. The first is as follows:

"August 7th, 1860.

"We Robert W. Williams and Elizabeth his wife promise and bind ourselves to convey to A. A. Smith a sufficient interest in the Peatross estate to secure him for his crop of tobacco that we have bought of him: this the day and date above named.

(Signed) Robert W. Williams,
E. P. Williams.

The second is as follows:

Mr. R. W. Lyle. Dear Sir. You will please give Mr. A. A. Smith an order from me on the Peatross estate for $4,153.22, to be drawn on whomsoever the court may appoint to distribute the estate.

Yours respectfully,
E. P. Williams.

Homewood, October 6th, 1860.

The only notice of the Peatross estate in the record, is in these two papers.

The cause came on to be heard on the 5th of June 1872, when the court held, that the debt of the testator A. A. Smith of $4,153.22 due October 6th 1860, was contracted on the faith of the separate estate of the said E. P. Williams now E. P. 883 Darnall, and that she designed *to charge her separate estate with the payment of the same; and the said debt is still due; that the property devised to Wm. Martin, trustee, for the use of the said E. P. Darnall, is subject to the payment of the debt of the said plaintiff; and that the personal estate and the rents and profits of the real estate devised by the 6th clause of the will of Joseph Martin deceased, would not be sufficient to pay said debt of $4,153.22 in five years; and it was decreed that Wm. Martin do out of his own estate, pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $949.25, with interest from the 1st of January 1871 till paid, to be credited on the debt of $4,153.22 due said estate. And it was further decreed that unless the said E. P. Darnall, or some one for her, should pay the said debt of $4,153.22 with interest, within sixty days from the date of the decree, a special commissioner named, should proceed to sell the tract of land mentioned in the commissioner's report, in the mode and upon the terms stated in the decree. And thereupon A. M. Darnall and Elizabeth P. his wife applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Dabney, Barksdale and Williams, for the appellants.

Jones & Bouldin and E. E. Bouldin, for the appellee.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The authorities are generally agreed, that a married woman possessed of a separate estate, may charge the same with her debts in like manner and to the same extent as a feme sole; but they are not agreed as to the mode by which the charge may be affected. Some of the cases hold that the intention to charge the separate 884 *estate must be stated in the instrument evidencing the contract, or the consideration must be one going to the direct benefit of the estate. In other cases it is held, that the execution of a bond or note by the wife, whether as principal or as surety, whether for her own benefit, or that of some other person, is indicative of an intention to charge the separate estate; since in no other way can the instrument have any effect. And this was the view taken in this court in Burnett & wife v. Haupe, 25 Gratt. 481.

Whatever conflict of opinion there may be upon this point, there is a great weight of authority in favor of the proposition, that the liability of the separate estate can only arise out of the supposed intention of the wife. And no pecuniary engagement can be a charge which is not connected by agreement, either express or implied, with the estate. The rule is thus laid down in a recent English case: If a married woman having separate property, enters into a pecuniary engagement, whether by ordering goods or otherwise, which if she were a feme sole would constitute her a debtor, and in entering into such engagement she purports to contract, not for her husband, but for herself, and on the credit of her separate estate; and it was so intended by her, and so understood by the person with whom she is contracting; that constitutes an obligation for which the person with whom she contracts has the right to make her separate estate liable; and the question whether the obligation was contracted in this manner must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case. Mrs. Matthewman's case, Law R. 3 Eq. 787, 7 Eq. Cases 19; Johnson v. Gallagher, 7 Jurist N. S. 273. And the same view is taken generally in other cases. The engagement must appear to have been made with reference to and upon the 885 faith *of the separate estate, or it cannot be enforced against it. 2 Perry on Trusts, sec. 659.

As the charge is a mere question of intention, the wife may of course extend it to the whole, or confine it to a part, of the separate estate. If no specific part is appointed for the payment of the debt, the fair implication is, that the whole estate was intended to be made liable. If on the other hand, only a part of the estate, expressly or by fair inference, is designed to be charged, no liability whatever can attach to the residue. In all cases the remedies of the creditor will be confined to the particular property upon the faith of which it may reasonably be presumed he chose to rely.

This is a necessary consequence of the rule which exempts the wife from all personal liability, and from all personal decrees and judgments upon her contracts. Her undertaking, so far as it is recognized by the courts, is, not that she will pay the debt, but that her separate estate shall be answerable for it. And that is bound only so far as she has agreed it shall be bound.

In the case before us, at the date of the contract hereafter mentioned, Mrs. Williams, who is now Mrs. Darnall, was entitled to the estate conveyed by the deed of 20th November 1849, to that conveyed by the deeds of 29th April 1853, and of the 5th January 1857, respectively; also to the estate derived under the will of her father; and it seems to an interest in the "Peatross estate." Being thus entitled, Mrs. Williams, on the 7th August 1860, united with her husband in the purchase of a crop of tobacco from the appellee's intestate. And on the same day they entered into a written obligation, by which they promised and bound themselves to "convey to the intestate a sufficient interest in the Peatross estate 886 to *secure him for his crop of tobacco."

There is no evidence of any engagement on the part of Mrs. Williams previous to the execution of this bond. The fair inference is, that the purchase of the tobacco and the execution of the paper were contemporaneous acts—parts of the same transaction. At that time Mr. Robert Williams, the husband, was notoriously insolvent. His only means of paying his part of the purchase money was by an advantageous sale of the tobacco. If that failed the whole burden would fall upon Mrs. Williams' property. Under these circumstances she might be willing to convey or pledge her interest in the Peatross estate, as a security for the purchase money. She accordingly does convey it; but she does not agree to convey anything beyond that.

It is to be inferred that the intestate had made all necessary inquiries upon the subject, and that he was fully satisfied with the security provided for the payment of his debt. Two months after the purchase and the execution of the bond, and after the amplest opportunity of informing himself, he procures from Mrs. Williams an order upon her attorney for $4,153.22, the price of the tobacco, "to be drawn on whomsoever the court may appoint to distribute the Peatross estate."

This plainly indicated that there was a fund belonging to Mrs. Williams under the control of some court; that her share had been ascertained, and that all parties considered it sufficient to pay the purchase money for the tobacco. From that day down to the bringing of this suit, nothing is heard of the order on the Peatross estate, or even the claim of the appellee's intestate—so far as this record informs us.

There is no suggestion of any mis-
887 representation, or *fraud, or imposition, practiced upon the latter by Mrs. Williams in regard to the Peatross estate, or the extent and value of her interest therein. The court is left to grope its way entirely in the dark, as to the nature, character and final results of the transaction. The only satisfactory solution of the matter is, that Mrs. Williams was willing to charge her interest in the Peatross estate with the debt in question; and the intestate was content to accept the assignment as a sufficient security for his indemnity.

The bill alleges that the sale was made and the contract executed on the credit of the entire separate estate. It is true that Mrs. Williams did not answer; but her trustee did, and his answer sufficiently puts the complainant upon proof of all his material allegations. If in fact the assignment of the Peatross fund was merely by way of collateral security, and not intended to impair the creditor's remedies against the property generally, it was incumbent upon him to offer some proof of the fact.

But if the complainant had supplied this proof it would then have devolved on him to account for the failure to collect the Peatross fund: what became of the order; whether it was ever presented; what was done with that fund; whether the intestate received any part of it; if he did not the reasons of his failure, are questions to which this record furnishes no answer. The bill does not even offer a word of explanation on the subject. And yet the Circuit court, in the absence of any information upon the subject, and without enquiry, has decreed the sale and application of Mrs. Williams' entire estate, real and personal, derived under the will of her father in satisfaction of complainant's debt.

It may be very true, that a married 888 woman is to be *treated as a feme sole so far as the capacity to charge the estate with her pecuniary engagements is concerned: but if in a litigation involving that question, the husband does not choose to defend her interests, and the trustee is negligent of his duty, it is incumbent upon the court to direct such enquiries as will prevent the sacrifice of her rights. The intestate having taken an assignment of the Peatross estate, he was bound as assignee to exercise due diligence in prosecuting the claim, and in no event could he have any recourse upon the other estate of Mrs. Williams unless he made it appear he had failed to make the claim available without any default on his part.

The complainant having wholly failed to furnish the necessary evidence upon these two points, under ordinary circumstances a dismissal of his bill would necessarily follow. But it is very apparent that the case has not been investigated upon its merits; a result attributable to the conduct of the defendants in the court below in a very great measure. The purposes of justice will be best subserved by remanding the cause to the Circuit court, for further proceedings, in conformity with the views herein announced. It will then be incumbent upon the complainant to make good the averment of the bill that the sale was made upon the credit of the separate estate generally; that the assignment of the Peatross fund was not intended to affect the creditor's right to resort to that estate; and that the failure to receive it was without default on the part of the intestate or his representatives.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, 889 that the bond executed by *Mr. and Mrs. Williams on the 7th of August 1860, and the order given by Mrs. Williams on the 6th October, 1860, constituted an assignment of her interest in the Peatross estate; and that it was incumbent upon the appellee, before he could proceed against the separate property of Mrs. Williams devised under the will of her father, to show that his testator, as such assignee, had exercised due diligence in prosecuting that claim; and that he had failed to recover the same without default on his part.

The court is further of opinion, that in the absence of any opposing evidence, said bond and order are to be regarded as showing simply an intention on the part of Mrs. Williams to charge her interest in the Peatross estate with the payment of the debt due the appellee's intestate; and if in fact said debt was contracted with reference to Mrs. Williams' separate property generally, as alleged in the bill, it devolved upon the appellee to establish the fact.

The court is further of opinion, that the said Circuit court erred in decreeing against the estate derived under the will, without inquiry and satisfactory information upon these points. It is therefore adjudged and ordered that the decree of 5th of June 1872 be reversed and annulled; and that the appellee, out of the assets in his hands to be administered, do pay to the appellants their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here. And this cause is remanded to said Circuit court, to be proceeded with in conformity with these views. And liberty is given complainant to show that the assignment of the Peatross estate as aforesaid, was a mere collateral security, not designed to impair his equitable right to proceed against Mrs. Williams' other separate property; and 890 *further to show, that he or her testator had failed to collect any part of said estate; and that his failure so to collect, was without default on the part of said intestate or his representative. If satisfactory evidence on these points is not adduced within a reasonable time, to be judged by the said Circuit court, a decree is to be entered dismissing complainant's bill.

Decree reversed.

891 *Shelton v. Jones' Adm'x & als.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Orders of Court—Change of Trustees.—D dies in 1845, and by his will gives real and personal estate to his daughter, S, for her life, and then to her children; and he directs that his executor shall act as trustee for S and her children, and he appoints W his executor; who qualifies. In 1851 the County court of P, in which the will was admitted to probate, made an order, that W, trustee of S and her children, being in court and assenting to the same, and S by her letter to the court desiring the same, the court doth appoint B trustee for the said S and her children, in the place of W; and thereupon B, with J as his surety, entered into and acknowledged their bond in, &c. In 1871 B and J having died, S files a bill against the administratrix of B and of J, to have a settlement of the trust and payment. HELD:

1. Same—Collateral Questioning.*—The County court of P being a court of general jurisdiction, the validity of its order cannot be questioned in any collateral proceeding.
2. Same—Same.—The order having been made with the assent of W in court, and upon the written request of S, the order and the bond are valid and binding upon B and his surety J, though the order was not based upon either bill or petition.
3. Same—Laches.—If the children, not having been parties to the proceeding, might have had it set aside, they having acquiesced in it for so long a period, the parties to the bond cannot avoid it on that ground.

In June 1871 Polly Shelton instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Pittsylvania county, against the administrator of Coleman D. Bennett, deceased, and

Thomas S. Jones' adm'x and heirs. In her bill and amended bill she set out:

892 That William *Davis was appointed trustee for the plaintiff under the will of her father Thomas Davis Sr. That subsequently Coleman D. Bennett was appointed trustee in the place of William Davis, and gave bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, with Wm. A. Anthony and Thomas S. Jones as his sureties, in the County court of Pittsylvania. That a considerable amount of money came into the hands of Bennett as trustee as aforesaid, which he had wasted. That Anthony had died a non-resident of the state and insolvent; that Jones was dead. That it was doubtful if the estate of Bennett will pay the debt due to the plaintiff, or that the personal estate of Jones, or the rents and profits of his real estate, would pay it in five years. The prayer was for a new trustee; that Bennett's adm'r be required to settle his account as trustee, and pay the amount due her, or that Jones' adm'x be required to pay it, or his land be sold for the purpose, and for general relief.

Jones' adm'x answered the bill. She says: She does not know, nor does she admit, that her testator ever signed any valid bond as surety for Bennett as trustee for the plaintiff, and she calls for strict proof of the fact. That by the will of Thomas Davis Sr. he appointed William Davis trustee of the plaintiff, and she submits to the court whether the appointment of Bennett in the place of Davis was regular and lawful, and whether her testator is bound by any bond signed by him as surety for the discharge of Bennett's duties in that behalf.

Thomas Davis Sr. died about 1845; and by his will he left a considerable property, real and personal, to his daughter Polly Shelton, for her life, and at her death to her children; and of these there were several. And after declaring that it is 893 his intention that *the husband of Polly Shelton shall have no control over the property left to her, and that the same shall not be subjected to the payment of his debts, he says: "to that end, I do hereby vest the said property or money, as the case may be, in my executor in trust, for the use and benefit of my said daughter Polly Shelton during her life, and at her death to be equally divided among her children." And he appointed his son William Davis his executor.

The will of Thomas Davis was admitted to probate on the 17th of February 1845, in the County court of Pittsylvania; and William Davis qualified as executor.

At the March term 1851 of the County court of Pittsylvania the following order was made:

"William Davis, trustee for Mary T. Shelton and her children, under the will of Thomas Davis deceased, being in court and assenting to the same, and the said Mary T. Shelton, by her letter to the court, desiring the same, the court doth appoint Coleman D. Bennett trustee for the said Mary T. Shelton and her children, in the place of the said William Davis; and thereupon the said Coleman D. Bennett, as such trustee, with Wm. A. Anthony and Thomas S. Jones as his securities, entered into and acknowledged their bond in the penalty of three thousand dollars, conditioned according to law."

The bond referred to in the order, after reciting the provisions of the will of Thomas Davis in relation to his daughter Polly Shelton and her children, and the above order of the County court of Pittsylvania, bound the obligors for the faithful performance by Bennett of the duties of said trust; and it was executed by Bennett, Anthony and Jones.

In November 1872 the court directed a commissioner to take an account of Bennett's actings as trustee, *and whether his estate would pay any indebtedness that the commissioner might report as due from him to the plaintiff or her children; and also as to the estates of Anthony and Jones.

The commissioner reported that there was due from Bennett's estate, to the trust fund with interest to October 10th 1873, $2,027.21; that Bennett's estate would pay to it $1,107.17; that the personal assets of Jones' estate were about $550, and the rents of his real estate would much more than pay the balance of the debt in five years.

The cause came on to be heard on the 18th of February 1874, when the court held that the order of the County court appointing Bennett trustee of the plaintiff and her children, was illegal and void, and that the bond executed by him, and Anthony and Jones, as his sureties, was likewise illegal and void as to the sureties; and that they and their personal representatives and heirs were not liable under said bond for Bennett's default, or failure to discharge the duties imposed upon him by the court; but that the said Bennett having acted as trustee, although without authority of law, had rendered himself personally liable for the funds that came to his hands as trustee in his own wrong. And confirming the report of the commissioner, decreed that Bennett's adm'r, out of the assets of Bennett's estate in his hands, should pay into the court, to the clerk thereof, the sum of $2,027.21, with interest from the 10th of October 1873; and that the bill be dismissed with costs, as to all the other defendants. And thereupon Mrs. Shelton applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

E. E. Bouldin, for the appellant.

895 *Wm. M. Tredway Jr., for the appellees.

Staples, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The main question before us is as to the effect of the order of the County court of Pittsylvania entered at the March term 1851, removing William Davis from his office of trustee, and appointing C. D. Bennett in his place. The learned judge of the Circuit court was of opinion that this order is illegal and void; and that the bond given by Bennett, for the faithful discharge of his duties as trustee, is also illegal and void as to his sureties; and although Bennett may be held to account for any funds received by him belonging to the cestui que trusts, the sureties are in no wise responsible for the same.

The grounds of this decision are not given in the decree. They are no doubt correctly stated in the brief of the learned counsel for the appellee. This position is, that William Davis, after his acceptance of the trust, under the will of Thomas Davis, sen., could only divest himself of it in three ways—either by assent of all his cestui que trust; or, 2d, by means of some special power in the instrument creating the trust; and 3d, by an application to a court of chancery. That, in this case, neither of these conditions were complied with; that Mrs. Polly Shelton, the tenant for life, alone consented to the removal of Davis and the appointment of Bennett; the infant children, entitled to the estate in remainder, not being before the court, nor capable of consenting; that the will confessedly contains no provision on the subject; and, lastly, no proper application was made to a court of chancery; the order of March term 1851 being the first and only proceeding in the case; that 896 order was *made simply upon motion, without process or bill, or other proceeding to give the court jurisdiction in the premises. Its action was therefore a nullity.

It is unnecessary to consider the first two grounds of objection suggested by counsel; for if the court had no authority to act on the subject, if it was wholly without jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, both the order and bond must be regarded as invalid.

The question to be considered then is, first, as to the authority of the County court to act in the matter of removing and appointing trustees; and, second, how far its orders and decrees in such cases may be impeached in collateral proceedings.

At the time this order was entered, the County courts of Virginia were clothed with authority to hear and determine all cases at common law or in chancery within their respective counties and corporations, with the exception of certain criminal causes, and except civil cases not involving a greater amount or value than twenty dollars. Rev. Code 1860, page 663, sec. 16.

In the exercise of their chancery powers these courts were concurrent with the Circuit courts. In other words they were courts of general jurisdiction, and were inferior only in the sense that their judgments might be revised by an appellate court. Harvey v. Tyler, 2 Wall. U. S. R. 328. They had therefore complete jurisdiction in cases of trusts. In the exercise of this branch of that jurisdiction they might remove and appoint trustees, whether acting under deeds or wills.

The appointment of new trustees is an ordinary remedy enforced by courts of equity in all cases where there is a failure of suitable trustees to perform the trusts, either from accident or from the refusal of the old trustees to act, or from their original or supervenient incapacity to act, 897 or from any other cause. 2 *Story

Eq. Jur. sec. 1287. And so where the circumstances or conduct of any existing trustee renders it inexpedient for him to continue in the office, the court will adapt its relief to the exigencies of the case, and having first decided upon the removal of the trustee, will proceed to supply the vacancy by appointing another person to act in the trust; and by directing the transfer of the property to him. Hill on Trustees 190, 191.

The County court of Pittsylvania being then at the date of that order, a court of general jurisdiction in the administration of trusts, its orders and decrees for the appointment or removal of trustees must be treated as valid in every other tribunal until reversed by a proper proceeding before an appellate court, or before the court which rendered the decree.

It is said, however, that jurisdiction of the subject matter is not sufficient; there must be parties and a case in court; and in the present instance the order was entered without process, or bill, or other proceeding.

The object of the process is to bring the defendant before the court; by it he is required to appear and answer the bill. But jurisdiction of the person may be acquired by the voluntary appearance of the defendant without process, or by an attorney appearing and making defence for him. If parties without process or bill appear in open court and agree that a decree may be entered adjudicating their rights, and this agreement is entered of record, it can hardly be maintained that such a decree is a mere nullity. This mode of proceeding may be very irregular, but the decree being the adjudication of the tribunal having jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties, can never be collaterally im-

898 peached for any defect, *irregularity or error in the proceedings, however manifest or palpable it may be. In such case the question of jurisdiction enters into and becomes an essential part of the judgment of the court.

This principle has again and again been affirmed by this court. The cases of Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Cook, sheriff, v. Hays, 9 Gratt. 142; Andrews v. Ivory, 14 Gratt. 229; and Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 321; are familiar illustrations.

It is unnecessary to consume time in quoting from these decisions, as they are well understood by the profession. In Gibson v. Beckham, Judge Allen entered into an exhaustive discussion of this whole doctrine, and a critical examination of all the authorities.

The rule as laid down in that case, is, that where a court has cognizance of the subject matter its judgment though it may be erroneous is not void; it is binding until set aside or reversed, and cannot be questioned incidentally; acts done and bonds taken under it bind the obligors and sureties as well as principals.

Where the court has cognizance of the subject matter, or capacity to take a bond, or takes a bond which on its face is valid, but contains a recital of facts necessary to its validity, the obligors shall be estopped from denying the truth of such recitals. These principles firmly established are essential to the security of the public and individuals. The security can occupy no higher ground than his principal. It is his intervention which has enabled the principal to act, and he should be bound to the extent of his obligation for him.

The argument of the counsel for the appellee seems to assume, that when a 899 trustee is sought to be removed *by a court of equity a suit, or a bill, or some formal pleading is essential to effect that object.

It will be found, however, that the practice of the Chancery courts in this respect, varies in different countries. In England the uniform course is to proceed by bill. The object is, no doubt, to give the defendant (the trustee) the benefit of his answer. The mode of proceeding is of course only important when the trustee is resisting the application for his removal.

In several of the American States the usual course is to proceed by petition. This practice has been recognized and sanctioned by the Supreme Court of Georgia as proper in that State. Mitchel v. Pilner, 15 Georgia R. 319.

In ex parte Knust, 1 Baily Eq. R. 489, the Supreme Court of South Carolina say—The English authorities certainly are, that to remove a trustee the proceeding must be by bill; and if it were right to remove a trustee for misconduct, I certainly should think he ought to have the means of defending himself by answer. The proceeding by petition is, however, more used by us than in the English practice, and if the office of trustee were vacant I think it might be filled upon petition. However this may be, it does not appear from the decree, that any objection to the form of the proceeding was taken at the hearing; nor does it form the ground of appeal. We think it is too late to take the objection now.

According to these cases, and others which could be cited, there is no fixed and unbending rule of proceeding in the equity courts for the removal of trustees. Whether in any of the states it may be done upon mere motion the books do not show. But if that mode of proceeding is adopted, with the consent of all the parties before 900 the court, especially the trustee, *whose office is to be vacated, the decree rendered therein, until reversed, is entitled to the same respect as any other decree of a competent court. To hold otherwise, is to substitute the mode in which an authority is exercised for the authority itself. Departure from the regular course of proceeding can never invalidate an act if the court has authority to do the act. A decree based upon a motion or petition cannot be a nulity, if it would be valid when founded upon a regular bill in equity.

In the case before us, the application for the removal of the old trustee was made by Mrs. Shelton, one of the cestui que trusts in writing; and the trustee himself appeared in court and gave his consent. It would have been more regular to have proceeded by bill or by petition; but neither of those modes would have given the court jurisdiction of the parties more fully than was obtained by this voluntary appearance in open court.

It is very true that the children of Mrs. Shelton, who were entitled to the trust fund in remainder, were not parties to the proceeding. Whether these children could at any time have successfully objected to the order removing the old trustee, it is unnecessary now to decide. It has been nearly twenty-five years since that order was made. During all the time that has since elapsed, it does not appear to have been called in question by either of the children, although the youngest must have long since arrived at maturity. And now we are told that as they were not before the court, and might therefore have originally objected, these defendants who were before the court, and voluntarily assumed the obligation, are thereby released from all liability.

The case of the People v. Morton, 5 901 Seld. (N. Y. R.) *176, furnishes so complete and satisfactory an answer to this view; indeed, it is so apposite in every respect to the present case, as to justify an extended extract from the opinion of the court as delivered by Ruggles, C. J. "The court of chancery had general jurisdiction of all cases of trust, and had the power by its general authority, independent of any statute, to displace a trustee on good cause shown, and to substitute another in his stead. It is said that this must, in all cases, according to the course and practice of the court, be done by bill and not upon petition. But a departure from the usual practice of the court in doing an act, which the court has authority to do, does not render the act void. It may be irregular or erroneous, and upon a direct proceeding may be set aside or reversed; but its validity cannot be questioned in a collateral action.

"It does not appear, that the court of Chancery in substituting Lynch as trustee in the place of White and Nicholl, acted, or professed to act, by authority of the statute in relation to trusts of real estate, or otherwise than by virtue of its general jurisdiction in matters of trust. The true point of the objection to the validity of the change of trustee seems to be this: that it does not appear by the recital in the bond that the cestui que trust were parties to or had notice of the proceeding.

"But this is an objection which neither the trustee nor his surety can be allowed to make. Lynch got possession of the trust estate under the proceeding by color of which he claimed to be trustee, and Norton voluntarily undertook as his surety, that he should faithfully administer the trust. If the proceeding was irregular for want of notice to the children of Mrs. Lynch, they might object to it in a proper manner for that cause; but Lynch after having 902 obtained the property *upon the pretence of being the trustee, cannot be permitted to deny the liability to account as such. The defendant who voluntarily became his surety in order that he might take the trust property, is for a like reason precluded from denying his liability. The order for changing the trustee and the bond given in pursuance of it must therefore be regarded as valid, and the defences in the answer which related to this point were properly overruled."

These views of Chief Justice Ruggles are fully sustained by the case of Curtis v. Smith, 60 Barb. R. 12; the case of Pontis v. Dilby, 9 Gill's R. 222, 240; the case of Budd v. Hiter, 3 Dutch. R. 43. And they are withal so satisfactory and convincing in themselves as to render any further discussion of the subject wholly unnecessary.

For the reasons stated the decree of the Circuit court must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Decree reversed.

*Fultz v. Davis.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Absent, BOULDIN, J.

I. Debts—Confederate Money.—In April 1862 F lends to D $7,000, and takes his bond, secured by a deed of trust on land, payable in six years "in current money of Virginia," the interest to be paid semi-annually. For the loan D receives the checks of F on a bank which is then paying Confederate money. Nothing is said, either before or at the time of the loan, as to the kind of money in which the bond is to be paid, except what is stated in the bond. D pays the interest in Confederate money up to April 1864. In September of that year he offers to pay the interest, but F refuses to receive the money. In December 1865, 1866, 1869, and in February 1869, D made payments on the bond. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Time of Scaling.*—This is a Confederate contract, and is to be scaled as of the date of the contract.

2. Same—Same—Manner of Scaling.—In ascertaining the amount still due to F on the bond, the value of the bond in gold at its date is first to be ascertained, then interest is to be charged upon the amount so ascertained up to the time of the first payment, and the premium on the gold is then to be added to it; and the payments deducted at their nominal amount, from the amount so ascertained.

II. Same—Payment—Interest.†—Where payments are made from time to time, on a debt bearing interest, the interest is to be computed on the debt up *Debts—Confederate Money—Time of Scaling.—The authorities on this subject are collected in Ashby v. Porter, 26 Gratt. 455, and note.

†Debts—Payment—Interest.—See note on "Interest Generally" appended to Fred v. Dixon, 22 Gratt. 541.

"If the jury believe from the evidence, that John F. Slaughter, the plaintiff in the action, acquired the note sued upon with his own means, and for his own individual benefit; then the said plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant E. J. Burton, the full amount of said note, with interest thereon from the day it fell due, till paid with costs of protest; notwithstanding the said Slaughter may, at the time of obtaining the same, have been administrator with the will annexed of Samuel Garland dec'd, who was one of the endorsers of said note, and notwithstanding he may have paid for it in a depreciated currency."

918 *The defendant objected to the giving of this instruction to the jury; and the same was modified by the court as follows: "Unless the jury shall believe that he acquired it by means of or under color of his office as administrator; then, in that event, he is not entitled to recover more than he paid for it, although it may have been paid for, with his own money and not out of the estate of his testator." As thus modified, the instruction was given; and thereupon the defendant excepted.

There were other instructions asked by defendant, and refused by the court; and the case was then submitted to the jury, who rendered a verdict for the full amount of the note and notarial charges, with interest from the 15th November 1861 (the day of protest). The defendant then moved to set aside the verdict, and grant him a new trial; which motion was overruled by the court, and judgment entered for plaintiff according to the verdict. The defendant again excepted.

My opinion is, that the court erred in instructing the jury that a personal representative can under any circumstances, or in any event, either by purchase or payment, so acquire a credit or debt of the estate represented by him, as to secure to himself an individual benefit thereby. He is obliged to take notice, when he accepts the office of administrator, that he is entrusted by the terms of his office and the law of the land, with the exclusive charge of the rights and interest of his testator or intestate, in the subject matter before him; and these rights and interests cannot, under any circumstances, be ignored by him. He is bound, both in law and morals, to protect them. It is therefore the well settled law of this State, based on a wise public policy, and sustained by the soundest principles *of equity law, of morality, and of justice, that such fiduciary can in no event so deal with his trust as to secure to himself an individual benefit thereby, at the expense or hazard of the trust estate.

The effect of the instruction under consideration, (however intended), would be to enable the administrator to ignore this salutary rule, and to buy up a liability of his intestate at about one third of its real value; and then to enforce it for its full amount—even against his testator, if necessary; for such must be the result of the instruction; the fiduciary being regarded thereby, in certain events, as a bona fide holder for value, in his own right, of the note endorsed by his testator: and thus by treating the transaction as a purchase by Slaughter individually, instead of a payment as administrator, as it should have been, Slaughter would be allowed to realize individually, about three times as much as he paid for a debt of his testator, with the right, should circumstances require it, to charge the entire amount to his testator's estate. Such dealing by a fiduciary with his trust, cannot, I think, be tolerated for a single moment, by this court.

My opinion therefore is, that we are bound both in law and morals, to treat the acquisition by Slaughter of the note in controversy as an acquisition by him in his fiduciary character, and not as a payment or purchase by him individually. I would here remark, that the proofs, in my opinion, shew a payment and not a purchase. Unless made then by Slaughter in his fiduciary character, it was officiously made by him as a mere stranger, without privity of contract or request of parties. For such voluntary payment made by a stranger to the contract, no action could be maintained. But as I *have already stated, 920 I am of opinion, that the payment must be regarded as made by Slaughter as fiduciary. This is required, as well by the law of the land as by the interest of Slaughter himself; for we have seen, that he could acquire the note in question in no other way, under the facts of the case. Thus paying, however, he would acquire precisely the rights of Garland himself, had he paid the note in his lifetime and after protest: and the next question is, what are these rights?

Clearly, I think, as a general rule, the rights of a holder of the note who has acquired it by composition or payment as surety of the parties bound to him as principals: viz., the right of a full indemnity for the money paid for the principals; in other words, the right to recover of the principals the value paid by the surety for them—nothing more and nothing less. That this is so, especially in cases of accommodation paper, is abundantly shewn by the elementary writers and decided cases on the subject; but I will content myself with referring to only two recent cases in this court.

In Barnett v. Cecil, 21 Gratt. 95. Judge Moncure, delivering the opinion of the whole court, uses the following language: "It is certainly true, as a general rule, that the contract which the law implies between a principal and his surety, is merely a contract of indemnity; and that the measure of the liability of the principal to the surety is the amount which the latter has to pay for the former on account of his suretyship; so that if the discount at bank had been the origin of the transaction in this case, and the note had been made, endorsed and discounted for the accommodation of the 921 maker and first endorser, the last *endorser, Cecil, would have been a mere surety of the other parties, and could have plaintiff had a right to pay the interest up to the 10th of April 1865 in Confederate money and offered to do so, but Fultz refused to receive it, that interest should be remitted. And the said commissioner was instructed to charge the true value of said debt to Davis as of the 10th of April, 1865, after which interest was to be allowed, but not compounded, giving credit to Davis for all sums thereafter paid by him. But if said payments were paid in currency or greenbacks, the commissioner was directed to scale said payments as of the date of such payment, to their value in gold, and the amount less the gold premium, should be credited against said demand, and the gold premium at the time of the close of the account must be added to the balance found due to the defendant Fultz.

The commissioner made his report; but it is not necessary to state it, as the court adopted a special statement, by which the principal debt was scaled as of the 10th of April 1865; the interest was then charged thereon to the 4th of February 1874; and the premium on gold at 11½ per cent. was added, making the debt as of that date $8,154.17. The payments with interest on each from the date of its payment to the 4th of February 1874, amounting in the whole to $4,586.56, was then deducted, leaving as due to Fultz, as of that date, the sum of $3,937.51.

The cause came on to be finally heard on the 19th of March 1874, when the court confirmed the special statement, and decreed that the injunction awarded the plaintiff in the cause be dissolved as to the sum of $3,937.51, with interest thereon from the 4th of February 1874 till paid. And it was further decreed that unless the plaintiff shall pay the said sum of money with interest as aforesaid, in lawful money of the 908 *United States, within sixty days from the date of the decree, then the trustee Wm. A. Burnett as commissioner of the court shall proceed to sell at public auction the tract of land in the bill mentioned, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of raising the amount due the defendant Fultz, for cash enough to defray the expenses of sale, and the residue on a credit of one, two and three years, &c.

From this decree Fultz applied to a judge of this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

A. H. Fultz, for the appellant.

Whitehead, for the appellee.

Staples J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This contract was entered into with reference to Confederate treasury notes as a standard of value. This, if not conceded by the parties, is clearly established by the evidence. The debt must therefore be scaled, unless it is made to appear, that according to the true understanding and agreement of the parties, it was to be discharged in a currency not liable to the scale of depreciation. The appellant relies upon the bond to show that the debtor agreed to pay in a sound currency. The promise is to pay "six years after date in current money of Virginia." It is, however, very apparent, that these words were used not so much to designate a particular medium of payment, as to exclude the inference of a contract to pay in coin.

In none of the conversations or negotiations preceding or contemporaneous with the loan, was anything said as to the kind of currency in which the debt was to be paid. In the correspondence of the parties no reference whatever is made to the 909 subject. *The appellant, in his petition, admits there is no evidence of an agreement as to the kind of currency in which the debt was to be paid, other than what appears upon the face of the bond. The proposition to pay in six years emanated from the debtor, and was acceded to by the creditor, as a measure of indulgence. The promise to pay "in current money" does not necessarily indicate an agreement to pay the nominal amount of the debt in such money, at the maturity of the contract. These words are sometimes used to express a contract of hazard, in which both parties assume the risk of the currency in use when the debt is payable. This court is always reluctant, however, to adopt a construction of the contract which leads to a construction which might often deprive the creditor of any recovery whatever.

But in this case there is nothing from which it can be inferred, that either party contemplated an agreement of that kind. It was simply an application for a loan upon time, and the advancement of the money upon that application, followed by the execution of the bond and deed of trust.

In the deed of trust no reference is made to the kind of currency in which the debt is to be paid, although, in other respects, the terms of the contract are set out with great minuteness.

The next circumstance relied upon, as showing that both parties understood the debt as payable in a sound currency, at its nominal amount, is the correspondence between the appellee and appellant since the close of the war. The letters of the appellee certainly do not show that he at any time claimed the right to scale the debt. It may be said, on the other hand, they do not show any distinct admission of an obligation to pay the whole amount of the 910 bond. It is very probable *that the appellee supposed he was bound for the whole, and did not understand his right to insist upon the scale of depreciation. Still the court is not thereby precluded from an inquiry into the nature of the original transaction. It is very certain the letters contain nothing which changes the rights and obligations of the parties.

The debt being a proper one for the scale of depreciation, it is agreed that the scale must be applied as of the date of the contract. The real controversy is as to the mode of dealing with the payments made from the years 1865 to 1869 inclusive. These payments were made in United States currency, which was then greatly depreciated, the depreciation varying considerably at the several periods of payment. In reducing the nominal amount of Confederate debts to their gold value under the statute, this court has adopted the practice of adding the premium to such value. The debtor may pay in gold if he pleases, or he may pay in currency; but the injustice can never be tolerated of allowing him to pay the gold value in a depreciated currency greatly less than such value.

Here, however, it is insisted that the payments must be also scaled to the gold value. It is urged with great force, that during all the time the appellee was making his payments and asking for indulgence, on no occasion did he ever intimate a purpose to insist upon scaling the debt; that his conduct was such as to delude the appellant into the belief that he intended to pay the face of the bond, and under this impression the appellant received the currency at its par value, and gave the credit accordingly.

To this it is answered, there is no rule of law authorizing payments to be scaled; that the creditor having consented to receive the currency as money it 911 *operates necessarily as an extinguishment of the debt pro tanto. Besides it is a mere matter of conjecture what the appellant would have done. His necessities or the chance of a profitable speculation may have induced him to take the currency at par, although he must have known the debt was to be scaled. Instances are not rare in which creditors, both during and since the war, were very willing to accept a highly depreciated currency in payment of gold debts. It is very difficult to adopt any plan of scaling payments without injustice to the debtor, and great embarrassment in the administration of justice. All that can be safely done is to add the premium to the gold value of the debt as scaled, and then apply the payments to the aggregate thus ascertained. This as nearly approaches exact justice as any rule that can be adopted.

Complaint is made by the appellant, and very justly so, that the appellee is allowed interest upon these payments. The rule is well settled in Virginia, that interest is not to be computed on payments; but upon the debt to the time of payment; and the latter deducted from the sum of principal and interest. This rule is violated by the decree.

Another ground of complaint on the part of the appellant, is, that he is not allowed compound interest. The appellant might have collected his interest at the expiration of any six months according to his contract; but having failed to do so he cannot now convert that interest into principal so as to make it an interest-bearing fund. Even though the appellee had expressly agreed to pay such interest it would have been invalid, as hard and oppressive and tending to usury.

Childers v. Deane, 4 Rand. 408-9. There is no error in this respect in the decree of the Circuit court.

912 *But for the errors already mentioned the decree must be reversed.

Christian J. dissented.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the Circuit court did not err in holding that the contract evidenced by the bond bearing date 18th April 1862, was entered into with reference to Confederate notes as a standard of value, and that the debt was under the circumstances proper to be scaled as of the date of said contract. Nor did the said court err in holding that the payments made by the appellees were not subject to the scale of depreciation. Nor did said court err in holding that the appellant is not entitled to recover compound interest.

The court is of opinion that the Circuit court did err in holding that the appellee is entitled to interest upon the several payments made by him: The rule being well settled, that interest is not to be computed on payments, but upon the debt to the time of each payment, and the latter deducted from the sum of principal and interest; and in the present case there is nothing warranting a departure from this rule.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court after reducing the appellant's debt to the gold standard, and calculating the interest thereon to the date of the first payment made December 7th 1865, ought to have added thereto the premium of 11¼ per cent., and then to have deducted from the aggregate amount thus ascertained the several payments made by the appellee.

913 *The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in decreeing a sale of the land embraced in the deed of trust upon a credit of one, two and three years. The deed having provided for a sale for cash, the Circuit court was not authorized to vary the terms of said deed without the consent of the creditor.

It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that so much of the decree of the Circuit court as is in conflict with the views herein announced, be reversed and annulled; and that the appellant do pay, &c.

And the same is remanded to the said Circuit court for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed.

Decree reversed.

and that a like judgment had been recovered in April 1866 against Marr's adm'r and Moore: That on the 10th of April 1866 another judgment had been recovered 928 *by Forbes' ex'ors against Marr's adm'or, and all his sureties, for $342.86, with 15 per cent. damages from the 31st of January 1866: and that plaintiff had paid off these judgments.

The plaintiff further states that on the 31st of March 1866 said T. L. Moore, finding that Marr's estate was insolvent, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of his share of said Marr's liabilities, and in fraud of the right of his co-sureties, conveyed all his property, consisting of a lot in Warrenton with an office on it and forty acres of land near that town, to Thomas Henderson, in consideration of fifty dollars which he owed Henderson, and maintaining, supporting and providing him with necessary clothing, and supplying also the attention of a servant, for and during the rest of the natural life of the said Thomas L. Moore." He charges that this deed was purely voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors: that Henderson knew that Moore was liable for the malfeasance in office of Marr, and for many other debts; and plaintiff charges that the conveyance to Henderson was made with the sole view of preventing the creditors of Moore from making their said debts. He states that Henderson had conveyed the forty acres of land to T. C. McLearn, and had taken a house and lot in Warrenton in part payment, and McLearn had sold to C. Bouckright; and that $333.33 of the purchase money was still due from McLearn. He charges that the deed from Moore to Henderson is fraudulent and void, and that the property thereby conveyed is liable to the plaintiff and the other creditors of Moore. And making Marr's adm'r, and his co-sureties, and Henderson and McLearn and Bouckright defendants, he calls upon them to answer as fully all the allegations of the bill as if specially inter- 929 rogated. The prayer of *the bill is that Marr's adm'r may settle his account; that the solvent sureties may be compelled to pay the plaintiff their proportion of said debts paid by him; that the deed from Moore to Henderson may be declared fraudulent and void, and the real estate therein conveyed subjected to the payment of the legal liabilities of Moore; or if the sale to McLearn and Bouckright cannot be disturbed, that the house and lot conveyed by McLearn to Henderson, and the $333.33 and interest, still due from McLearn, may be subjected to the payment of Moore's liabilities; and for general relief.

Henderson answered the bill. He admits the execution of the deed from Moore to himself, upon the consideration named in the deed as stated in the bill; but he denies that the deed was made by Moore for the purpose of avoiding his share of the liabilities of Marr and in fraud of the rights of his sureties. He denies that the deed was purely voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors; and he utterly denies that he "well knew that Moore was liable for the malfeasance in office of Marr, and for many other debts, and that the conveyance was made with the sole view of preventing the creditors of Moore from making their said debts." He avers that he was not aware of the securityship of Moore for Marr as sheriff until after the execution of the deed.

The defendant further says, that at the time of the execution of the deed, Moore was an old man; for a long time previous had been utterly helpless, unable to provide for himself, and needing the constant attention of a servant. Respondent was his nephew, and had for years been rendering him assistance in money, clothing, provisions, &c., for the amount of which Moore was indebted to him; and although 930 as a matter *of form, $50 was named in the deed, the real amount was five times as much. The old man was encumbering himself with debt; and various friends who knew of the outlay of the respondent, urged and advised him, from time to time, to assume the support of said Moore, pay off the liens upon his property, and become the owner of the same; and this plan seemed to be satisfactory to Mr. Moore. The liens upon the property, which constituted, as far as respondent knew, his indebtedness, amounted to little less than $1,000, if they did not exceed that sum, and these with the amount he owed respondent, would make over $1,250 or thereabout. The respondent could not have expected to derive any advantage from the transaction, when the highest valuation of the property was $2,000; which would only leave about $750, to meet the expense of Moore's support during his life. Respondent has paid off nearly the entire known indebtedness of Moore, supported him in Warrenton until the fall of 1868, at an annual expense exceeding $500, and is still paying for his maintenance and support at the Protestant Infirmary in Baltimore. He insists that he has paid valuable consideration for the property; and whatever view may be taken of his covenant to support Moore after the date of the conveyance, the debt due him and the liens paid by him, formed a valuable consideration sufficient to sustain the deed; and to this consideration should be added the amount expended by him in maintaining Moore, at least until he received notice of plaintiff's demand; which would constitute a valuable consideration greater than the highest estimates put upon the property.

The cause came on to be heard in April 1869, when the court, without deciding on the validity of the deed from Moore to Henderson, directed a commissioner to 931 *ascertain and report the value of the real estate mentioned in the deed, &c.; the amount of the debts and liabilities of Moore at the date of the deed; and what part thereof has been paid, and by whom; what amount the sureties of Marr, as sheriff, have paid for him, and which of them have paid it; and the amount the plaintiff is en-

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court erred in instructing the jury that the appellee Slaughter being administrator as aforesaid, could in any event, either by purchase or payment, acquire larger rights than his testator Garland would have had, had he himself paid the note in his lifetime, and after protest. Those rights in this case would have been only the rights of a surety, to be fully indemnified for his payment on account of the principal: and such indemnity is fully secured to the principal by the payment of the value paid by the surety. That was the extent of Slaughter's right of recovery in this case.

For the same reasons the court is of opinion that the Circuit court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

It is therefore considered by the court that the judgment <sup>925</sup> *aforesaid be reversed and annulled, with costs to the appellant, and a new trial be awarded him; and the cause is remanded to the said Circuit court to be further proceeded in, in accordance with the principles of this order. Judgment reversed.

926 *Henderson v. Hunton & als.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Fraudulent Conveyances.—M and H, with others, were sureties of J as sheriff, who, in 1865, was dead and insolvent. In January 1866 B recovered a judgment against H as surety for J, and in April 1866 B recovered a like judgment against M. M was an old man, not able to provide for himself, and there were several small judgments against him. In March 1866 he conveyed to his nephew T all his real estate, worth about $2,100, in consideration of $50 he owed T, and that T would provide for him during his life; T not knowing of the judgment against H, or that M was a surety of J. T paid off the judgments against M, to the amount of $687.60, and he paid for the support of M after the deed, and before March 1869 about $1,300. In March 1869 H files his bill against M and T, to set aside the deed on the ground of fraud; and T answers and denies fraud in himself, and any knowledge of a fraudulent intent on the part of M. HELD:

1. Same—Equitable Relief.—Equity would vacate the deed and hold the land liable to the creditors of M if they interposed in due time in asserting their claim.
2. Same—Laches—Part Performance by Grantee.—But the creditors of M having failed to assert their demands against the property until T had made considerable advances for the support of M, in performance of his contract, the deed is a valid security to the extent of these advances.
3. Same—Consideration—Adequacy.—A conveyance on such a consideration is not to be regarded in law as merely voluntary; and the courts will not pronounce the consideration inadequate, unless it is manifest that the services to be rendered and the expense to be incurred are grossly disproportioned to the value of the property.
4. Same—Same—Bona Fide Grantee.—Such agreements are treated as founded on valuable consideration; and consequently, they are not fraudulent, so far as the grantee is concerned.

<sup>927</sup> *him: he must be cognizant of the fraudulent intent of the grantor. If there was such intent.

5. Same—Actual Fraud by Both Parties.—When there is actual fraud, both parties participating, a deed is utterly void ab initio, and is not permitted to stand as security for any purpose. The fraud infects the whole transaction.
6. Same—Constructive Fraud—Bona Fide Grantee.—When the deed is merely constructively fraudulent, or when it appears that the grantee has acted bona fide, and did not participate in the fraud, the deed is permitted to stand as a security for what is justly due to the grantee, or for advances made by him subsequent to its execution.
7. Same—Consideration of Future Support—Legal Title—Vacation of Deed.—A bona fide deed, in consideration of future support, though voidable at the suit of creditors, is not void. The legal title vests in the grantee by operation of the deed, good against all the world, except creditors: subject to be divested by them if they impeach it in due time. But the title remains in the grantor until the deed is vacated; and when vacated, it is not void ab initio, but only from the time of the decree.
8. De Minimis.—The amount paid by T, is so nearly the value of the property, that the bill of H should be dismissed.

In March 1869 Silas B. Hunton instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Fauquier county, against Thomas Henderson, T. L. Moore and others, to set aside a deed made by Moore to Henderson. In his bill he states, that he and Moore and five others, whom he names, were the sureties of John Q. Marr, late sheriff of Fauquier county, who had died insolvent. That a judgment had been recovered by John S. Byrne against the plaintiff and three others of the sureties of said Marr, in January 1866, for the sum of $1,117, with interest from December 15th 1858, for the failure of Marr as sheriff to pay over the proceeds of fee bills collected by him: this judgment being subject to a credit of $500, as of the 8th December 1859; sideration; and consequently, they are only fraudulent, so far as the grantee is concerned, when mala fides is justly attributable to him: he must be cognizant of the fraudulent intent of the grantor. If there was such intent.

5. Same—Actual Fraud by Both Parties.—When there is actual fraud, both parties participating, a deed is utterly void ab initio, and is not permitted to stand as security for any purpose. The fraud infects the whole transaction.

6. Same—Constructive Fraud—Bona Fide Grantee.—When the deed is merely constructively fraudulent, or when it appears that the grantee has acted bona fide, and did not participate in the fraud, the deed is permitted to stand as a security for what is justly due to the grantee, or for advances made by him subsequent to its execution.

7. Same—Consideration of Future Support—Legal Title—Vacation of Deed.—A bona fide deed, in consideration of future support, though voidable at the suit of creditors, is not void. The legal title vests in the grantee by operation of the deed, good against all the world, except creditors; subject to be divested by them if they impeach it in due time. But the title remains in the grantor until the deed is vacated; and when vacated, it is not void ab initio, but only from the time of the decree.

8. De Minimis.—The amount paid by T. is so nearly the value of the property, that the bill of H should be dismissed.

In March 1869 Silas B. Hunton instituted a suit in equity in the Circuit court of Fauquier county, against Thomas Henderson, T. L. Moore and others, to set aside a deed made by Moore to Henderson. In his bill he states, that he and Moore and five others, whom he names, were the sureties of John Q. Marr, late sheriff of Fauquier county, who had died insolvent. That a judgment had been recovered by John S. Byrne against the plaintiff and three others of the sureties of said Marr, in January 1866, for the sum of $1,117, with interest from December 15th 1858, for the failure of Marr as sheriff to pay over the proceeds of fee bills collected by him: this judgment being subject to a credit of $500, as of the 8th December 1859:

the grantor in a deed founded upon a valuable consideration, and such intent is unknown to the grantee, the latter is not chargeable with want of good faith, since no rule is better established than that both parties must concur in the fraudulent intent to render the deed absolutely void.” *Rixey v. and that a like judgment had been recovered in April 1866 against Marr's adm'r and Moore: That on the 10th of April 1866 another judgment had been recovered 928 *by Forbes' ex'ors against Marr's adm'or, and all his sureties, for $342.86, with 15 per cent. damages from the 31st of January 1866: and that plaintiff had paid off these judgments.

The plaintiff further states that on the 31st of March 1866 said T. L. Moore, finding that Marr's estate was insolvent, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of his share of said Marr's liabilities, and in fraud of the right of his co-sureties, conveyed all his property, consisting of a lot in Warrenton with an office on it and forty acres of land near that town, to Thomas Henderson, in consideration of fifty dollars which he owed Henderson, and maintaining, supporting and providing him with necessary clothing, and supplying also the attention of a servant, for and during the rest of the natural life of the said Thomas L. Moore." He charges that this deed was purely voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors: that Henderson knew that Moore was liable for the malfeasance in office of Marr, and for many other debts; and plaintiff charges that the conveyance to Henderson was made with the sole view of preventing the creditors of Moore from making their said debts. He states that Henderson had conveyed the forty acres of land to T. C. McLearn, and had taken a house and lot in Warrenton in part payment, and McLearn had sold to C. Bouckright; and that $333.33 of the purchase money was still due from McLearn. He charges that the deed from Moore to Henderson is fraudulent and void, and that the property thereby conveyed is liable to the plaintiff and the other creditors of Moore. And making Marr's adm'r, and his co-sureties, and Henderson and McLearn and Bouckright defendants, he calls upon them to answer as fully all the allegations of the bill as if specially interrogated. 929 The prayer of *the bill is that Marr's adm'r may settle his account; that the solvent sureties may be compelled to pay the plaintiff their proportion of said debts paid by him; that the deed from Moore to Henderson may be declared fraudulent and void, and the real estate therein conveyed subjected to the payment of the legal liabilities of Moore; or if the sale to McLearn and Bouckright cannot be disturbed, that the house and lot conveyed by McLearn to Henderson, and the $333.33 and interest, still due from McLearn, may be subjected to the payment of Moore's liabilities; and for general relief.

Henderson answered the bill. He admits the execution of the deed from Moore to himself, upon the consideration named in the deed as stated in the bill; but he denies that the deed was made by Moore for the purpose of avoiding his share of the liabilities of Marr and in fraud of the rights of his sureties. He denies that the deed was purely voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors; and he utterly denies that he "well knew that Moore was liable for the malfeasance in office of Marr, and for many other debts, and that the conveyance was made with the sole view of preventing the creditors of Moore from making their said debts." He avers that he was not aware of the securityship of Moore for Marr as sheriff until after the execution of the deed.

The defendant further says, that at the time of the execution of the deed, Moore was an old man; for a long time previous had been utterly helpless, unable to provide for himself, and needing the constant attention of a servant. Respondent was his nephew, and had for years been rendering him assistance in money, clothing, provisions, &c., for the amount of which Moore was indebted to him; and although 930 as a matter *of form, $50 was named in the deed, the real amount was five times as much. The old man was encumbering himself with debt; and various friends who knew of the outlay of the respondent, urged and advised him, from time to time, to assume the support of said Moore, pay off the liens upon his property, and become the owner of the same; and this plan seemed to be satisfactory to Mr. Moore. The liens upon the property, which constituted, as far as respondent knew, his indebtedness, amounted to little less than $1,000, if they did not exceed that sum, and these with the amount he owed respondent, would make over $1,250 or thereabout. The respondent could not have expected to derive any advantage from the transaction, when the highest valuation of the property was $2,000; which would only leave about $750, to meet the expense of Moore's support during his life. Respondent has paid off nearly the entire known indebtedness of Moore, supported him in Warrenton until the fall of 1868, at an annual expense exceeding $500, and is still paying for his maintenance and support at the Protestant Infirmary in Baltimore. He insists that he has paid valuable consideration for the property; and whatever view may be taken of his covenant to support Moore after the date of the conveyance, the debt due him and the liens paid by him, formed a valuable consideration sufficient to sustain the deed; and to this consideration should be added the amount expended by him in maintaining Moore, at least until he received notice of plaintiff's demand; which would constitute a valuable consideration greater than the highest estimates put upon the property.

The cause came on to be heard in April 1869, when the court, without deciding on the validity of the deed from Moore to Henderson, directed a commissioner to 931 *ascertain and report the value of the real estate mentioned in the deed, &c.; the amount of the debts and liabilities of Moore at the date of the deed; and what part thereof has been paid, and by whom; what amount the sureties of Marr, as sheriff, have paid for him, and which of them have paid it; and the amount the plaintiff is entitled to recover from Moore on account of money paid as co-surety of Marr.

The commissioner reported, that the forty acres of land were worth $1,500, the office and lot in Warrenton was worth $600=$2,100. That Henderson had sold the land for $1,500, and had received all the purchase money except $275. He reported debts of Moore paid by Henderson, all of them judgments against Moore before the deed was made, $687.60; the amount paid after the deed for the support of Moore (including Henderson's own debt at $250, and for putting a new roof on the office in Warrenton, $78.72), $1,529.50; making Henderson's payments for Moore $2,217.10. The amount of debt paid in 1867 by Hunton as surety for Marr, with interest to September 1st 1870, was $1,752.34; of which Hunton was entitled to recover from Moore $876.17.

The judgment of Byrne against Hunton and others as sureties of Marr, was rendered in January 1866, and was not docketed; the judgment of the same plaintiff against Marr's adm'r and Moore, was rendered at the April term 1866, and the judgments of Forbes' ex'ors against Marr's adm'r and all the sureties for $342.86, were rendered at the same term of the court. Henderson was the only witness examined. He says, Moore owed him about $250; but he does not state the items. He further says, that at the time the deed was executed he did not know of any notices against Moore as the 932 surety of Marr; and at that time *had not heard that Moore was Marr's surety. Mr. Moore was about seventy-six years old, and he lived about three years and a half thereafter.

The cause came on to be heard on the 21st of April 1871, when the court held, that the deed from Moore to Henderson was fraudulent as to the creditors of Moore; sustained the sale of the forty acres of land to McLearn, and decreed a sale of the office lot in Warrenton; and that Henderson should account for the $1,500 the price of the forty acres of land he had sold, with interest from the day of sale, in the following manner: first, to the liens existing and outstanding on said property paid off by Henderson; second, to any other liens existing at the date of the deed; third to the $50 due by Moore to Henderson; and the balance distributed according to law, among the creditors of T. L. Moore dec'd. And to this end the report was recommitted, with directions to the commissioner to convene the creditors of Moore, &c.

From this decree Henderson applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Brooke & Scott, for the appellant.

Eppa Hunton, for the appellee.

Staples J. This is a creditor's bill to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud. The deed in question conveys all the real estate of the grantor, Thomas L. Moore, in the county of Fauquier, to Thomas L. Henderson, the grantee, in consideration of a debt of fifty dollars due by the former to the latter, and for the further consideration of a comfortable support to be furnished the grantor during his life.

As Moore was much embarrassed with debt at the date of this transaction, 933 there is no doubt but that a *court of equity would have vacated this deed and held the property liable to the demands of creditors if they had interposed in due time in asserting their claims. Although the law does not restrain the owner in the exercise of a just dominion and control of his estate, it does not permit him to defeat the just claims of creditors, by reservations of benefit to himself inconsistent with those claims.

But the creditors of Moore having failed to assert their demands against the property until Henderson had made considerable advances for the support of Moore, in performance of his contract, the question we are to consider is, whether the deed is a valid security to the extent of these advances.

A conveyance of property in consideration of an agreement to support the grantor is not regarded in law as merely voluntary. As it is impossible to foretell how long the grantor may live, or what expense the grantee may necessarily incur in maintaining him, the courts will not undertake to pronounce the consideration inadequate; unless indeed it is manifest that the services to be rendered and the expense to be incurred are grossly disproportionate to the value of the property. Such agreements are therefore treated as founded upon a valuable consideration. And consequently they are only fraudulent so far as the grantee is concerned, when mala fides is justly attributable to him. No rule is better settled than that both parties must concur in the fraudulent intent. The fraudulent design of the grantor, if unknown to the grantee, will not infect the latter with a want of good faith. 2 Lomax 420, margin 324.

When there is actual fraud, both parties participating, the deed is utterly void ab initio, and is not permitted to stand as 934 a security for any purpose. The *fraud infects the whole transaction. So far has this doctrine been carried, that in a case before this court, it was held, that a deed could not operate as security for a valid debt, although the other provisions were forced upon the creditor as a condition of securing what was actually due him. In no instance will the courts afford any indemnity to a particeps criminis in case of actual fraud. Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances 572.

When, however, the deed is merely constructively fraudulent, or when it appears that the grantee has acted bona fide, and did not participate in the fraud, the deed is permitted to stand as a security for what is justly due the grantee, or for advances made by him subsequent to its execution. This doctrine is not only just and reasonable in itself, but is supported by abundant authority. As, however, it is strongly controverted by the learned counsel for the appellee, it may not be improper to mention some of the cases which sustain the proposition.

In Albee v. Webster, 16 New Hamp. R. 362, the court say: A sale may be actually fraudulent as to creditors for want of sufficient consideration, and yet be made good if full consideration be subsequently paid before creditors interfere. So a sale may be fraudulent as to creditors on account of a secret trust accompanying it; but if by a subsequent agreement, before creditors interfere, this secret trust is discharged and the sale is otherwise made valid, the fact that the trust once existed will not operate to vitiate the sale, the fraud being purged.

In Thomas v. Goodwin & als., 12 Mass. R. 140, it was held, that where one summoned as trustee, had received goods of the principal debtor under circumstances indicative of fraud, and which would 935 have *fixed him as trustee, but before service of process upon him had paid debts of the principal to the amount of the goods received, he was discharged. The case of Lynde et al. v. McGregor, 13 Allen R. 181, is to the same effect; the court regarding the distinction between deeds actually fraudulent and deeds constructively so; and that the latter may be made effectual by subsequent advancements.

In Gardner Bank v. Wheaton, 8 Greenl. R. 373, the transaction was held to be fraudulent and void as against creditors; but there being no moral turpitude on the part of the grantee, he might charge upon the estate all his payments and expenses actually made and incurred under the agreement before the conveyance was impeached.

In Bean v. Smith & als., 2 Mason's R. 252, 296, the language of Mr. Justice Story is very applicable to the case before us. After discussing the facts, he proceeds to say: The next question that arises is, whether the conveyances are to stand as securities for the sums which have been really advanced or paid by them for their father since the execution of these instruments. I agree to the doctrine laid down by Chancellor Kent in Boyd & al. v. Dunlap, 1 John. Ch. R. 478, and Sands v. Codwise, 4 John. R. 536-549, that a deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity; but it is otherwise with a deed obtained under suspicious circumstances, or which is only constructively fraudulent.

* * * Again, cases are not unfrequent in equity, where the court upon setting aside a conveyance, has left some benefit to the grantee. But that is done only where there are circumstances which do not immediately affect the party against whom the decree is sought with original 936 *and meditated fraud; or if he holds a derivative title, where that title was attained without knowledge of the fraud. There are numerous other cases sustaining this view, which I shall content myself merely with citing. Oriental Bank v. Haskins, 3 Metc. R. 332; Hutchins v. Sprague, 4 New Hamp. R. 469; Hopper, adm'r v. Sisk, 1 Carter's R. 175. See also Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances 574, and the numerous authorities referred to in note. And see Janney v. Barnes et als., 11 Leigh 100.

In the case before us there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that Henderson, at the time of the execution of the deed, had any notice of this claim, or of any indebtedness on the part of Moore, besides the judgments which were afterwards paid by him. At what time he acquired such notice does not appear. Moore's liability, as one of the sureties of Marr, was, of course, purely contingent. When the deed was made no judgment had been rendered against Moore, nor had the extent of his liability been fully ascertained: that, of course, would depend upon circumstances. If the principal was solvent, it would amount to nothing; if insolvent, but the sureties were all responsible, the measure of his liability would be very small. Now what is there to show that Henderson had any information whatever upon these subjects? Absolutely nothing. The conduct of the appellee was well calculated to delude him into a feeling of security. The judgment against Moore was recovered upon notice and motion on the 20th April 1866, but a few weeks after the date of the deed: and yet no execution was issued upon it, and no effort made to enforce it. It does not appear that it was even docketed. The payments of complainant were made in 1867;

but no proceedings were instituted to 937 annul the deed until *the filing of this bill in March 1869. In the meantime no claim was asserted against Henderson; no notice given him to withhold any advances to Moore, although the deed under which he claimed was duly recorded, and must have been known in the community. During all this time, from March 1866 to March 1869 he is permitted to incur heavy expense in the support of Moore, who was his uncle, without a word of warning or objection from those most interested in looking after this property. In the language of the Supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Pearsoll v. Chapin, 44 Penn. St. R. 1, 14, "while a creditor does not confirm by doing nothing, and the contract must be a nullity as against his rights, by its performance it may be very far from being a nullity: or if he be not prompt in asserting his rights it may dispose of all the property so that he can never reach it."

The evidence shows that Henderson paid valid judgments constituting liens on the land to the amount of $687.60; and that he expended about $1,200 in supplying Moore with board and clothing and other things essential to his comfort. There is every reason to believe that Henderson has not derived the slightest advantage from the transaction. He may be guilty of fraud as charged in the bill; but the record does not show it. And I had always supposed the rule well established, that as a charge of fraud is against the presumption of honesty, is an imputation of the gravest character, the courts require to sustain it by proof of the clearest and most satisfactory nature.

It is said, however, that the deed being void at the time of its execution, it is a mere nullity, and cannot be made good by any matter ex post facto. It has been already seen that this rule applies only to conveyances tainted with actual fraud con-

938 curred in by both parties. *It has no application to cases like the present, in which an innocent purchaser contracts to pay the value of the property in the support of the grantor. Such conveyances may be voidable at the suit of creditors; but they are not utterly void. The legal title rests in the grantee by operation of the deed, good against all the world except the creditors; subject to be divested by them if they see fit to impeach the conveyance in due time.

But the title remains in the grantee until the deed is vacated; and when it is vacated, it is not rendered void ab initio; but only from the time of the decree so declaring. Fupp v. Talbird, 1 Hill Ch. R. 99; Backhouse's adm'r v. Jett's adm'r, 1 Brock. R. 500; Pearsoll v. Chapin, 44 Penn. St. R. 1, 15.

It is very true that judgment was obtained against Moore before the advances were made by Henderson; but the title was not thereby divested. A judgment lien constituted no interest in the land itself; nor does it confer any right of property therein. The lien operates as a charge upon whatever the debtor possesses at the time; but it cannot operate beyond that. Until the deed is vacated the title remains in the grantee; and there is nothing upon which the judgment can operate. The grantee having purchased the property in consideration of a support furnished the grantor, every advance by him is a payment of purchase money pro tanto. It is not materially different from a payment in money to the grantor himself, and its expenditure by him in the purchase of the means of subsistence. If the payment is bona fide made, it will not be affected by the existence of a judgment lien obtained after the execution of the deed of conveyance. It is competent for the creditor at any time to interfere, and by proper proceedings, to require 939 the *appropriation of the purchase money, or the estate itself, to the satisfaction of his claim. If he fails to do so until the purchase money is paid, or until the value of the estate is expended in the support of his debtor, it is his folly or his misfortune. The loss cannot be visited upon an innocent purchaser.

It appears from the report of the commissioner, that the real estate embraced in the deed was worth about twenty-one hundred dollars. The amount of Henderson's account for judgments paid and expenses incurred is about two thousand dollars. This does not include a claim of $250 asserted by him against Moore upon a previous indebtedness, as he maintains. The debt secured by the deed is put down at fifty dollars; and Henderson does not satisfactorily explain the discrepancy. This item of $250 must therefore be rejected from the account. But if it be excluded, the amount actually paid and not controverted in the court below, falls but little short of the value of the property. If we regard Henderson as a bona fide purchaser he is of course entitled to all the rights appertaining to that position. A small excess of the value of the property over the amount of the purchase money will not justify the interference of the courts. The gravamen of the bill is fraud in the debtor, with the knowledge of the purchaser. It is positively denied in the answer, and is not established by the proofs. The only alternative is the dismissal of the bill. The decree of the Circuit court must therefore be reversed, and a decree entered dismissing the bill.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Staples J.

Decree reversed.

940 *Otterback v. Alex. & Fred. Railway Co.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Appeals—Supersedeas Bond—Time within Which Bond Must Be Given.*—A judgment is rendered on the 18th of May 1872, and one of the parties obtains an award of a supersedeas to the judgment on the 8th of November 1872, but the supersedeas bond is not given until the 15th of April 1875; though counsel had marked his name on the docket as counsel for the appellee. The bond not having been given within the time prescribed by the statute the appeal must be dismissed; and the counsel marking his name on the docket, though it may be a waiver of the process, is not a waiver of the bond. Code of 1873, ch. 178, s. 17, p. 1140.

This was a motion by the Alexandria & Fredericksburg Railway Company to dismiss an appeal which had been allowed to Mrs. Sarah Otterback, from the judgment of the circuit court of Prince William county, affirming a judgment of the County court of said county, in a cause in which the appellee here was plaintiff and the appellant was defendant. The judgment of the Circuit court was rendered on the 13th of May 1872. Though a supersedeas to this judgment was awarded by a judge of this court on the 9th of November 1872, the supersedeas bond was not executed until the 15th of April 1875; though counsel had put his name on the docket as counsel for the appellee.

*Appeals—Supersedeas Bond—Time within Which Bond Must Be Given.—This limit is still prescribed by statute in Va. Code 1887, § 2474; see also, 4 Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) 951; Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 1163; Acker v. A. & P. R. R. Co., 84 Va. 648; Pace v. Ficklin, 78 Va. 292; Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a motion to dismiss the supersedeas in this case for the failure of the plaintiff in error to execute the bond required of her for the prosecution of the same within the time prescribed by law.

The law under which the supersedeas was issued in this case, is to be found in the Code, chapter 178, section 17, page 1140, which declares that "no process shall issue upon any appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, allowed to or from a final judgment, decree or order, if when the record is delivered to the clerk of the appellate court, there shall have elapsed two years since the date of such final judgment, decree or order; but the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, shall be dismissed, whenever it appears that two years have elapsed since the said date before the said record is delivered to such clerk, or before such bond is given, as is required to be given, before the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas takes effect;" &c.

The date of the final judgment, to which the supersedeas applies in this case, is the 13th day of May 1872. The supersedeas bond was not given until the 15th day of April 1875, when more than two years had elapsed since the date of the said judgment. It seems to follow therefore, as a necessary consequence, that the supersedeas must be dismissed under the said law.

This question has, in effect, been decided by this court in the case of Yarborough & wife v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374; the only difference between the law under which that case arose, and the one under which this case arises, being that the limitation 942 prescribed by the *law in that case was five years, while the limitation prescribed by the law in this case is two years.

The law is now, and was when that case was decided, very different from what it was when Williamson v. Gayle, &c., 4 Gratt. 180, was decided; and therefore the last named case did not govern the former, and does not govern this case.

The only ground on which the counsel for the plaintiff in error relies to distinguish this case from that of Yarborough & wife v. Deshazo is, that there was an appearance in the appellate court in this case by counsel of the defendant in error, within the time for giving the bond, without making any objection on account of the failure to give the bond, which, it is contended, lulled the plaintiff in error into a sense of security, and was a waiver, in effect, of the bond.

The appearance of counsel referred to was merely to have his name marked on the office docket of the court, as counsel for the defendant in error; and was not intended to be, and had not the effect of being, a waiver of anything, except, perhaps, the necessity of service of process on his client, when such process could lawfully issue. Certainly it could not have been intended, nor could have the effect, in itself, to release the plaintiff in error from his obligation to give the supersedeas bond required by law.

Therefore the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—Practice—Indictment—Counts.†—An indictment for felony contains three counts, and on the trial of the prisoner he is found guilty on the third count. He is entitled to a judgment of acquittal on the first and second counts.
2. Same—Statutory Provisions.—The 3d section of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, creates no offence. It declares nothing necessary to be noticed in pleading, either in the indictment or elsewhere. It is a mere incident to § 1 and 2 of the said chapter, and a mere limitation of the word "dwelling house" therein mentioned.
3. Same—Arson—Punishment.‡—A count in an indictment, which charges that the prisoner at night did burn "a certain other house called a barn and stable of one R, there situate, the same being an outhouse not adjoining the dwelling house, nor under the same roof, but some persons usually lodging therein at night, to wit," &c., does not set out an offence for which the punishment is death.
4. Same—Same—Error—Appeal.—On such a count the prisoner having been found guilty, and sentenced to be hung, the appellate court will reverse the judgment. But as the count does charge the burning of a barn and stable, which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, under § 5 of said chapter, the additional description of the barn in the count may be rejected as surplusage, and he will be remanded to be tried for the offence under that 5th section.
5. Same—Same—"Dwelling House."—To make an outhouse, not adjoining a dwelling house, nor under the same roof, parcel thereof within the meaning of § 1, of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, two things must appear: 1st, that such outhouse is within the the curtilage of the dwelling house, and occupied therewith; and 2d, that some person usually lodges therein at night.
6. Same—Same—Same.—"A dwelling house," in the meaning of section 1, of ch. 188 of the Code of 1873, embraces all its parcels, including such an outhouse as is parcel thereof. The burning of 944 such an outhouse is the burning of *a dwelling house, in the meaning of this law, and may be so described in the indictment; and proof of the burning of the outhouse, will as much sustain the indictment, as would proof of the burning of the principal part of the dwelling house, or the whole of it including all the parcels.

is an imputation of the gravest character, the courts require to sustain it by proof of the clearest and most satisfactory nature.

It is said, however, that the deed being void at the time of its execution, it is a mere nullity, and cannot be made good by any matter ex post facto. It has been already seen that this rule applies only to conveyances tainted with actual fraud con-
938 curred in by both parties. *It has no application to cases like the present, in which an innocent purchaser contracts to pay the value of the property in the support of the grantor. Such conveyances may be voidable at the suit of creditors; but they are not utterly void. The legal title rests in the grantee by operation of the deed, good against all the world except the creditors; subject to be divested by them if they see fit to impeach the conveyance in due time.

But the title remains in the grantee until the deed is vacated; and when it is vacated, it is not rendered void ab initio; but only from the time of the decree so declaring. Fupp v. Talbird, 1 Hill Ch. R. 99; Backhouse's adm'r v. Jett's adm'r, 1 Brock. R. 500; Pearsoll v. Chapin, 44 Penn. St. R. 1, 15.

It is very true that judgment was obtained against Moore before the advances were made by Henderson; but the title was not thereby divested. A judgment lien constituted no interest in the land itself; nor does it confer any right of property therein. The lien operates as a charge upon whatever the debtor possesses at the time; but it cannot operate beyond that. Until the deed is vacated the title remains in the grantee; and there is nothing upon which the judgment can operate. The grantee having purchased the property in consideration of a support furnished the grantor, every advance by him is a payment of purchase money pro tanto. It is not materially different from a payment in money to the grantor himself, and its expenditure by him in the purchase of the means of subsistence. If the payment is bona fide made, it will not be affected by the existence of a judgment lien obtained after the execution of the deed of conveyance. It is competent for the creditor at any time to interfere, and by proper proceedings, to require 939 the *appropriation of the purchase money, or the estate itself, to the satisfaction of his claim. If he fails to do so until the purchase money is paid, or until the value of the estate is expended in the support of his debtor, it is his folly or his misfortune. The loss cannot be visited upon an innocent purchaser.

It appears from the report of the commissioner, that the real estate embraced in the deed was worth about twenty-one hundred dollars. The amount of Henderson's account for judgments paid and expenses incurred is about two thousand dollars. This does not include a claim of $250 asserted by him against Moore upon a previous indebtedness, as he maintains. The debt secured by the deed is put down at fifty dollars; and Henderson does not satisfactorily explain the discrepancy. This item of $250 must therefore be rejected from the account. But if it be excluded, the amount actually paid and not controverted in the court below, falls but little short of the value of the property. If we regard Henderson as a bona fide purchaser he is of course entitled to all the rights appertaining to that position. A small excess of the value of the property over the amount of the purchase money will not justify the interference of the courts. The gravamen of the bill is fraud in the debtor, with the knowledge of the purchaser. It is positively denied in the answer, and is not established by the proofs. The only alternative is the dismissal of the bill. The decree of the Circuit court must therefore be reversed, and a decree entered dismissing the bill.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Staples J.

Decree reversed.

940 *Otterback v. Alex. & Fred. Railway Co.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Appeals—Supersedeas Bond—Time within Which Bond Must Be Given.*—A judgment is rendered on the 18th of May 1872, and one of the parties obtains an award of a supersedeas to the judgment on the 9th of November 1872, but the supersedeas bond is not given until the 15th of April 1875; though counsel had marked his name on the docket as counsel for the appellee. The bond not having been given within the time prescribed by the statute the appeal must be dismissed; and the counsel marking his name on the docket, though it may be a waiver of the process, is not a waiver of the bond. Code of 1873, ch. 178, s. 17, p. 1140.

This was a motion by the Alexandria & Fredericksburg Railway Company to dismiss an appeal which had been allowed to Mrs. Sarah Otterback, from the judgment of the circuit court of Prince William county, affirming a judgment of the County court of said county, in a cause in which the appellee here was plaintiff and the appellant was defendant. The judgment of the Circuit court was rendered on the 13th of May 1872. Though a supersedeas to this judgment was awarded by a judge of this court on the 9th of November 1872, the supersedeas bond was not executed until the 15th of April 1875; though counsel had put his name on the docket as counsel for the appellee.

F. L. Smith and F. L. Smith, Jr., counsel for the appellant.

941 *Wm. H. Payne and Jones & Bouldin for the appellee.

*Appeals—Supersedeas Bond—Time within Which Bond Must Be Given.—This limit is still prescribed by statute in Va. Code 1887, § 2474; see also, 4 Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) 951; Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 1163; Acker v. A. & P. R. R. Co., 84 Va. 648; Pace v. Ficklin, 78 Va. 292; Frazier v. Frazier, 77 Va. 775.

Moncure P. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a motion to dismiss the supersedeas in this case for the failure of the plaintiff in error to execute the bond required of her for the prosecution of the same within the time prescribed by law.

The law under which the supersedeas was issued in this case, is to be found in the Code, chapter 178, section 17, page 1140, which declares that "no process shall issue upon any appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, allowed to or from a final judgment, decree or order, if when the record is delivered to the clerk of the appellate court, there shall have elapsed two years since the date of such final judgment, decree or order; but the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, shall be dismissed, whenever it appears that two years have elapsed since the said date before the said record is delivered to such clerk, or before such bond is given, as is required to be given, before the appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas takes effect;" &c.

The date of the final judgment, to which the supersedeas applies in this case, is the 13th day of May 1872. The supersedeas bond was not given until the 15th day of April 1875, when more than two years had elapsed since the date of the said judgment. It seems to follow therefore, as a necessary consequence, that the supersedeas must be dismissed under the said law.

This question has, in effect, been decided by this court in the case of Yarborough & wife v. Deshazo, 7 Gratt. 374; the only difference between the law under which that case arose, and the one under which this case arises, being that the limitation 942 prescribed by the *law in that case was five years, while the limitation prescribed by the law in this case is two years.

The law is now, and was when that case was decided, very different from what it was when Williamson v. Gayle, &c., 4 Gratt. 180, was decided; and therefore the last named case did not govern the former, and does not govern this case.

The only ground on which the counsel for the plaintiff in error relies to distinguish this case from that of Yarborough & wife v. Deshazo is, that there was an appearance in the appellate court in this case by counsel of the defendant in error, within the time for giving the bond, without making any objection on account of the failure to give the bond, which, it is contended, lulled the plaintiff in error into a sense of security, and was a waiver, in effect, of the bond.

The appearance of counsel referred to was merely to have his name marked on the office docket of the court, as counsel for the defendant in error; and was not intended to be, and had not the effect of being, a waiver of anything, except, perhaps, the necessity of service of process on his client, when such process could lawfully issue. Certainly it could not have been intended, nor could have the effect, in itself, to release the plaintiff in error from his obligation to give the supersedeas bond required by law.

Therefore the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—Practice—Indictment—Counts.†—An indictment for felony contains three counts, and on the trial of the prisoner he is found guilty on the third count. He is entitled to a judgment of acquittal on the first and second counts.
2. Same—Statutory Provisions.—The 3d section of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, creates no offence. It declares nothing necessary to be noticed in pleading, either in the indictment or elsewhere. It is a mere incident to § 1 and 2 of the said chapter, and a mere limitation of the word "dwelling house" therein mentioned.
3. Same—Arson—Punishment.‡—A count in an indictment, which charges that the prisoner at night did burn "a certain other house called a barn and stable of one R, there situate, the same being an outhouse not adjoining the dwelling house, nor under the same roof, but some persons usually lodging therein at night, to wit," &c., does not set out an offence for which the punishment is death.
4. Same—Same—Error—Appeal.—On such a count the prisoner having been found guilty, and sentenced to be hung, the appellate court will reverse the judgment. But as the count does charge the burning of a barn and stable, which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, under § 5 of said chapter, the additional description of the barn in the count may be rejected as surplusage, and he will be remanded to be tried for the offence under that 5th section.
5. Same—Same—"Dwelling House."—To make an outhouse, not adjoining a dwelling house, nor under the same roof, parcel thereof within the meaning of § 1, of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, two things must appear: 1st. that such outhouse is within the the curtilage of the dwelling house, and occupied therewith; and 2d, that some person usually lodges therein at night.
6. Same—Same—Same.—"A dwelling house," in the meaning of section 1, of ch. 188 of the Code of 1873, embraces all its parcels, including such an outhouse as is parcel thereof. The burning of 944 such an outhouse is the burning of *a dwelling house, in the meaning of this law, and may be so described in the indictment; and proof of the burning of the outhouse, will as much sustain the indictment, as would proof of the burning of the principal part of the dwelling house, or the whole of it including all the parcels.

†Criminal Practice.—"It is settled law in this state, that where there are several counts in an indictment, and the jury find the accused guilty upon one of the counts, saying nothing as to the others, the verdict operates as an acquittal upon the counts of which the verdict takes no notice, and the court should enter a judgment accordingly." Stuart's Case, 28 Gratt. 953, and note, citing principal case; Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 116, and Hicks v. Com., 86 Va. 231, also cite the principal case for this proposition. the other indictments for felony which appear to have been found against him, in the same court and at the same time with the indictment which has been tried as aforesaid, or any other which may have been or may be found against him for felony in the same court.

The judgment was as follows:

951 *It seems to the court, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the said judgment is erroneous: Therefore it is considered that the same be reversed and annulled. And this court proceeding to enter such judgment as the said Circuit court ought to have entered, it is further considered, that the plaintiff in error be acquitted of the charges contained in the first and second counts of the indictment. And it is ordered that the verdict of the jury against him on the third count be set aside, and the cause remanded to the said circuit court for a new trial to be had therein on the said third count, for the offence of feloniously and maliciously burning a barn and stable as therein charged, and as described in the fifth section of chapter one hundred and eighty-eight of the Code. But it will be competent for the court below, if deemed best to do so, to have a noße prosequi entered as to the said third count; and to proceed to the trial of the plaintiff in error in one or more of the other indictments for felony which appear to have been found against him in the same court and at the same time with the indictment on which he has been tried in this cause, or any other indictment which may have been or may be found against him for felony in the same court.

Which is ordered to be certified to the said circuit court for Chesterfield county.

Judgment reversed.

VII. Errors Caused by Fault of the Accused.

I. IN GENERAL.

The provision in the Constitution of the United States that no person "shall be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb" applies as such only to the courts of the United States, and not to the state courts. The common-law maxim, however, on which the provision is founded, does exist in Virginia and goes even further than that provision. For while that is confined, in terms to cases involving "life or limb" the maxim extends to all criminal cases. Jones v. Com., 20 Gratt. 648.

A plea of autrefois acquit showing on its face a distinct offence from that for which prisoner is indicted, is demurrable. State v. Evans, 23 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. Rep. 792.

On a plea of autrefois acquit, when the general issue is also put in, the question whether there shall be one jury or two, is in the sound discretion of the court. If the trial is by only one jury, the verdict must respond to both issues.

Parol evidence may be introduced to show the person is the same, and the offence the same, but not to vary the record, which is conclusive. State v. Hudkins, 26 W. Va. 247, 13 S. E. Rep. 307.

II. ESSENTIALS.

1. The Record.—Entry by clerk in the minute book of the making of a presentment is a sufficient record of such presentment though not spread at large in the minutes. Myers v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 160.

Persons indicted for burning the house of B. plead autrefois acquit of same offence on same evidence, making the record part of the plea. Held, a reply "no such record" is sufficient, as it denies an essential part of the plea. Page v. Com., 27 Gratt. 954.

A plea which does not set forth the court in which, nor the time when, nor any other circumstance of the prosecution, trial or acquittal, and which does not vouch the record of the same court, nor show the record of acquittal if of another court, should be rejected on motion. Neither a demurrer nor plea is necessary in such case. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 609-677.

There is no doubt, but that the transcript of the record pleaded, or the records themselves ought to be produced to the circuit court when the plea of autrefois acquit is pleaded. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 232.

Plea of autrefois acquit though informal will be sustained on demurrer if good in substance. Day v. Com., 23 Gratt. 915, Va. Code 1887, § 3272.

On an indictment for murder the defendant filed a plea in abatement that he had no proper examining trial and the commonwealth's attorney replied but failed to vouch the record. Because of that material defect the indictment was quashed. Held, that such acquittal could not be set up in bar of a second indictment for murder. Souther v. Com., 7 Gratt. 672.

2. Jurisdiction.—The court deciding the first case must have jurisdiction or its judgment cannot be set up in bar to further proceeding for same cause. Day v. Com., 23 Gratt. 915.

An examining court, without authority to do so acquits defendant of murder and remands him to be tried for manslaughter. This does not bar the superior court from indicting him for murder. Bailey's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 258; Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188; Sorrell's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 253.

On indictment for felony, the indictment was removed from county to corporation court. Held, to invalidate that indictment but no bar to new indictment. Marshall v. Com., 20 Gratt. 845.

Where a justice has power to try and punish or send to county court for trial and he does only the latter, his action cannot be set up in bar of trial in county court. Wolverton v. Com., 75 Va. 909.

On indictment for a felony, an entry on the record of the examining court that it is "ordered that this case be dismissed" does not bar a subsequent prosecution. Such words do not convey the idea of trial and acquittal. McCann's Case, 14 Gratt. 581.

The order of a court which has no jurisdiction dismissing an indictment is a mere nullity and no bar to further prosecution. Dulin v. Lillard, 91 Va. 718, 20 S. E. Rep. 821.

The conviction of assault and battery before a justice, who has no jurisdiction of felonies, is no bar to an indictment for a felony in the perpetration of which the assault and battery was committed; and this would be true though conviction was in a county court which generally has jurisdiction of both misdemeanors and felonies. The offences are essentially distinct. Murphy v. Com., 23 Gratt 960.

3. Identity of Offence.—Defendant was prosecuted for fraudulently obtaining goods by means of a false privy token. He pleaded acquittal of the felony of forging an order and uttering as true a forged order. The forged order and privy token were the same. Held, the acquittal was no bar, the offences being different. Com. v. Quann, 2 Va. Cas. 89.

A conviction for advising one slave to abscond is not a bar to a conviction for advising another to abscond though the advice was given to both at the same time. Smith v. Com., 7 Gratt. 593.

Both act and crime must be the same. On indictment for shooting J. W. a plea of autrefois acquit is not sustained by record showing acquittal of shooting S. W., though the act of shooting be the same. Vaughan v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 273.

Plea of acquittal of burning barn of Josiah Thompson cannot be pleaded in bar of an indictment for burning barn of Josias Thompson. Com. v. Mortimer, 2 Va. Cas. 325.

On indictment for burning the house of R. a plea of autrefois acquit is not sustained by record showing acquittal for burning the house of R. if the jury believe that a different house is intended in the second indictment. Page v. Com., 27 Gratt. 954.

The plea of autrefois convict to operate as a bar must show by record the identical offence with which the prisoner is charged. Com. v. Somerville. 1 Va. Cas. 164.

An indictment for stealing bank notes "the numbers and denomination of which are unknown to the jurors" does not bar a second indictment which fails to charge that the denomination of notes were unknown, the first having failed because it was proved that jury did know the numbers and denomination of the notes. Robinson v. Com., 32 Gratt. 866.

So an indictment for forging an order for $47.23 is not barred by a previous acquittal of charge of forging an order for $47.25 the latter charge having failed because of a material variance. Burress v. Com., 27 Gratt. 934.

But if the same offence is charged in substance the plea of autrefois acquit is good though the plea be informal. Day v. Com., 23 Gratt. 915.

A conviction of K. for assault and battery on H. M. may be pleaded in bar to second indictment for riotously assaulting and battering H. M. when the riot was shown in first case to enhance the damages. Com. v. Kinney, 2 Va. Cas. 139.

4. Identity of Person.—The plea of autrefois acquit must aver not only that the second prosecution is for the same offence but that defendant is the identical person who was proceeded against in the first prosecution. Justice v. Com., 81 Va. 209-218.

The plea of autrefois acquit must show the identity of accused with person formerly acquitted. State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527; State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. Rep. 792.

III. WHEN CONVICTION OF A LOWER OFFENCE BARS TRIAL FOR HIGHER.

When an indictment contains three counts and a verdict is rendered on only one this is an acquittal as to the other two, though the crime charged be a felony. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

On indictment on several counts when jury finds defendant guilty on one and not guilty as to others, when a new trial is granted defendant can only be tried as to the count on which he was found guilty at the previous trial. Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297.

An indictment contains two counts, one for forgery and another for feloniously using as true a counterfeit note. Held, a verdict finding the persons guilty of forgery, is an acquittal of the charge in the second count. Page v. Com., 9 Leigh 683; Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627.

The first count in an indictment charges malicious stabbing, the second unlawful stabbing. The verdict finds defendant guilty on second count. Held, though new trial granted because verdict was uncertain yet the second trial must be confined to the second count. Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 663.

In Livingston's Case, 14 Gratt. 592-606, the court by way of obiter dicta, considers that by the weight of authority, though there be only one count, a verdict of murder in the second degree on a charge of murder is an acquittal of murder in the first degree. In Gwatkin v. Com., 9 Leigh 678, and Ball v. Com., 8 Leigh 726, the question was not raised.

On an indictment for malicious assault the verdict of "not guilty of malicious assault as charged in the indictment but guilty of assault and battery as charged in the indictment" is an acquittal of the felony and conviction of a misdemeanor. Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899.

Defendant Stuart was indicted for malicious assault. He was convicted of unlawful assault. This verdict was set aside, and a new trial granted. Held, the second trial could only be for unlawful assault, the previous verdict being equal to an acquittal of malicious assault. By way of obiter the court says that this rule applies when there is only one count; and that when there is one count for murder and verdict of manslaughter this is an acquittal of murder. But up to time of this decision the question was still open in Virginia. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 950.

The punishment on the second trial may be longer than fixed before but the offence cannot be higher. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 968.

On indictment for arson containing two counts, one is adjudged bad. The verdict is set aside because the punishment does not correspond to the other count. Held, on new trial granted, defendant could not be indicted for offence charged in the bad count, the previous trial being an acquittal as to that. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 110.

In W. Va. there is a dictum to the effect that, in the absence of statute, a conviction of murder in the second degree would, when the verdict was set aside, be a bar to conviction of murder in the first degree. State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527.

House breaking and larceny may be charged in one count as they may constitute a continued act; and where defendant is judged guilty on such count and the verdict is set aside, he may be convicted of either offence provided the maximum penalty for that offence is no greater than that provided for the offence of which he was formerly convicted. Benton v. Com., 91 Va. 782, 21 S. E. Rep. 495.

§ 25, ch. 17 of Acts 1877-78, declaring that "if a verdict be set aside on the motion of the accused, and a new trial awarded, on such new trial the accused shall be tried, and such verdict may be found and sentence pronounced as if the former verdict had not been found" is valid and constitutional.

Under this statute it was decided that though tried for murder and convicted of murder in the second degree, when such verdict was set aside the prisoner could be tried and convicted of murder in the first degree. Briggs v. Com., 82 Va. 554. This changes the rule laid down in Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 950.

The maximum punishment determines the grade of the offence, and so a conviction for unlawful shooting which is punishable as a felony or misdemeanor in the discretion of the jury, is no bar, when the verdict is set aside, to trial for a felony. Va. Code (1887), § 4040 has no application to such case. Forbes v. Com., 90 Va. 550, 19 S. E. Rep. 164.

IV. VARIANCES MATERIAL AND IMMATERIAL.

Nolle Pros No Bar.

A nolle pros, entered by commonwealth's attorney in a justice's court on examining trial, is not a bar to further prosecution for felony. Lindsay v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 345.

The dismissal of a presentment is equivalent to an informal nolle pros and is not a bar to subsequent prosecution for misdemeanor. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

Indictment—Essential Omitted.

An indictment for felony which omits to charge the act was done feloniously is fatally defective and is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 644.

Indictment Mutilated.

The defendant was indicted for malicious assault and convicted of unlawful assault. A new trial was granted. The indictment was quashed on motion of attorney for the commonwealth because of mutilation. Held, the first trial did not bar a second indictment but no conviction could be had of any offence greater than unlawful assault. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 950.

Verdict—Essential Omitted.

A verdict, set aside for lack of an ingredient essential to constitute the offence charged, is no bar to a subsequent indictment for the same offence. Com. v. Percavil, 4 Leigh 686.

Verdict Improperly Signed.

Where the verdict is set aside because improperly signed by one who does not appear to be a juror, the judgment will be set aside, but this does not bar a new trial for the same offence. Younger v. State, 2 W. Va. 579.

A judgment, reversed because the verdict was incorrectly signed, is no bar to subsequent prosecution for the same offence. A judgment reversed because one of the jurors was not indifferent, is no bar to new trial. Armistead v. Com., 11 Leigh 657; Washington v. Com., 86 Va. 405, 10 S. E. Rep. 419; Dejarnette v. Com., 75 Va. 867.

Verdict a Nullity for Lack of Assent.

Discharge of jury by the court, without knowing that one of the jury did not assent to the verdict which error rendered the verdict a nullity is no bar to a prosecution on a new indictment. Gibson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 111-120.

Verdict Uncertain.

On indictment for felony the verdict was too uncertain and was accordingly set aside. The clerk, however, entered up judgment in the usual form. Held, such judgment based on such uncertain verdict and ordered set aside by the court was no bar to a subsequent indictment. Com. v. Hatton, 3 Gratt. 623.

On an indictment for malicious and unlawful stabbing, the accused was judged guilty of unlawful stabbing. The verdict was set aside for uncertainty.

Held, such verdict was no bar to new trial on same or new indictment for unlawful stabbing. Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 663.

On indictment for malicious assault with intent to maim, etc., a verdict that defendant is guilty of malicious assault is defective, and judgment on such verdict should be reversed. But this is no bar to a new trial for the same offence. Jones v. Com., 87 Va. 63, 12 S. E. Rep. 226.

Evidence Erroneously Admitted.

If a judgment is reversed because of evidence erroneously admitted the case will be remanded for a new trial, such former trial being no bar. Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510.

Unauthorized Punishment.

Conviction and sentence for a less term than the minimum fixed by law is no bar to a subsequent conviction. Jones v. Com., 20 Gratt. 848; Nemo v. Com., 2 Gratt. 558; Com. v. Smith, 2 Va. Cas. 327.

A sentence to punishment not authorized by the statute is a ground for reversal, but such trial and sentence is no bar to new trial. Ex parte Marx, 88 Va. 40-47, 9 S. E. Rep. 475.

On indictment for arson, when one count is fatally defective a verdict rendered on the other count must fix punishment according to such count. Failure to so correspond is error for which judgment will be reversed. On reversal a new trial may be had, the former trial being no bar to subsequent conviction on the good count. Richards v. Com., 11 Va. 110.

Misdirection as to Punishment.

Where the jury is misdirected as to the minimum punishment, the judgment should be set aside and a new trial awarded. Nor can the commonwealth's attorney remit the punishment and so correct the error. Allen v. Com., 2 Leigh 727.

No Punishment Fixed.

A verdict, set aside because it fixes no punishment, is not a bar to a subsequent indictment. Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh 751.

Variance between Allegata and Probata.

An acquittal on account of a variance between allegations in the indictment and proof at the trial is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offence. Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

A verdict, set aside because of insufficiency of evidence to sustain it, is no bar to an indictment for the same offence. Ball v. Com., 8 Leigh 726.

On an indictment for murder when there is no evidence to sustain the charge, judgment will be reversed. But this does not bar a new trial for the same offence. Grayson v. Com., 6 Gratt. 712.

When Variance Immaterial.

Consent cannot confer jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but may confer jurisdiction of the person, and may operate as a waiver of irregularities in the warrant of arrest; and when the trial is on the merits, the mere omission of the word "feloniously" in a warrant for larceny will not prevent an acquittal from being a complete bar to further prosecution, provided no objection was taken to such omission. Jones v. Morris, 97 Va. 43.

V. DISCHARGE OF JURY.

Discharge of Jury—When No Bar.

In case of misdemeanor the court may discharge the jury against the consent of defendant, and such discharge is no bar to subsequent prosecution for same misdemeanor. Dye v. Com., 7 Gratt. 662.

Even in case of felony the court may discharge the jury for good cause and try prisoner again for same offence before new jury. Com. v. Fells, 9 Leigh 618.

In case of necessity the judge may discharge the jury, and try the prisoner again before new jury, though the offence be a felony. But in case of felony, mere inability of the jury to agree presents no such case of necessity, and a discharge of the jury for that cause alone will bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. Logan v. Com., 2 Gratt. 571. Changed by Va. Code 1887, § 4026.

Under § 12, ch. 202, Va. Code 1873, in any criminal case the court may discharge the jury when it appears they cannot agree in a verdict, or that there is manifest necessity for such discharge, and such discharge is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. But if such discharge is objected to, and exception taken, the action of the court may be reviewed in the appellate court. Wright v. Com., 75 Va. 914. This section is re-enacted in Va. Code 1887, § 4026, and was applied in case of Jones v. Com., 85 Va. 740, 10 S. E. Rep. 1004.

VI. CONDITIONAL PARDON.

Conditional Pardon.

A conditional or commutative pardon, save in the case of capital punishment, is void and therefore no bar to executing the sentence of the court. Lee v. Murphy, 22 Gratt. 789.

VII. ERRORS CAUSED BY FAULT OF THE ACCUSED.

A judgment obtained by the fraud of defendant is no bar to a subsequent conviction; and a replication showing such fraud is a good answer to a plea of autrefois acquit and should be so adjudged on demurrer. Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501.

Acquittal of defendant's associate, when defendant is himself a fugitive from justice, is no bar to conviction of defendant. Williams v. Com., 85 Va. 607, 8 S. E. Rep. 470.

A judgment, reversed because defendant did not appear in person but by attorney, is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 786.

A discharge by operation of the statute of limitation is a bar to further prosecution for the same offence. Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

See Va. Code 1887, §§ 8898-8894, 4026-4040, as to autrefois acquit in general.

952 *Wren v. Commonwealth.

March Term, 1875, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—Accessories after the Fact.—An accessory after the fact to a felony, is a person who knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon.

2. Same—Same—Requisites.—To constitute an accessory after the fact, three things are requisite: 1. The felony must be completed. 2. He must know that the felon is guilty. 3. He must receive, relieve, comfort or assist him.

3. Same—Same—Notice of Principal's Crime.—It is necessary that the accessory have notice, express or implied, at the time he assists or comforts the felon, that he had committed a felony. And the mere fact that one receives a felon in the same county in which he has been attainted is not sufficient to raise the presumption of knowledge. And the question of knowledge is a question for the jury.

4. Same—Same—Same—What Constitutes.—Any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his apprehension, trial or punishment, is sufficient to make a man accessory after the fact; as that he concealed him in the house, or shut the door against his pursuers until he should have an opportunity to escape; or took money from him to allow him to escape, or supplied him with money, a horse, or other necessities, in order to enable him to escape; or that the principal was in prison, and the jailer was bribed to let him escape, or conveyed to him instruments to enable him to break prison and escape.

5. Same—Same—Same—Compounding a Felony.—Merely suffering the principal to escape will not make the party accessory after the fact; for it amounts at most to a mere omission. Or if he agree for money not to prosecute the felon; or if knowing of a felony, fails to make it known to the proper authorities; none of these acts are sufficient to make the party an accessory after the fact. If the thing done amounts to no more than the compounding a felony or the misprision of it, the doer of it will not be an accessory.

6. Same—Same—Same—True Test.*—The true test whether one is accessory after the fact, is to consider whether *what he did was done by way of personal help to his principal, with the view of enabling his principal to elude punishment; the kind of help rendered appearing unimportant.

This is a sequel to the case of Wren v. Commonwealth, reported in 25 Grattan 989. On the second trial, after all the evidence had been introduced, the attorney for the commonwealth asked the court to give to the jury three instructions, which the court gave; and the prisoner excepted. But as they were not considered by this court, it is not necessary to state them.

The jury found the prisoner guilty and assessed his fine at two hundred dollars; and the prisoner moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial. But the court overruled the motion and sentenced him to ten months' imprisonment in the city jail, and to pay the fine assessed by the jury. The prisoner excepted to the opinion of the court overruling his motion for a new trial; and the evidence being conflicting, the court spread all of it on the record. It is sufficiently stated in the opinion of Judge Christian. Upon the application of the prisoner, a writ of error was allowed.

Crump, for the prisoner.

The Attorney-General, for the commonwealth.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Hustings court of the city of Richmond. The case is before this court for the second time.

The accused was indicted in the said Hustings court, as accessory after the fact to a felony, of which one John Dull was convicted in said court. The indictment after setting out, in proper form, the felony committed *by the said John Dull, charged "that John Wren" (the plaintiff in error), "well knowing the said John Dull to have committed the said felony in form aforesaid; to-wit, since the said felony was committed in the year aforesaid, in the city aforesaid, him the said John Dull did then and there unlawfully receive, harbor and maintain, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia."

Under this indictment the accused was found guilty at the November term of the said Hustings court; and his fine assessed by the jury at one cent; and was sentenced by the court to twelve months' imprisonment in the city jail; and to labor upon the public streets, or other public works, for seven hours a day during said term of imprisonment. To that judgment a writ of error was awarded by this court; and upon the hearing of said writ of error at the last term, the judgment was reversed, and the accused was remanded to the said Hustings court for a new trial.

It is proper to remark, that the judgment and opinion of this court upon the former hearing was confined to a single point; and that was that the instructions given by the court were calculated to mislead the jury, and were therefore erroneous. The opinion was confined to the single point, and the judgment was reversed upon that ground only.

At the February term of the said Hustings court, the accused was again tried upon the same indictment; was again found guilty, and his fine assessed by the jury at $200; and was sentenced by the court to imprisonment for the period of ten months and until payment of said fine.

To this judgment a writ of error was awarded by this court.

The counsel for the prisoner, in his 955 petition for a writ of error, assigns two grounds of error: 1st. The granting, by the court, of the instructions asked for by the commonwealth's attorney: and 2d. The overruling of his motion for a new trial.

The second assignment of errors will be disposed of first.

The court below refused to certify the facts proved because the evidence was conflicting; but certified all the evidence offered, both by the Commonwealth and the accused. According to the rules established by this court, in considering such a bill of exceptions, the court will reject all the evidence offered by the prisoner in conflict with that offered by the Commonwealth, and determine, upon the testimony of the Commonwealth alone and all fair and legal inferences to be drawn therefrom, whether the offence charged in the indictment is made out and established by the proof: in other words, whether admitting all the facts proved by the Commonwealth, without reference to those proved by the accused, these facts constitute the offence charged in the indictment.

The accused is charged with accessorial guilt. He is charged in the indictment with unlawfully receiving, harboring and maintaining John Dull, knowing him to have committed a felony. This charge constitutes what the law denominates "an accessory after the fact." The common law definitely and distinctly defines who is such an offender. He is a person who knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon. 1 Hale P. C. 618; 1 Arch. Crim. Pract. 78, and cases there cited.

The reason on which the common law makes a party in such a case criminal, 956 is that the course of public justice is hindered, and justice itself is evaded by facilitating the escape of the felon.

To constitute one an accessory after the fact, three things are requisite: 1. The felony must be completed; 2. He must know that the felon is guilty; 3. He must receive, relieve, comfort or assist him. It is necessary that the accessory have notice, direct or implied, at the time he assists or comforts the felon, that he has committed a felony. 2 Hawk. ch. 29, § 32. And although it seemed at one time to be doubted, whether an implied notice of the felony will not in some cases suffice, as where a man receive a felon in the same county in which he has been attainted, which is supposed to have been a matter of notoriety, it seems to be the better opinion, that some more particular evidence is requisite to raise the presumption of knowledge. 1 Hale 323, 622; 3 P. Wms. R. 496; 4 Black. Com. 37.

But knowledge of the commission of the felony must be brought home to the accused, and whether he had such knowledge is always a question for the jury.

As to the receiving, relieving and assisting, one known to be a felon, it may be said in general terms, that any assistance given to one known to be a felon in order to hinder his apprehension, trial or punishment, is sufficient to make a man accessory after the fact; as that he concealed him in the house, or shut the door against his pursuers, until he should have an opportunity to escape; or took money from him to allow him to escape; or supplied him with money, a horse or other necessities, in order to enable him to escape; or that the principal was in prison, and the jailer was bribed to let him escape; or conveyed instruments to him to enable him to break prison and escape. This and 957 such like assistance to one known to be a felon, would constitute a man accessory after the fact. 1 Hale 619, 621; 2 Hawk. c. 29, § 26. But merely suffering the principal to escape, will not make the party accessory after the fact; for it amounts at most but to a mere omission. 1 Hale 619; 9 H. iv., 1. Or if he agree for money not to prosecute the felon; or if knowing of a felony, fails to make it known to the proper authorities; none of these acts would be sufficient to make the party an accessory after the fact. If the thing done amounts to no more than the compounding a felony, or the misprision of it, the doer will not be an accessory. 1 Bishop, § 633; 1 Hale 371, 618. "The true test (says Bishop, § 634) whether one is accessory after the fact, is to consider whether what he did was done by way of personal help to his principal, with the view of enabling his principal to elude punishment; the kind of help rendered appearing to be unimportant.

In Regina v. Chapple & others, 9 Car. & Payne R. 355, it was held that "to substantiate the charge of harboring a felon, it must be shown that the party charged did some act to assist the felon personally." This decision is in strict accordance with the established principles of the common law. See Arch. Crim. Plead. and Pract. 78-9, note.

Now applying these well recognized principles to the case before us, we are of opinion that the Commonwealth has failed to show that the plaintiff in error is an accessory after the fact to the felony committed by John Dull. Upon the Commonwealth's evidence, giving to it full force and effect, with all the fair and legal inferences to be drawn from it, and discarding the evidence offered by the accused, the case made out does not contain the constituent elements required to make the accused an accessory after the fact.

958 *The evidence shows that the accused is a detective officer, belonging to the police force of the city of Richmond. One Jos. M. Fowlkes, a gentleman from the country, who seems to have been an easy victim of certain swindlers and sharpers, was inveigled into the house of one John Dull, and induced by an accomplice of Dull to try his chances in the drawing of a bogus lottery. The whole thing was a cheat and swindle; and Mr. Fowlkes, after being induced to believe that he was drawing large sums of money, soon found himself the loser of five hundred and seventy dollars. When he left Dull's house he went to see a friend (his commission merchant), who called a policeman near by, and he returned with the policeman to the scene of the swindle, but found the house closed and the inmates gone. The policeman introduced him to Wren (the plaintiff in error), whom they met on the street, as a detective, and Fowlkes told him that he had been robbed of five hundred and seventy dollars, and said he wanted him to try to get his money back. Wren took Fowlkes in a carriage and carried him to the house of Knox, whom he called the chief detective of the city, and who it seems was a partner of Wren in the detective business. After some consultation with Knox, whom they found at dinner, it was agreed that they would meet at the St. Charles hotel that evening. Fowlkes says he did not ask Wren to arrest the parties, but told him he wanted to get his money back; that his object in employing Wren was to get his money. Wren and Fowlkes, after seeing Knox, separated to meet at the St. Charles hotel. In the meantime, after parting with Wren, Mr. Fowlkes met with an old friend, a lawyer, Mr. Sam'l. Page, and consulted with him, giving him an account of what had happened at Dull's house. When near the St. Charles of a justice of the peace for the purpose of getting a warrant of arrest, Wren approached them, and said he had "brought the old man down" (meaning Dull), and Page, Fowlkes and Wren went together into the St. Charles hotel, where they found Dull. Fowlkes demanded his money of Dull, saying he had been robbed of it at his house. This Dull denied, saying Fowlkes had lost it at gambling, while Fowlkes declared it had been stolen from him. Dull then said he had nothing to do with it; that he was not in the room when the money was lost, and told Fowlkes with an oath to go after those who had won the money. Wren was present and heard what passed, but was not asked to arrest Dull. Fowlkes asked Page to have him arrested; but Page said no, the time had not come yet.

Page's testimony as to the interview between himself, Fowlkes, Dull and Wren, is the same as that above detailed by Fowlkes. He says that Wren was not requested to arrest Dull; that he (Page) had no doubt Wren would have arrested Dull if he had been requested, and that he (Page) did not want Dull arrested then, because his arrest would have frustrated his plan in getting all the money he could out of Dull for his friend Fowlkes. The next time Wren appears on the scene is on the next day, when he informed Mr. George D. Wise, a practising attorney, that Knox wanted to see him at the Dispatch corner on Main street, and went with him to the corner, where they parted, and Knox took him (Wise) to the American hotel, where he was shown into a room occupied by Dull, Lewis and Purdy; and that Purdy gave him a sum of money to be paid over to Mr. Fowlkes. The parties then met at the Circuit court room, Page being present as the counsel of Fowlkes, and Wise 960 as the *counsel of Dull. A certain sum of money was paid to Fowlkes, and the following receipt signed by him:

Richmond Va. Octo. 8th 1874. "Rec'd of John C. Dull two hundred and eighty-five dollars, in full settlement of all demands and claims against the house of Mr. Dull; hereby binding myself to make no more demands upon him, his house or any one else for any occurrence there: this is to be a settlement in full.

Signed Jos. M. Fowlkes."

Wren was present at this interview, but took no part in it, sitting some distance off in the judge's chair, but near enough to hear all that occurred. After the money was paid over Wren requested Page to see Fowlkes, and get him to pay him for his services. This Fowlkes refused to do.

Shortly after the money was paid Dull was arrested; Page having in his pocket, both the evening before at St. Charles Hotel and at the interview at the Circuit court room, a warrant for the arrest of Dull. But Wren was never requested either by Page or Fowlkes to serve the writ. After the arrest of Dull, Page met with Wren, who said to him with an oath, "Don't you think that old fool has gone and had Dull arrested. If Dull is to be shown up then all shall be shown up."

The only other testimony connecting Wren with Dull, is that of Captain Disney, a police officer; who testified as follows: "That soon after Dull's arrest Wren came to the station house, and was carrying Dull into witness' private office, when witness stopped him; and Wren said he wanted a private interview with him; but witness refused to allow such interview; that immediately afterwards when witness 961 was *searching another prisoner, he saw Dull attempting to slip something in Wren's hand; which he also stopped; thought it was money but could not say. Wren said to Dull, when Disney was afterwards searching him, anything you give Captain Disney will be safe. When witness refused the private interview with Dull, Wren said "never mind the Chief will be up here presently; and said with an oath, he would have Dull bailed out if it cost ten thousand dollars."

This is all the testimony connecting Wren in any way with Dull; and we are constrained to say, that whatever evidence there may be, tending to show that he was guilty of either compounding a felony, or of misprision of felony, there is no evidence sufficient in law to show that he gave any assistance to Dull, or any personal aid of any kind, to hinder his apprehension, trial or punishment. On the contrary he brought Dull into the presence of his prosecutor and his counsel; and though informed by Page that he intended to get a warrant for Dull's arrest, he did not inform Dull of it. He advised Page, it is true, not to take out a warrant at once; and Page concurred with him in that view, thinking it would frustrate his design in getting the money back. His object, as was that of Page, was to get the money of which Fowlkes had been swindled. But there is no evidence to show that his design was to enable Dull to elude or escape punishment. His failure to make the arrest himself, nor his effort, or expressed purpose to get him bailed after his arrest, nor his threat that as Dull is to be shown up others should be shown up also, none of these acts constitute Wren an accessory after the fact to the felony committed by Dull. If, knowing that a felony had been committed, he concealed it, then he is guilty of misprision of felony. If, knowing a felony 962. only to be committed *he concealed it, or forebore to arrest and prosecute the felon, for fee or reward, then he is guilty of compounding a felony. Both of these are grave offences; but they do not (if proved) constitute a party an accessory after the fact. This view of the case makes it unnecessary to pass upon the 1st assignment of error:

The court is therefore of opinion, that the Hustings court erred in not setting aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the case be remanded to the said Hustings court for a new trial to be had therein in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

Judgment reversed.

*Swisher v. The Commonwealth.

[21 Am. Rep. 330.]

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

1. Evidence—Dying Declarations.*—J receives wounds in a fight with S on the 8th of January, and on that night he expects to die very soon, and makes certain statements in relation to the fight. He lives until the 18th, encouraged to entertain some hope of recovery by his physician, and probably having some hope. On the trial of S for the murder of J, the statements of J on the 8th of January are competent evidence as his dying declarations.

At the May term 1875 of the Circuit court of Rockbridge county, Daniel T. Swisher was indicted for the murder of James Jarvia, by cutting him with a knife. The prisoner was tried at the same term of the court. On the trial evidence was introduced by the commonwealth, tending to prove that after an altercation on the 8th of January, 1875 between the deceased and the prisoner, a fight took place between them on the same day about 7 p. m.; and at its termination, the deceased was found to be cut or stabbed in two places in his body; of which wounds he afterwards died on the 18th of the same month. And then the Commonwealth proposed to prove certain statements made by the deceased during the night of the 8th of January; to which the prisoner by his counsel objected, until a proper foundation for their introduction was laid. And thereupon a number of witnesses were examined by the judge in the absence of the jury. This testimony is set out in the opinion of Judge Christian.

*The court was of opinion that the testimony was sufficient to authorize the admission of the evidence, as the dying declarations of the deceased; and the same was submitted to the jury; and the prisoner excepted.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at three years; and he was sentenced by the court in accordance with *Evidence—Dying Declarations.—"The principle upon which, in cases of homicide, the dying declarations of the deceased are admitted in evidence, is that they are declarations made in extremity, under a sense of impending death, and, therefore, when every motive to falsehood is silenced. It is not necessary, however, that they should be stated, at the time, to be so made. It is enough if it appears that they were made under that sanction; and, when this is shown, the length of time between the declarations and the death of the declarant is an immaterial matter." Hall v. Com., 30 Va. 177, citing principal case; Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 613; Vass v. Com., 3 Leigh 786. The principal case is cited with approval by CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER in Mattox v. U. S., 146 U. S. 145, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54, also by the same eminent jurist in Carver v. U. S., 160 U. S. 554, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 388. See further, King v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 18; Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. 594; Purveyer v. Com., 23 Va. 51; Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. 656. The principal case is reported in 21 Am. Dec. 330. In West Virginia, see State v. Burnett, 47 W. Va. —, 35 S. E. Rep. 983; State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679.

the verdict. The prisoner thereupon applied to a judge of this court for a writ of error; which was awarded.

J. R. Tucker, W. A. Anderson and T. N. Williams, for the prisoner.

The Attorney-General for the commonwealth.

Christian, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of Rockbridge.

The prisoner in his petition, and his counsel at the bar here, assign but one ground of error, and that is, that the Circuit court erred in overruling the objection of the prisoner to the introduction of the dying declarations of the deceased.

The alleged ground of the objection is, that no sufficient foundation for their introduction had been laid.

The rule of law on this subject is well settled, that to render dying declarations admissible evidence, they must be shown to have been made when the declarant is under a sense of impending death, and without any expectation or hope of recovery. When this is made to appear by proof, or by the circumstances of the case, dying declarations to identify the prisoner, or to establish the circumstances of the res gestæ, or to show transactions from which death results, are always admissible, 965 *to have the same weight as if made under the sanctions of an oath. For it is considered that when an individual is in expectation of impending death, all temptation to falsehood, either of interest, hope or fear, will be removed, and the awful nature of his situation will be presumed to impress him as strongly with the necessity of a strict adherence to truth as the most solemn obligation of an oath administered in a court of justice. As was said in Dunn v. The State, 2 Pike's R. 229, cited in 1 Wharton 671: "When every hope of this world is gone; when every motive to falsehood is silenced, and the mind is induced by the most powerful consideration to speak the truth—a situation so solemn and awful, is considered by the law as creating the most impressive of sanctions." Whether the dying declarations sought to be introduced were made under a sense of impending death, without any expectation or hope of recovery, is always a question to be determined by the court on all the circumstances of the case. 1 East P. C. 357; 1 Stark. Ev. 523; Bull's case, 14 Gratt. 613.

Let us now apply these well established rules of law to the case at bar. In a fight between the prisoner and the deceased, which occurred about seven o'clock P. M. on the 8th of January 1875, the deceased was stabbed in two places in the body, of which wounds he died on the night of the 18th January 1875.

The declarations of the deceased, offered as evidence, were made on the night of the 8th, about two hours after he received his wounds: and the question was, whether at that time he had a consciousness of impending death, and then had no hope of recovery. It becomes necessary therefore to examine the testimony of the witnesses who saw him on the night of the 8th, before and at 966 the time the declarations offered *in evidence were made. George Smith, who seemed to have been present just as the fight closed, proved that deceased seemed badly hurt; said he was cut to pieces; called out to his brother to kill the prisoner if he could; that he then walked from the place where he was wounded to the shop of the witness, which was 112 feet, and thence 55 feet further, into the house of witness, who sent for two physicians. Deceased said he could not live until the doctors came unless there was haste made. Said again he could not live, believed he would die before the doctor came; lost a good deal of blood; his pulse was weak.

Another witness, father of the deceased, proved he saw deceased about 25 minutes after he was wounded; was then at Smith's house. Deceased said he was badly cut. Witness told him he was excited. He replied he was not excited, and that if any of the family wished to see him they must be got there as soon as possible. He said he would not get over it. This was before the doctors came: frequently said during the same night he could not get over it.

Another witness proved that she saw deceased at Smith's house about 15 minutes after he was wounded. He looked as if he would die; she feared he would from his appearance. He repeated several times he would die: said, "I think I am going to die;" and afterwards, "I will die: I will never recover." All this was about an hour before Dr. Alexander came. When his father spoke of sending for Dr. Morrison, deceased said he would die. When he said he was going to die, witness told him not to think so; that if it was ordered he should die, the doctors would so tell him; that he must not be unnecessarily frightened. He made no reply then; but afterwards witness 967 heard him say he would die. Witness thought that deceased *thought he would die; and it was not a mere exclamation of pain, but the expression of an opinion.

Dr. Alexander proved that he reached the deceased about 10 o'clock on the night of the 8th January 1875; dressed his wounds; found him excited; that he was wounded in two places, one between the 6th and 7th rib on the left side, and the other in the abdomen; found him pale, but not from loss of blood: said nothing to deceased of his condition, and heard him say nothing; gave him morphine, and he went to sleep sitting in a chair. While attending on deceased, witness was sent for to see prisoner, who was cut in his hand, and on returning to deceased found Dr. Morrison with him.

Dr. Morrison proved, that he reached deceased about 11 o'clock of the night of the 8th January. He had lost some blood; was under prostration due to shock from his wounds. * * * * When witness first saw deceased he was pale, had clammy sweat and was much prostrated; but reaction had already begun to set in. He thought when witness first saw him, he was going to die. Witness told him he might get well or might die. Witness (who was a surgeon in the Confederate army), told deceased he had seen many men no worse hurt than he was get well. Deceased was obviously encouraged by this, as witness thought. Afterwards, later in the night, about 1 o'clock, witness was called from another room whither he had gone, to see deceased, where some attendants had undertaken to lay him down on a pallet. The effect was to pass the discharge from his wound into his lungs, suffocating him, and making respiration very distressing. Witness replaced him in his chair, where he was more comfortable; found him no worse, and he revived again, talked, and witness thought he was

968 better. He said *however, he would die, and his wounds reasonably justified that opinion. Witness then left him for the night, being satisfied he was not then in immediate danger. The next morning he was much revived; no doubt he felt better, and obviously was satisfied he was better. For five or six days witness had good hope deceased would recover; would say to him when he visited him—"Jim, I hope you will get well;" and he would answer—"I hope so too." He said the morning after he was wounded, he felt better, and repeated the same thing on my several visits. Witness did not remember that deceased ever said in so many words, he thought he would recover; but he was certainly hopeful in opinion of witness. Witness was much encouraged about him, when about four days after he was wounded his bowels were favorably operated on. When on witness's first visit, deceased said "he thought he was going to die," witness encouraged him, felt his pulse, told him he was not dying, and he certainly was not then in a dying condition, and that as badly hurt men as he, witness had seen get well. On the night of the affray deceased frequently said he would die, and that this was not an exclamation of pain, but the expression of an opinion.

Witness thought that during the whole of the first night, up to the time he last saw him that night, that deceased was of opinion then that death was impending, and that declarations made by deceased that night were made in view of an impending death.

Witness never heard him say he would get well, but would say he was better and felt better and no doubt had hope. He never said in presence of witness, after first night, he thought he was going to die. Witness had hope up to within two days of deceased's death; up to that time witness thought deceased was hopeful.

969 *Witness told some of the family of deceased, that witness thought he was going to die. Perhaps his mother told him after that, she thought he would die, and to make preparations. Witness thought he had no hope after that.

Another witness, the brother of the deceased, proved, that he went for Dr. Morrison, and went in with Dr. M. to see deceased. That then deceased said he would not get well; never heard him say otherwise. The evening before his death deceased reached out his hand and said to witness "my time is short, call all in to see me." A minister of the gospel then prayed in the house.

This was all the material evidence certified by the Circuit court, as the foundation upon which the dying declarations were admitted.

It is urged on behalf of the prisoner, that a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of the dying declarations, because the evidence failed to show that the deceased was under a sense of impending death without hope of recovery; but that on the contrary, it was shown that he had hope of recovery; and that therefore the evidence of his dying declarations were not admissible. To sustain this view, the evidence of Dr. Morrison is relied on; for the four other witnesses examined on this point, all agree that they heard the deceased give no indication that he had any hope of recovery. But the testimony of Dr. Morrison, which has reference to the night on which the declarations of the deceased were made, is not, when properly understood, at all in conflict with that of the other witnesses. The testimony of Dr. M., as to the expressions which fell from the prisoner, that "he felt better," that "he hoped he would get well," and that in the opinion of the doctor 970 he was hopeful and encouraged,*manifestly refer to occasions when he saw him after the night of the 8th January; for the doctor emphatically says, that on that night "he said that he would die, and that his wounds reasonably justified that opinion."

Again he says, after referring to the fact that he sometimes seemed encouraged and said he felt better, and in reply to the remark of the doctor, "Jim, I hope you are better," said "I hope so too," adds, "On the night of the affray deceased frequently said he would die; and this was not merely an exclamation of pain, but the expression of an opinion. Witness thought that during the whole of the first night, up to the time he last saw him that night, deceased was of opinion that death was impending; and that declarations made by deceased on that night were made in view of impending death."

Now it is evident, that the casual expressions of hopefulness made by the deceased, were not made on the night of the 8th of January, but at various times afterwards, when encouraged by his physician that he was better, and when he may have in fact felt better. It is thus clear, that on the night of the 8th of January when the declarations offered were made, the deceased was fully impressed with the conviction that he must die of his wounds, and had not the remotest hope of recovery. The fact that he did not die immediately, or during that night, but lingered for ten days, and during that time gave expression to gleams of hope when encouraged by his physician, does not alter the case. The question is, always, did the deceased, at the time the declarations were made, have the consciousness that death was impending, and had no expectation or hope of recovery? If the declarations were made under the sense of impending dissolution, and a 971 consciousness *of the awful occasion, the principle is not affected by the fact that death did not ensue until a considerable time after the declarations were made—1 Whar. 671; 2 Russ. Crim. 757;—nor by the fact that on other days, when encouraged by others, he may have expressed some slight hope of recovery, unless such expressions, taken together with all the circumstances of the case, shew that he had hope of recovery when the declarations offered were made.

The fact of the declarations not being made immediately previous to death, will not exclude them, provided the deceased was conscious at the time he made them, that he was in a dying condition. 1 Greenl. Ev. 158; McDaniel v. State, 1 Smeedes & Mar. 401; State v. Poll, 1 Hawks R. 442; Commonwealth v. Cooper, 5 Allen's R. 495; Rex v. Mosley & Morrill, Moody's C. C. R. 97; referred to in 3 Rob. Pract. old ed. 208.

The last named case is strikingly analogous to the one under consideration. In that case the injury that caused the death of the deceased, was inflicted on the evening of the 30th September; in consequence of which he was brought home and put to bed, and a surgeon was sent for on that evening to attend him. The declarations in question were made the same evening. The surgeon continued to attend him until his death; which took place on the 10th October. In his evidence the surgeon stated that previously to the 10th of October, he did not regard the case of the deceased hopeless, nor did he so represent to him; that he told him there was danger, but held out to him hopes of recovery; though he did not know whether deceased entertained hopes or not, as he never expressed to the surgeon any opinion either of hope or apprehension; but that when he saw de-972 ceased on the 10th of October *he felt certain he would die that forenoon, and communicated to him the hopelessness of his state.

In consequence of this evidence of the surgeon it became material to enquire further, as to the prior hopeless state of the deceased, and his consciousness of it, from the commencement of, or during his illness, in order to ascertain, whether the declarations aforesaid were admissible in evidence or not. To this point a witness stated, "that she was sent for to the deceased, on the evening of the 30th September; that he was in a very ill state indeed; that he said he was robbed and killed; that he should never get better of it; that she assisted in putting him to bed, and continued to attend him till his death; that during that time he spoke of dying, and said he could not continue long—a few days would finish him; that he all along said he never would get better; that he never missed saying so one day before the latter end." Witness also stated, that she was a nurse accustomed to attend such people, and very often found them low spirited, and have known many persons say they should never get better, who have got better; that deceased talked in that way; that about Tuesday before his death, he said he should not continue many days; that it was before that he told her all about it; that the first night he said he should not get better and continued to say so till the last day.

On this evidence it was objected for the prisoners, that a sufficient foundation was not laid for receiving evidence of the declarations of deceased made on Thursday evening the 30th of September. But Holroyd J. who tried the case, admitted the declarations; and upon that and other proof the prisoners were convicted of murder. Upon a case reserved, the court consisting of ten judges, was unanimously of opinion, 973 *that the declarations were properly received. These two cases are singularly alike. In both cases the deceased lingered ten days after the fatal wounds were received. In both cases the surgeon attending did not think the wounds necessarily mortal; and encouraged the deceased that the case was not hopeless. In both cases the declarations offered were made on the night when the injury producing death was inflicted. In both cases, it is shown that the deceased on that night said he would never get over it,—that he must die, and similar expressions,—which were also used at various times during the lingering suffering of both for ten days.

In the case before us three witnesses, being those most constantly in attendance, prove that from the first night to the last (as was proved by one witness in the case cited), the deceased always said he must die.

The only difference is, that in the case before us, on one occasion several days after the declarations were made, in reply to the remark of the physician, "Jim, I hope you will get well," deceased replied, "I hope so too." This remark was the only one made, during the whole ten days, indicating that at any time there was on the mind of the deceased the slightest hope of his recovery; but this remark when taken in connection with the other evidence in the case and the circumstances under which it was made, does not show, or tend to show, that on the night of the 8th of January, when the declarations were made, the deceased had the slightest hope of recovery; especially when the intelligent physician who testified to this remark, says emphatically, that during the whole night of the 8th of January, up to the time he saw him last that night, 974 deceased was of opinion that *death was impending, and that declarations made by deceased on that night were made in view of impending death."

Certainly we cannot say, upon such evidence as this, that the opinion of the Circuit court in declaring, that a proper foundation had been laid for the introduction of dying declarations, was erroneous. Much weight ought always to be given to the opinion of the court below in determining this question. The duty by law is devolved on him to determine, not only from the proofs, but from all the circumstances of the case, whether the declarations are admissible. Bull's case, 14 Gratt. 613; Vass's case, 3 Leigh 786. That court has all the witnesses in its presence, hears them speak, can judge of their credibility, is cognizant of all the circumstances of the case, and to its judgment the law refers the determination of the question whether the declarations were admissible.

If that judgment is clearly erroneous, it may be reviewed like any other judgment. But in such a case, the same weight ought to be given to the judgment of the court below, as the appellate court gives to a judgment of the court of trial, when the motion for a new trial is overruled and the evidence certified. The judgment must be clearly erroneous before it will be interfered with by the appellate court.

In this case we have the evidence of four witnesses, among them the physician in attendance, all concurring, that on the night of the 8th January 1875, when the declarations were made, the deceased had no hope of recovery; and the physician in so many words declaring that the declarations made that night, "were made by the deceased under a sense of impending death." All this evidence comes before us with the sanction of the judge who heard the 975 witnesses speak, "who knew their character and credibility, and was cognizant of all the circumstances of the case.

Can we say that because, days afterwards, not on the night when the declarations were made, the deceased expressed some vague hope that he was better, that, for that reason, all the witnesses and the judge who heard them were mistaken in their conclusion, that the deceased was without hope of recovery when the declarations were made?

This would, it seems to me, be going farther than this court or any other, has ever gone, in declaring such a judgment erroneous. Upon the whole case, I am of opinion, that there is no error in said judgment; that it is fully sustained by the evidence, and the legal principles which govern the case; and the same should be affirmed.

Moncure P. and Staples J. concurred in the opinion of Christian J.

976 *Mesmer v. Commonwealth.

September Term, 1875, Staunton.

I. Orders of Judge in Vacation — Summoning Grand Jurors.—On the 18th of September 1874, S, judge of the Corporation court of W, issued his order in vacation to the clerk of the court, directing that a grand jury of ten citizens, &c., be summoned to attend the court on the 21st of September. Upon this order the clerk issued his warrant to the sergeant to summon certain grand jurors, naming them. Of the list furnished the sergeant, nine attended the court. At the September term of the court an order was entered as follows: This day came a grand jury, to wit: naming six of those who had been summoned by the sergeant; who being elected, &c. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Objections.—It is not a valid objection to this grand jury, that the list of the jurors was not made out and delivered to the sergeant five days before the term.

2. Same—Same—Statutory Requirements—Recordation.—The statute does not require the order of the judge to be entered of record. And when it appears by the record that six were elected, &c., it must be presumed that all this was done by the direction of the court.

3. Same—Same—Acts of Clerk.—The acts of the clerk done in the presence of the court and under its supervision, must be taken to be done by direction of court; and is the act of the court.

4. Same—Same—Statutory Requirements—Recordation.—All the statute requires is, that the number of grand jurors may be limited to six by the direction of the court. It does not require that the direction shall be matter of record.

5. Same—Same—Objections.—Nor is it a valid objection to the grand jury, that it was composed of six of the nine summoned by order of the court in vacation.

II. Police Officers—Using Force in Making Arrests.—A policeman who does not use more force than is necessary to arrest a person who is engaged in riotous and disorderly conduct, and who resists the officer, is not guilty of an assault and battery.

977 *This was an indictment in the Corporation court of the city of Winchester, against John R. Mesmer, for assaulting and beating Amos Jackson. There was a verdict of the jury for one cent damages, to which the court by its judgment added ten days' imprisonment in the jail of the corporation. And thereupon Mesmer applied to a judge of this court for a writ of error; which was allowed. The case is fully stated by Judge Christian in his opinion.

Williams & Williams, for the appellant.

The Attorney-General, for the commonwealth.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The court is of opinion, that the Corporation court of Winchester did not err in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error to quash the indictment, because it was found by a grand jury of six, selected from nine who had been summoned to attend the term at which the indictment was found.

The 4th section of the act of the general assembly approved March 27th 1874 provides as follows:

§ 4. For every grand jury in the Circuit courts, and for two terms in each year of the Corporation courts, such terms to be specially designated by such Corporation courts by order entered of record, which order may be changed from time to time, at the discretion of such courts, there shall be summoned twenty-four citizens of this state, of the county or corporation in which such court is held, and in other respects qualified jurors &c. * * * The number of persons to serve on such grand juries may, by direction of the court to its clerk, be limited to sixteen. For *the grand juries to all other terms (i. e., except the two terms designated by order entered of record), there shall be summoned ten citizens of the state, with like qualifications, and subject to the exceptions hereinbefore stated: And the court may by direction to its clerk, limit the number of persons to serve thereon, to not less than six."

By an act approved April 23d, 1874, the first and third sections of the act of March 27th 1874, were amended; but the 4th section remains without amendment as above quoted.

Section 1st provides for a grand jury at each regular term of a Circuit court, and at any special term thereof; and at any term of a Corporation court, upon the order of such court, or the judge thereof, in vacation. And authority is given both Circuit and Corporation courts during any term, to order the empanelling of grand juries for such term.

The 3d section makes it the duty of the clerks, both of the Circuit and Corporation courts, five days before the regular terms of the Circuit court, and before the terms of the Corporation court, designated under 1st section, or on order of a judge in vacation at any time before a special term, or at any time upon order of the Circuit or Corporation court, to place in the hands of the officers of such court, lists of the grand jurors selected by lot as provided in previous section (sec. 2), duly qualified, &c. * * * And it is made the duty of such officers to summon the persons mentioned in said list to attend on the first day of such regular or special terms of such courts, or on the day designated in the order of the court.

It thus appears, that at each regular term of the Circuit Court, and at the two terms designated of record, by the Corporation courts, the clerks of said *courts respectively, shall furnish the lists of qualified grand jurors, twenty-four in number, unless by direction of the court the number be limited to sixteen, to the officers of the court five days before the terms respectively.

At all other terms of the Corporation courts except the two designated of record, ten qualified grand jurors may be summoned; and at such term the number may, by direction of the court, be limited to six.

In the case before us, the indictment against the plaintiff in error was found on the 21st September 1874. On the 18th September Judge Sherrerd, of said Corporation court of Winchester, issued his order in vacation, directing "that a grand jury consisting of ten citizens of this state, of the city of Winchester, and in other respects qualified jurors, * * * be summoned to attend the Hustings court of the city aforesaid, on Monday the 21st September 1874, to serve as grand jurors therein." Upon this order the clerk issued his warrant to the sergeant of the corporation, directing him to summon certain grand jurors, naming them, and their residence in different wards of the city of Winchester. Of this list furnished to the sergeant, nine attended the court. At the September term, on what day of the term does not appear, the following order was entered: "This day came a grand jury, to wit, (naming six of those who had been summoned by the sergeant), who being elected, tried and sworn, and having received their charge, retired to their room, and after some time returned into court, having found as follows: Commonwealth of Virginia v. John Mesmer, Indictment for assault and battery. A true bill. Lloyd D. Logan, Foreman."

There was a motion to quash this indictment, upon *the ground that the grand jury was not made up according to law.

The 1st objection urged by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, to the constitution of this grand jury, is, that the list of grand jurors was not made out and delivered to the city sergeant five days before the term—the order in vacation having been entered on the 18th September, and the term commencing on the 21st of the month. This objection cannot be maintained upon a proper construction of the whole act. The 4th section of the act approved March 27th, is not repealed by the act approved April 23rd 1874.

That section provides: "For the grand jury for all other terms" (i. e. for terms other than the two designated of record), "there shall be summoned ten citizens of the state, with the qualifications, and subject to the exceptions heretofore stated. And the court may, by direction to its clerk, limit the number of persons to serve thereon to not less than six."

Now the 3d section requires the clerk of the Circuit court, five days before the regular term thereof, and of the Corporation courts five days before the terms designated in the 1st section, to place in the hands of the proper officer a list of grand jurors &c.; but it also provides that such list may at any time, before a special term of the Circuit court, by order of a judge thereof, and at any time upon order of such Circuit or Corporation court, be placed in the hands of the officer of the court, such list of grand jurors.

Power is thus conferred upon both the Circuit and Corporation courts to direct a grand jury to be summoned at any time, by order of such courts in term; and upon the Corporation courts is conferred the power to limit the number by direction to its clerk to six grand jurors.

*The 2nd objection urged is, that there is no order of record, giving direction to the clerk to summon six grand jurors; and that the judge in vacation having directed that ten jurors should be summoned, they should have constituted a grand jury; and that they should have been summoned five days before the court.

To the 1st branch of the objection it is sufficient to remark, that the act does not require the direction to the clerk to be entered of record. It simply provides that the court may by direction to the clerk, limit the number of grand jurors to six.

Now when it appears by the record that six grand jurors were elected, tried and sworn and received the charge and retired to consider of their duties, it must be presumed that all this was done by the direction of the court. The acts of the clerk done in the presence of the court and under the supervision of the court, must be taken to be done by direction of the court. When the clerk calls and administers the oath prescribed by law for grand jurors to six men in the presence of the court as a grand jury, we are bound to presume that all this was done by direction of the court. What the clerk did in the premises was the act of the court. Done in the presence of the court, it must be presumed to have had the sanction and authority of the court. The act of the clerk became the act of the court, and the fact that it was done in the presence of the court is conclusive that it was done by its sanction and direction. And all the law requires is that the number of grand jurors may be limited to six by direction of the court. It does not require that this "direction" shall be made a matter of record. The act of the clerk in swearing a grand jury of six would have been without authority, and nothing, except that 982 *it was done in the presence and with the sanction of the court. And when that act is done in the presence of the court it must be presumed to have been done by its direction, and was in fact the act of the court. See Allen v. Commonwealth, 2 Leigh 727; Thornton v. Commonwealth, 24 Gratt. 657.

Nor is there any valid objection in the fact that this grand jury was composed of six of the nine summoned by order of the court in vacation. On the contrary the presumption is, that those summoned by the vacation order were selected because of their peculiar fitness for their duties as grand jurors. The fact that six of their number were selected instead of six others—the court having authority to summon six—certainly does not invalidate an indictment made by a grand jury composed of six, because that six was selected from men already summoned as a proper grand jury.

The court is therefore of opinion that there was no error in the judgment of the Corporation court of Winchester, in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error to quash the indictment, because it was found by a grand jury not constituted according to law: this court being of opinion, that the grand jury composed of six members, was lawfully constituted, by direction of the court having authority to order such grand jury. And that the indictment made by such grand jury, was made by authority of law.

But the court is further of opinion, that the said Corporation court erred in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error for a new trial; and in entering judgment for the amount of the verdict and costs of the prosecution; and in entering as the judgment of court, that the plaintiff in error be imprisoned for ten days in the city jail.

983 *The facts certified by the court are:

That in September, 1874, Amos Jackson, a man of color, came to Winchester from Clarke county, where he was living with his employer, and with this latter's wagon and team, which he stopped on Main street, and went to a store on the opposite side of the street, returning thence with another man of color; and hearing a noise of some disturbance in Woolfort's saloon, attempted, together with several other men of color, to enter the same to see what was going on; but they were met in the vestibule by the proprietor, Henry Woolfort, who told them not to come in, and to go away from his door and not block it up; whereupon they all did as asked, save said Jackson, whom Woolfort again told to keep out, and go away, and shoved him just outside the door. Standing there, he said to Woolfort: "I'll knock you down in a minute, if you fool around me." That the accused was and had long been chief of police of the city of Winchester, and charged with the preservation of its peace—had been called for by some one present by cries of "police!" but whether for the disturbance in the house was not proven, and run up to the place in time to hear Jackson's remark to Woolfort; whereupon he said to Jackson: "What's that you say? Get away from here;" and took him by the coat collar; but Jackson resisted, and, being a stouter man, broke Mesmer's hold by turning around suddenly, and, by the act of turning, threw Mesmer away from him; saying, when Mesmer first seized him, "Go away, boss, you've got nothing to do with me, I ain't adoin' nothing:" that upon being thrown off as above stated, Mesmer advanced upon and seized Jackson again, and the latter again breaking away, Mesmer struck tipped with white metal ferrules at each end, which the witness described as a billy; and Jackson still resisting arrest, and backing toward the curbstone, Mesmer struck him again, whereupon Jackson struck at Mesmer once or twice, and, in doing this, knocked the stick from his hands; upon which Mesmer reaching behind as if for his pistol, Jackson ran diagonally and very fast across the street and up an alley leading to Market street. Mesmer followed him rapidly, and after Jackson entered the alley, Mesmer fired three or four shots from his pistol; and after a considerable chase overtook and arrested Jackson and, with another officer, took him to jail. That when he fired the first shot he was very near to Jackson and could, in the opinion of witnesses, have hit him, had he intended to do so; but it was not proved whether or not Jackson was struck by any of the shots fired, and that he had no wounds about him, except a small one on the side of his head, although he was at his own request examined by two physicians. That Jackson was tried by a justice of the peace for resisting an officer and being asked if he had any witnesses, said he had none—said he knew he had done wrong, and hoped the justice would be easy on him; and it was further proved that Mesmer interceded with the justice for him, and the justice thereupon abandoning the idea of sending him on to the grand jury, fined him one dollar and costs; and Jackson afterwards procured Mesmer's indictment, and employed counsel to assist in prosecuting him.

984 him on the head with a whalebone stick about an inch thick and two *feet long,

This court is of opinion, that the evidence certified, conclusively shows, that the alleged assault by the plaintiff in error, was made in the discharge of his official duty; as chief of police of the city of Winchester; and that no more force was employed 985 by *plaintiff in error than was necessary to secure the arrest of the party he was charged in the said indictment with having assaulted. Indeed the evidence conclusively shows, that no force was used until the plaintiff in error was resisted and assaulted, while making an arrest, in a case, which his duty as chief of police required him to make. The party whom he attempted to arrest was at the time so conducting himself as that his conduct was riotous and unlawful, and he continued his riotous and unlawful conduct by resisting and violently assaulting the officer. The blow, or blows struck by the officer, were only struck to accomplish his arrest, and cannot in law be considered an assault and battery for which the officer can be punished. The fact that the officer fired a pistol at the party when he had escaped by violent resistance, after assaulting the officer, does not alter the case. It is evident that the officer simply fired the pistol to intimidate the party, who, after assaulting him, had effected his escape, and compel his surrender. It is proved that the party was not shot, though the officer could easily have shot him; and the evidence shows that the pistol shots were fired only to intimidate and cause to surrender, a party who being caught by a policeman, (who is attracted to the spot by cry of Police), was engaged in riotous conduct—resists the officer, violently assaults him, and makes his escape.

It would never do, to hold policemen liable under such circumstances, for a prosecution for assault and battery.

The peace and good order of society, in every well ordered government, requires that policemen in the discharge of their duty, and in their efforts to protect society against violence and riotous conduct of evil doers, should be protected, and not be 986 subjected to *harrassing prosecutions for the faithful discharge of their duties as conservators of the peace.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the Corporation court of Winchester erred in overruling the motion of the plaintiff for a new trial, and in ordering the imprisonment of the plaintiff in error in the county jail.

For this error the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for, a new trial to be had therein.

Staples J. dissented.

The judgment was as follows:

This day came again as well the plaintiff in error as the attorney-general on behalf of the commonwealth, and the court having maturely considered the transcript of the record of the judgment aforesaid and the arguments of counsel, is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that there is no error in the judgment of the Corporation court of Winchester in overruling the motion to quash the indictment, upon the alleged ground that it was found by a grand jury illegally constituted: this court being of opinion that a grand jury of six, which found said indictment, was under the statute law of this state legally and properly constituted.

But the court is further of opinion, that the said Corporation court erred in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error for a new trial: this court being of opinion that the evidence certified, conclusively shows that the plaintiff in error was not guilty of such an assault and battery as is punishable under the laws of this state; but that as the chief of police of the city of Winchester, he did not use more force 987 than *was necessary to make an arrest, and did not use any force until he was violently resisted, and himself assaulted by the party he was attempting to arrest.

The court is therefore of opinion, that the said court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury aforesaid, and in adjudging that the plaintiff in error be imprisoned ten days in the city jail; for which error the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded to said Corporation court, with directions to set aside said verdict and grant to the plaintiff in error a new trial; which is ordered to be certified to the said Corporation court of Winchester.

Judgment reversed.

988 *Myerdock v. Commonwealth.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

Absent, MONCURE, P.

Licenses—Agent Selling under Principal's License.—

The act approved April 30th, 1874, in relation to sample merchants, licenses, authorized a party who has obtained a license, to employ an agent to sell for the principal under the license.

The case is stated in the opinion of the court.

E. Y. Cannon, for the appellant.

The Attorney-General, for the commonwealth.

The principal case is cited, but distinguished in Webber v. Com., 83 Gratt. 906-7.

Christian J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The only question we have to determine in this case is, what is the true construction of that clause of 110th section of the act approved April 30th 1874, relating to sample merchants' license, which contains the following provision: "Such license thus obtained, shall be a personal privilege, and shall not be transferable, nor any abatement in the tax thereon allowed." Sess. Acts 1874, p. 18.

The plaintiff in error was indicted in the Hustings court of the city of Richmond, and the indictment charged that he "did unlawfully sell and offer to sell, goods, wares and merchandise by sample, card, description and other representation, without having a license according to law so to do." The jury found a special 989 *verdict—That the defendant John H. Myerdock sold, or offered to sell, certain goods, wares and merchandise, in the city of Richmond, by sample, to one Henry Wenzel, in the month of November 1874; and at that time the said defendant had a license taken out by him in the name of Wm. H. Horseman & Sons, of Philadelphia; for which license he had paid on behalf of said firm, the sum of $100, as required by law; and that said license was regularly issued by the commissioner of the revenue for the city of Norfolk, and was duly attested according to law, and issued on the 31st day of August 1874; and was in full force until the 30th day of April 1875. And that said defendant at the time when he offered said goods for sale by sample, was the duly accredited agent of said Wm. H. Horseman & Sons, who had given him a power of attorney, in the words and figures following to wit: And then follows the power of attorney in due form and duly acknowledged and certified, which after reciting the license issued to them by the commissioner of the revenue for the city of Norfolk, to sell merchandise by sample, in the state of Virginia, constitutes and appoints the plaintiff in error their agent to sell for them under said license, goods, wares and merchandise by sample in the state of Virginia.

Upon this special verdict finding these facts, the Hustings court adjudged the plaintiff in error guilty, and assessed his fine at the sum of two hundred dollars; and directed that he be confined in jail until said fine and the costs of prosecution be paid; such confinement not to exceed six months.

To this judgment a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

The court is of opinion, that the judgment of said Hustings court is erroneous. According to the true *construction of the act of assembly above quoted, and under which the plaintiff in error was indicted, it is clear that he was not guilty of any violation of law. The act declares (sec. 110) that any person who shall sell or offer to sell any description of goods, wares or merchandise, by sample, card, description or other representation, shall be deemed to be a sample merchant; and requires, under the penalty of a fine of $100, that he shall obtain a license therefor; for which license he is to pay the specific tax of $100. Horseman & Sons, as found by the special verdict, did obtain a license as sample merchants, and paid the specific tax. The plaintiff in error was their agent, and was selling by sample for their benefit, and not for his own. When the statute declares that such license "shall be a personal privilege," it does not mean, that the person obtaining such license shall be required to sell in person and not by another: it only means to declare, that such license shall be used for the benefit of the party to whom it is issued. He cannot transfer it to another; nor can any other person sell under it: but certainly there is no inhibition in the statute against sample merchants operating through agents. A sale by an agent is a sale by himself. If he has a license as a sample merchant, he may sell either by himself or by his agent, like any other merchant. This construction is made plainer by the words which follow the clause—"shall be a personal privilege." "Such license thus obtained, shall be a personal privilege, and shall not be transferable, nor any abatement in the tax allowed:" that is to say, such license shall be used for the benefit of the person to whom it is issued, and shall not be transferred to another.

Myerdock, the plaintiff in error, was the duly authorized agent of Horseman & Sons. The latter were *duly licensed as sample merchants. They had a right to sell either by themselves or their agent; and Myerdock selling for the persons to whom the license was issued, and not for his own benefit, was guilty of no violation of the statute; and upon the facts found by the special verdict, ought to have been discharged. The judgment of the said Hustings court must therefore be reversed.

The judgment was as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the judgment of the said Hustings court is erroneous. And this court being of opinion, that upon the special verdict found by the jury, the plaintiff in error was guilty of no violation of law; and proceeding to enter upon said verdict such judgment as the said Hustings court ought to have entered, it is therefore adjudged and ordered that the said plaintiff in error be forever discharged from said prosecution; which is ordered to be certified to said Hustings Court of the city of Richmond.

Judgment reversed.

992 *Morgan v. Commonwealth.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

An indictment which charges a party with taking oysters with ordinary oyster tongs, without paying the tax prescribed by law, charges no offence against the law, and is fatally defective.

Uriah L. Morgan was indicted in the County court of Matthews county, for that being a citizen of Virginia, and the owner of a canoe and oyster craft, he used the said canoe and oyster craft in taking oysters with ordinary oyster tongs, without paying the tax prescribed by law. Morgan appeared and demurred to the indictment; but the demurrer was overruled by the court. He then pleaded "not guilty;" and upon his trial was found guilty, and his fine was assessed at ten dollars; and there was judgment against him according to the verdict. He then took the cause to the Circuit court; where the judgment was affirmed. And he thereupon applied to this court for a writ of error; which was awarded.

J. N. Stubbs, for the appellant.

The Attorney-General, for the commonwealth.

Anderson J. delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an indictment against the plaintiff in error in the County court of Matthews for taking oysters with ordinary oyster tongs without paying the tax *thereon.

993 There are three counts in the indictment; but they do not materially differ in the charge made against the defendant. There was a demurrer to the indictment, and to each count thereof, in which the Commonwealth joined, which was overruled by the court; and the defendant plead not guilty. Upon the issue the jury found the defendant guilty, and assessed his fine at ten dollars, for which there was judgment against him. And upon a writ of error and supersedeas to that judgment the Circuit court of Matthews affirmed it; and the cause is brought here upon a writ of error and supersedeas to the judgment of the Circuit court.

The court is of opinion that all the counts in the indictment are fatally defective, because they charge no offence against the law. The constitution of Virginia, art. 10, section 2, expressly provides that "no tax shall be imposed on any of the citizens of this state for the privilege of taking or catching oysters from their natural beds with tongs." But a tax on the amount of sales of oysters so taken is authorized. If he had been taxed on the amount of sales of oysters, which might lawfully be done, and which was the design of the statute, he might be indicted for taking the oysters for sale without paying the tax. But the indictment does not so charge in either of the counts. He might have done everything which the indictment charges, and not be guilty of an offence. Commonwealth v. Young, 15 Gratt. 664. He might lawfully have taken the oysters without paying the tax. He might have taken them for family use, and not for sale, with tongs, which would have been no offence. The indictment must clearly allege the offence described in the statute. Old's case, 18 Gratt. 915. If the statute under which this 994 indictment is made describes *any offence at all, it is the refusal to pay, or non-payment of a tax on oysters which he has taken for sale. It is evidently designed to impose a tax on the amount of sales of the oysters taken; and the non-payment of a tax so imposed is the offence. The taking of oysters ad libitum, if not for sale, or planting for sale, without paying the tax, is no offence. It is unnecessary to consider the instructions.

The court is of opinion therefore that the County court erred in overruling the demurrer, and the Circuit court erred in affirming the judgment of the County court. It is therefore considered that the judgment of the Circuit court be reversed and annulled; and the court proceeding to enter such judgment as the Circuit court ought to have entered, it is considered that the judgment of the County court be reversed and annulled, and that the plaintiff in error be discharged from further prosecution under this indictment, and go thereof without day.

Judgment reversed.

995 *Howell v. Commonwealth.

November Term, 1875, Richmond.

- 1. Criminal Law—Murder in First Degree—Sufficiency of Evidence.*—Upon the evidence the prisoner held to be guilty of murder in the first degree.
- 2. Same—Same—Same—Appellate Practice.—The jury having found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, and the court of trial having refused to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, the appellate court even if they had some doubt about the sufficiency of the evidence to convict the prisoner of murder in the first degree, would not reverse the judgment.
- 3. Same—Same—Statutory—Intent to Kill.—Murder committed by any of the specific means enumerated in the statute. Code of 1873, ch. 187, § 1, is murder in the first degree, whether there was any actual intent to kill or not.

At the November term 1873 of the County court of Patrick county, Isaac C. Howell was indicted for the murder of Lee Martin. He was tried at the July term 1874, of the court, and found guilty by the jury of murder in the first degree; and the court sentenced him to be hung. The only question in the case arises upon the motion of the prisoner for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; which was overruled by the court; and exception taken by the prisoner. And upon his application this court allowed him a writ of error to the judgment. The case is fully stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

Martin and Barksdale for the prisoner.

996 *The Attorney-General, for the commonwealth.

Moncure P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of the county of Patrick, convicting Isaac C. Howell of murder in the first degree, and sentencing him to the punishment of death therefor. The prisoner moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial because the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; but the court overruled the motion, and the prisoner excepted to the opinion of the court. The bill of exceptions contains a certificate of what is stated to be "all the facts proved in the case." The only assignment of error in the judgment is, the refusal of the court to award a new trial.

Beyond all question the prisoner killed the deceased; and in so doing was guilty of murder. These facts were not, and upon the evidence or facts certified, could not be denied. The only question argued or raised in the case was, whether the offence, as shown by the records, was murder in the first or second degree. The learned counsel for the prisoner argued that murder is presumed to be only murder in the second degree, unless and until it be proved to be murder in the first degree; and that the murder in this case was not proved to be murder in the first degree.

The legal proposition thus contended for is certainly true. But is it true that the murder in this case was not proved to be murder in the first degree?

The law defining the degrees of murder may be found in the Code, chapter 187, section 1, page 1188; and is in these words: "Murder by poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, or any wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing, or in the commission of, or attempt to commit arson, 997 rape, robbery or burglary, *is murder in the first degree. All other murder is murder in the second degree."

The offence in this case was certainly not committed by any of the specific means enumerated in the statute, that is "by poison, lying in wait, imprisonment or starving"; nor in the commission of, or attempt to commit, any of the specific offences therein named, to wit: "arson, rape, robbery or burglary." Had it been so committed, it would have been murder in the first degree, whether there was any actual intent to kill or not. In other words, although the presence of an actual intention to kill would often exist in such a case, it would not necessarily constitute an ingredient of the offence, as it would be no part of its definition.

If, therefore, the offence in this case be murder in the first degree, it must be because it is embraced by the general words: "any wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing," used in the statute. And to constitute murder in the first degree under that branch of the statute, the offence must be committed with an actual intention to kill. And to authorize a conviction of such an offence, it must appear from the evidence that such an intention existed.

Does it appear from the facts or evidence certified in this case, that such an intention existed?

The certificate is in these words: That on the 21st day of November 1873, about 9 o'clock, the prisoner came to the house of Peter Via, who lived about half a mile from the prisoner's mill, and said he "was afraid he had stretched Lee Martin," the deceased, and he wished the witness to go with him to the mill where the deceased was. On the way to the mill, the prisoner stated to the witness, that on the same morning he, the prisoner, was in his mill, on the upper floor, stooping down upon his knees, 998 trimming a wedge on *a block with a hatchet or small chop axe; that the deceased came into the mill, on the same floor on which the prisoner was, having a small sack of corn and a tin bucket on his arm; that the deceased placed his sack of corn near the mill hopper (having passed by the prisoner) and turning immediately advanced upon the prisoner, while he was yet upon his knees, with an open knife in his hand, his arm drawn back in a threatening attitude—the knife being a pocket knife about six inches long, blade and handle—the blade having a sharp point; that the prisoner thereupon, in order to defend himself, struck the deceased two blows with the blade of said axe; that the deceased gave back upon receiving the first blow; advanced again with his drawn knife, and that the prisoner tapped him the second time; when the deceased, who was near the brink of the upper floor, fell to the lower floor; that the prisoner then further stated, that as soon as the boy fell, and he saw he was badly hurt, he went below to see what he had done; that he turned the boy over on his side in an easy position, and then went immediately to give information to the nearest neighbor, who was the witness; that the witness went on immediately to the mill with prisoner at his request; that when they got to the mill, he found the deceased on the floor, as stated by the prisoner, and yet alive and in a very bad condition.

The prisoner went in the mill with witness to see the condition of deceased. Seeing how he was, prisoner asked him (witness) what he thought had better be done, and said he thought he would give himself up to a magistrate, if one could be found in the neighborhood. Witness told him he knew of none near by, and that prisoner might see E. B. Turner, who was a police officer. Prisoner then requested wit- 999 ness to go *after James Wright, a school teacher near by. Witness went after Wright, saw him, delivered the message, went on to Tazewell Turner's, and before getting to Turner's prisoner overtook him, and said he believed he would go with him. The four parties mentioned then returned to the mill.

It was further proved that the mill house was about 22 feet square; that it was about 8 feet 8 inches from the lower to the upper floor; that there were no plank on the lower floor, and the deceased was no more than 18 inches from the brink of the upper floor when he received the blows from prisoner, and fell or struggled below; that there were two logs or sills on lower floor and that the upper floor extended over about half the upper story.

It was further proved, that the block upon which the prisoner was chopping when the deceased entered the mill, was on the right of the front door as they entered, and about four feet from the door. The distance from the door to the mill hopper is about 15 feet; from block to right hand wall about 18 inches or 2 feet; from block to mill hopper about 8 or 10 feet; that the prisoner showed one of the witnesses the place where he said the deceased stood when he was struck, and that this point was 4 or 5 feet from the block, on a line to the hopper; that the knife, the hat and the tin bucket were found below, and the hatchet above on the bag of corn with the handle next to the steps leading below, as if placed there by some one coming from below. There was blood on the blade of the axe; the hat was on the sill below, with no appearance of having been cut with the axe, with a few sprinkles of blood on it, and looking as if it was placed there—it was a felt hat and seemed to have been taken up and put there. There were some 1000 *sprinkles of blood on side of bucket; there was no blood on the upper floor.

It was a cold morning and there was a little fire in the mill on lower floor. There was some blood on the side of steps in two or three places, as if made by the left hand in going up. The deceased was 15 years old, weighed about 85 pounds, was rather delicate in appearance, and was on his way to school, having come by the mill to bring his corn. The prisoner is about 45 years old, and is a strong and able-bodied man. In going from the mill to Via's house, the prisoner had to cross two branches. On his return from Via's house to the mill, Via saw some blood on the prisoner's hand. It was proved, that the prisoner went to the house of Wright the school teacher, and made complaint to him about the conduct of the deceased who was then attending his school, along with the prisoner's children: this was about three days before the killing. He complained that the deceased had treated his children very badly. This was on Sunday morning. The next morning prisoner went to the school house and carried four of his children. He told the schoolmaster that the deceased had acted very badly; that he did not care about his saying anything to the deceased about it, but that he wanted him (schoolmaster) to protect his children; that he could not and would not stand such behaviour.

It was further proved by one Daniel Martin, an uncle of the deceased, that he was at the prisoner's mill the day before the killing, and told the prisoner he had seen his wife that day, and she, prisoner's wife, told him, that a short time before the deceased had been at her house in the absence of her husband, and after whipping some of her children, the deceased abused and insulted her very much. Witness said 1001 he *advised prisoner to tell deceased's mother about the matter, and probably she would have him corrected. Prisoner said to witness: "I'll get him yet."

It was proved by various witnesses, that the prisoner had, from his boyhood, sustained a high character, as a man of truth and honesty; as a peaceable, quiet and well behaved citizen; that he had every opportunity after the killing, to make his escape, and refused to do so—surrendering himself voluntarily to the officers of the law; that after he was put in jail he could have made his escape, but refused to do so. This was proved by the jailer. There were three wounds on the head of the deceased—one, the skin was separated from the skull, from near the top of the head to near the neck; the other two wounds were cut with a sharp instrument, about three inches long and about two inches deep, and extending from near the upper part of the left ear toward the crown of the head. The deceased lived about twenty-four hours. There was a scratch on the left cheek of the deceased, which appeared to have been made with the finger nail.

There was some controversy in the argument, whether the certificate was intended to be of facts or of evidence only; or in part of facts, and in part of evidence only. In other words: whether the statements certified as having been made by the prisoner are to be regarded as statements of fact which actually occurred in the case. If they are to be so regarded, then it may well be contended, not only that it is not a case of murder in the first degree, but that it is not a case of murder at all; but only a case of manslaughter, if indeed it be not a case of homicide in self-defence. For according to those statements, while the prisoner 1002 was in his mill, *stooping down upon his knees trimming a wedge on a block with a hatchet or small chop axe, the deceased came into the mill and advanced upon the prisoner "with an open knife in his hand, his arm drawn back in a threatening attitude—the knife being a pocket knife about six inches long, blade and handle—the blade having a sharp point." And "the prisoner thereupon, in order to defend himself, struck the deceased two blows with the blade of said axe," &c. A man may, intentionally kill his adversary in necessary self-defence. And even though it be not an act of necessary self-defence, yet the assault upon him may be in such a manner, and with such a weapon, as that, under all the circumstances of the case, his offence in killing his adversary would be only manslaughter, even though the killing was actually intended.

But these statements of the prisoner are not to be regarded as statements of fact which actually occurred in the case. They are not certified as such; but merely as statements made by the prisoner. And they are inconsistent with, and disproved by, the facts of the case, and cannot therefore be of facts also; for all the facts actually oc-curing in a case must, necessarily, be consistent.

Looking then to the facts of this case as they appear in the certificate, is it a case of murder in the first degree? Was the killing wilful, deliberate, and premeditated?

In solving this question we must look at all the circumstances of the case. Murder in the first degree is often committed secretly, and not openly. The homicide in this case was so committed. But the nature and grade of the offence may in such a case be often proved as plainly by the circumstances, as if it had been committed in the presence of many witnesses: and we think such is the case here.

In the first place, a circumstance which strikes us as very important in this case is, the great disparity between the age and strength of the parties—the prisoner and the deceased. The prisoner was in the prime of life, about forty-five years old, and a strong and able-bodied man. The deceased was but fifteen years old, weighed about eighty-five pounds, was rather delicate in appearance, and was on his way to school, having come by the mill to bring his corn. The prisoner might, if he had chosen, have stamped the deceased to death with his feet, or beaten him to death with fists or with hands; though his offence in that case would doubtless have been none the less. But he chose to use a more certain and speedy means of death. He used a deadly weapon—one of the most deadly of all weapons, a hatchet or small chop axe. And he used it in such a way as to ensure the death of the boy. He struck him, apparently with all his strength, three blows on the head with the blade of that axe; thus inflicting three wounds on that most vital portion of the body, two of which were about three inches long and about two inches deep, and extending from near the upper part of the left ear toward the crown of the head. Could he have expected, or intended, to inflict such blows upon that boy without killing him? Was it strange that the boy lived but twenty-four hours after receiving them? Is it not more strange that he did not immediately die under the infliction? The law presumes that a sane man intends the natural consequence of his act. What consequence of this act of the prisoner could have been more natural than the 1004 death of the boy. It may be asked—

indeed it was asked in the progress of the argument. If the prisoner intended to kill the deceased, why the act of killing was not completed at the time; and why was the deceased left alive by the prisoner? The answer is, that the prisoner knew he had given the deceased a mortal wound, which must very soon cause his death, if it had not already done so, and there was no cause for doing anything more to effect the purpose in view. It does not appear that the deceased was sensible at all after he received the wounds. He may have languished insensibly until he died, but twenty-four hours thereafter. The prisoner may have believed that the deceased was actually dead when he left him. If we can suppose that the prisoner, after inflicting the wounds with a wilful, deliberate and premeditated intention to kill, changed his intention and determined not to kill, his act would have been just as criminal, in the eye of the law, as if there had been no such change. His offence was completed when he did, with criminal intent, the act which caused the death; however much he may, possibly, have regretted it, after it was done and before the death occurred.

The record does not show that there was anything in the conduct of the deceased at the time of the commission of the offence by the prisoner, which could have afforded the slightest excuse for the act of the latter, or reduced it from the grade of murder in the first degree. The deceased went to the mill of the prisoner on business, on his way to school, to carry a small sack of corn to be ground. The idea that he went there to make an assault upon the prisoner is wholly groundless. He would not have attempted so rash and mad an act, looking to the great inequality in age and strength between the two. He had no conceivable motive for such an assault, and he was wholly unprepared for it. He went without a weapon, except an ordinary pocket knife, which he no doubt accidentally had about his person. It would be absurd to suppose that he went in such a way to assault such a man in his own house, when there was no one near to prevent his being killed by his adversary, which might so easily have been done.

But while the deceased had no motive for such an assault, and would have been so rash and mad in making it, such was not the case in regard to the prisoner. He had a motive, real or imaginary. The deceased went to school with the prisoner's children, and had as the prisoner said, and as his wife said, treated them badly. It does not appear what was the nature and extent of this bad treatment, except that the wife said to an uncle of the deceased that the latter had, a short time before, been at her house in the absence of her husband, and after whipping some of her children abused and insulted her very much. The deceased may have acted very badly in regard to the children of the prisoner, and may have deserved reasonable chastisement for his conduct in that respect. Whether he did or not, and to what extent, we cannot know from the record in this case. Nor is it material that we should know. Had the prisoner been content, as he should have been, to have had the deceased reasonably chastised for his conduct, nothing would have been easier than to have had it done. He might have had it done no doubt both through the teacher and through the mother of the boy. But it appears that the prisoner had in his mind a different kind and degree of punishment of the deceased from that tion—a punishment no less than that of death—the highest punishment known to the law for the highest crime. That the purpose of the prisoner was revenge, and not reasonable chastisement, is shown by what he said both to the teacher and to the uncle of the deceased. He told the teacher, about three days before the killing, that the deceased had treated his children very badly; “that he did not care about his saying any thing to the deceased about it, but that he wanted him (the schoolmaster) to protect his children; that he could not and would not stand such behaviour.” And when advised by the uncle of the deceased to tell his mother about the matter, who would probably have him corrected, prisoner said to the uncle: “I’ll get him yet.” He got him the day after.

Now the close connection between these threats and the act which they foreshadowed, and the circumstances attending its commission, show that “it was an act of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing, and of course murder in the first degree.” The deceased could not have expected an attack from the prisoner, or he would not have placed himself so completely in his power. It does not appear from the facts certified in the record that the deceased made any resistance. He had not time, even if he had had strength, and the means at hand to make it. The first blow of the axe no doubt staggered and stunned him, and wholly disabled him from making any resistance. There was not a mark or scratch on the person of the prisoner after the affair was over; nor a drop of blood, except some on his left hand, which was the blood of the deceased.

In regard to the good character of 1007 the prisoner, and *his conduct after the killing in not making his escape, but giving himself up to be tried for the offence, these are not sufficient to repel the effect of the strong, if not conclusive proof of his guilt afforded by the facts certified in the record. His conduct afterwards may have been, and doubtless was, induced by a desire to make out thereby a case of self-defence; or, at all events, to extenuate the degree of the crime of which he might be convicted, and to mitigate his punishment.

But even if we had any doubt as to the degree of the offence in this case, it is certainly not sufficient to warrant us in reversing the judgment of the court for any supposed error in that respect. It was the province of the jury in finding the prisoner guilty, to find whether he was guilty of murder in the first or second degree. The jury which found the prisoner guilty in this case found him guilty of murder in the first degree. The court in which he was tried, which heard and saw the witnesses testify, was moved to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence; but overruled the motion, and pronounced the judgment. According to well settled law and practice, this court would not be warranted in reversing the judgment. It is therefore affirmed.

We have referred to no authorities in the foregoing opinion considering the principles of law therein stated to be well settled. Reference may be had, however, if desired, to the following, besides other cases on the subject. King’s case, note thereto 2 Va. Judgment affirmed.

1009 *Kent, Paine & Co. v. Dickinson, Judge.

January Term, 1875, Richmond.

Continuation of Same Case.—In the case of Kent, Paine & Co. v. Dickinson, Judge, reported in 25 Gratt. 817, JUDGES ANDERSON and BOULDIN dissented from the decision of the court. The opinion of JUDGE ANDERSON expressing his dissent was not received by the reporter in time to insert it in the report of the case, and it is given below.

Anderson, J.

This is a rule against the honorable judge of the Circuit court of Charlotte county, to show cause why a peremptory mandamus should not be awarded against him, to proceed to hear and finally dispose of the case of Kent, Paine & Co. v. A. D. Ford & Co. I think his answer to this rule is all sufficient, that he has heard and finally disposed of said cause.

The cause was upon the docket of the district Court of Appeals, when the present constitution took effect, and by operation of the 2nd section of ch. 178 (Code of 1873, p. 1143), was transferred to the Supreme Court of Appeals. But this was a case which this court, under the constitution, had no jurisdiction to try; the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, not being of the value of $500; and it not being “a controversy concerning the title or boundaries of land, the probate of a will, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee or curator; or concerning a mill, road way, ferry or landing; or the right of a corporation, or a county 1010 to levy *tolls or taxes; and it not being a case of habeas corpus, mandamus, or prohibition, or involving the constitutionality of a law.” This court by express inhibition of the constitution, could not assume jurisdiction to try it. (Constitution of Virginia, art. 6, sec. 2; Code of 1873, p. 84.) And by the mandate of the 33d section of the Act of Assembly, supra it was properly transferred to the Circuit court where the appeal was taken, there to be docketed, heard and finally disposed of as by an appellate court. The cause was so transferred and docketed; and it is insisted by the defendant, was heard and finally disposed of.

But it was not heard on its merits. It was heard upon a motion to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that the person by whom it was awarded was not a judge, and had no lawful authority to award the writ. If that were so, it was not competent for the Circuit court, as an appellate court, to hear and determine the case upon its merits. The writ of supersedeas was a nullity, and the original judgment of the Circuit court was in force. It was a question which met the appellate judge at the threshold of the case, and which he was obliged to decide. And it was, unquestionably, within his appellate jurisdiction. He did entertain the motion, and after argument and due consideration, being of opinion, that the writ of error and supersedeas, had not been awarded by one who had judicial authority, and that the original judgment had not been lawfully superseded, and was still in force, he dismissed the appeal. Being of that opinion what else could he do? He was bound to dismiss it. If he erred, and upon that point I give no opinion, because I do not think it is involved in this inquiry, it was an error of judgment, in the decision of a question which was clearly within his jurisdiction to determine; and *the only mode by which it could be reviewed and corrected was by a writ of error. If the same decision had been made by the District court, and the amount in controversy was sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, I am clearly of opinion, that it might have been reviewed by this court, upon a writ of error. If so, it could not be reviewed and reversed, upon a rule for a mandamus. If a writ of error would not lie, because the value of the matter in controversy was not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction, the case must share the fate of all other cases, where the inferior court has erred, or is believed to have erred, and the appellate tribunal has no jurisdiction to review the decision and correct the error. I do not mean to say that a writ of error would not lie in this case from this court to review the decision. It may be claimed upon the ground that it involved the constitutionality of a law. I do not know that such is the case. That point is not involved in this case, and I do not express any opinion upon it. But however that may be, whether this tribunal would have jurisdiction or not to review the decision upon a writ of error, I am clear, that it has no jurisdiction to reverse it by mandamus.

But it is contended that the court below disobeyed the order of this court, in refusing to hear the case on its merits. I do not understand the order of this court as requiring the Circuit court to try the cause on its merits. And I do not think that it was competent for this court to make such an order. This court acted ministerially in executing the act of assembly. It was manifest upon the face of the judgment of the Circuit court which was sought to be reversed, that this court had no jurisdiction whatever in the case: and that there was a constitutional inhibition to its taking jurisdiction. If it were not so, the case 1012 was *improperly transferred to the Circuit court, and that court had no jurisdiction to try it.

But the District court having been abolished, all the causes pending and undetermined in that court, with the papers and records of said court, were transferred by the operation of the 30th section of the act aforesaid, to the custody of the Court of Appeals. The act then provides how they shall be disposed of by said court. Section 31 authorizes it to try such of them as are within its jurisdiction; and such of them as are not, section 33 provides, "shall be transferred to, and docketed in the Circuit court of the counties or corporations, whence the appeals were originally taken, there to be heard and disposed of as an appellate court." It was not the design of the act to give the Supreme Court of Appeals an appellate jurisdiction which was expressly prohibited by the constitution. It was only intended that the court should look into the record of the causes so committed to its custody, which it might do by its clerk, and try such as it had jurisdiction to try, and those which it had not jurisdiction to try, as where the amount in controversy was not of the value of $500, it is provided, "shall be transferred," &c., to the Circuit court; and the act (not the court) further requires, that it shall be there heard and finally disposed of, as by an appellate court. And the cause coming on before the Circuit court of Charlotte, as an appellate court, it was obliged to consider and decide the question which had been raised, whether the writ of error and supersedeas had been awarded by a judge who had warrant of law to award it; just as the district Court of Appeals would have been if the cause had been before it. The act of the court in making the transfer was only ministerial, and was done through its clerk. There was no de-

1013 cision of the question here, "upon which the case turned in the court to which it was transferred, and upon which it was finally disposed of. No such question was raised here, and could not have been, because this court had no jurisdiction of the case. If the amount in controversy had been not less than $500, exclusive of costs, that question might have been raised in this court, and it would have been within its appellate jurisdiction to decide it, and it would have been its duty to do so. In like manner the case being before the Circuit court as an appellate court, the question was properly before it, and it was its duty to decide it. Just as it would have devolved upon this court to have decided it, if it had had jurisdiction of the case, did it devolve on the Circuit court to decide it. And in deciding it that court did not exceed its authority, but kept strictly within the limits of its jurisdiction. And I am of opinion, that this court cannot, without encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the Circuit court, command it to reverse its decision of that question, and to try the cause on its merits. I am of opinion therefore that a peremptory mandamus should not be awarded, and that the rule should be discharged.

INDEX.

ACCESSORIES.

1. An accessory after the fact of a felony, is a person who knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon.

Wren's case, 952

2. To constitute an accessory after the fact, three things are requisite: 1. The felony must have been completed. 2. He must know that the felon is guilty. 3. He must receive, relieve, comfort or assist the felon.

Idem, 952

3. It is necessary that the accessory have notice, express or implied, at the time he assists or comforts the felon, that he had committed a felony. And the mere fact that one receives a felon in the same county in which he has been attained is not sufficient to raise the presumption of knowledge. And the question of knowledge is a question for the jury.

Idem, 952

4. Any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his apprehension, trial or punishment, is sufficient to make a man accessory after the fact; as that he concealed him in the house, or shut the door against his pursuers until he should have an opportunity to escape; or took money from him to allow him to escape; or supplied him with money, a horse or other necessities, in order to enable him to escape; or that the principal was in prison, and the jailer was bribed to let him escape, or conveyed to him instruments to enable him to break prison and escape.

Idem, 952

5. Merely suffering the principal to escape will not make the party accessory after the fact; for it amounts at most to a mere omission. Or if he agree for money not to prosecute the felon; or if knowing of a felony he fails to make it known to the proper authorities; none of these acts are sufficient to make the party an accessory after the fact. If the thing done amounts to no more than the compounding a felony or the misprison of it, the doer of it will not be an accessory.

Idem, 952

6. The true test whether one is accessory after the fact, is to consider whether what he did was done by way of personal help to his principal, with a view of enabling his principal to elude punishment; the kind of help rendered appearing unimportant.

Idem, 952

ACCOUNTS.

1. The accounts of an executor settled and returned by a commissioner, and confirmed by the court, is to be looked to as showing in what character the executor held the assets of the estate.

Smith & als. v. Gregory, 248

ACTIONS.

1. In cases of warranty of soundness or quality, see Warranty, No. 1, 2, 3, and

Huff & al. v. Broyles & al., 283

2. An administrator of an accommodation endorser of a negotiable note protested for non-payment, taking up the note after the death of his intestate, may maintain either assumpsit or debt in his own name against the maker of the note, for the amount in value he has paid for the note.

Burton v. Slaughter, 914

AGENTS.

1. For a thorough and exhaustive investigation of the power of a state, and its limitations, to tax the agencies of the United States Government, see the opinion of Staples J. in

1016 **Western Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond*, 1

2. See Corporations, No. 1, 2, and
Idem, 1

3. M was president of the O. D. bank, located in the city of Alexandria, and he was a member of the firm of B & Co. of that city. In May 1861 M went to Richmond, where he remained during the war; and B & Co. removed to the same city. In January 1863, M collected of the treasurer of the state the interest on state bonds held by the bank; of course in Confederate money. After the war the O. D. bank may maintain an action of assumpsit against M for the money so collected by him.

McVeigh v. The Bank of the Old Dominion, 188

4. M invests the money so collected by him in a call certificate of the Confederate States, to have it ready to be applied to the uses of the bank, and he holds the certificates until such certificates are called in by the government. He then receives the money for it, and tries to lend it out, but fails; and he then deposits it in bank to the credit of B & Co., who are to pay interest upon it, and return it on call. In 1864 B & Co. invest this money, with their own, in tobacco, M intending it to be at his own risk; he holding himself bound to pay the bank as on an investment at six per cent. The tobacco is burned during the war. This was an appropriation of the money by M to himself, and he is responsible to the bank for the value of the Confederate notes at the time they were appropriated by him.

Idem, 188

5. M is to be charged with interest only from the end of the war.

Idem, 188

6. What statements of agents of railroad companies are not evidence against the company. See Railroad Companies, No. 4, and

Va. & Tenn. R. R. Co. v. Sayers, 328

AMENDMENTS.

1. For amendments of pleadings in equity, see Practice in Chancery, No. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and Belton v. Apperson & als., 207

APPEALS.

1. The § 3, of the act of March 15, 1857, which amended § 3, of ch. 182, of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of time for presenting a petition of appeal from or a writ of error or supersedeas to, any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend section 26, of that chapter, which allows five years for perfecting the appeal, by giving bond, &c. And therefore, when a petition for an appeal was presented within two years from the date of the decree, it might be perfected in any time within five years from that date. But see now Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17.

2. If an appeal has been allowed, and the case decided by the appellate court, without objection by the appellee that the appeal was not presented in time, the objection cannot be made afterwards in the court below, or in the appellate court when the cause is brought up a second time, Idem, 36

3. E files his bill against the administratrix of C, to obtain possession and sale of property conveyed by C in trust to secure a debt to E of $1000. E charges that there is still due to him $640. The answer denies that there is any debt due from C to E. The property was not worth $500. As the existence of the debt is involved in the decision of the case, the Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of the case upon appeal by E.

Eacho v. Cosby, 112

4. In this case the enquiry before the commissioner being as to the execution and delivery of the note spoken of in the deed, and the commissioner reporting that there was no satisfactory evidence of the delivery, and the court having dismissed the bill; the decree will be reversed and the cause sent back for an enquiry whether C was indebted to E in a debt intended to be secured by the deed. Idem, 112

5. When the appellate court will amend and affirm a decree with costs to the appellee, see Practice in Chancery, No. 3, and

Mott v. Carter's adm'or, 127

6. When an objection for failure to bring one of the parties before the court in an action of debt, will be held in the appellate court to have been waived. See Practice at Common Law, No. 4, and

Bush v. Campbell, 403

1017 *7. In 1866 F files bill against H, to subject lands to a mechanics lien, and obtains a decree. Before the decree is made H sells and conveys the land to S. S may prosecute an appeal from the decree in the name of H.

Hendricks, by Stuart, v. Fields, 447

8. A petition for an appeal from an interlocutory decree is not barred by the limitation prescribed by the Code, ch. 178, § 3, p. 1136. Idem, 447

9. A judgment is rendered on the 13th of May 1872, and one of the parties obtains an award of a supersedeas to the judgment on the 9th of November 1872, but the supersedeas bond is not given until the 15th of April 1875; though counsel had marked his name on the docket as counsel for the appellee. The bond not having been given within the time prescribed by the statute, the appeal must be dismissed; and the counsel marking his name on the docket, though it may be a waiver of the process, is not a waiver of the bond. Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17, p. 1140.

Otterback v. Alex. & Fred. Railway Co., 940

APPEALS—SPECIAL COURT OF.

1. The act of February 28, 1872, to provide a special court of appeals, acts of 1871-72, ch. 124, p. 98, which creates a Special Court of Appeals to consist of three judges of the Circuit courts, is constitutional, and the decisions of the court are valid and binding on the parties in the causes decided.

Bolling v. Lersner, 36

2. All cases pending on the docket of the Supreme Court of Appeals, not involving a constitutional question, and not decided in the court below by one of the judges of the Special Court of Appeals, are proper cases to be sent to the Special Court of Appeals for decision; and it is for the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals, under the constitution and the statute, to select the cases to be sent to the said special court.

Idem, 36

3. The Special Court of Appeals having decided a case regularly sent to that court, and having reversed the decree of the court below, and sent the cause back for further proceedings, there can afterwards be no complaint of error in the decree of the special court or in the proceedings before that decree.

APPELLATE COURT.

1. Where an exception is not taken to a commissioner's report, on a question which might be affected by extrinsic evidence, and the question is not made in the court below, the appellate court will not consider it.

Peters v. Neville's trustee & als., 549

2. After an appeal has been allowed in a cause, by consent of parties a decree is made, modifying, in one respect, the decree appealed from. The appellate court may amend the decree appealed from in that respect, and affirm it. Idem, 549

3. A decree directing a receiver to pay certain sums to parties, which should bear interest from a certain day, will be amended, and so amended will be affirmed. Idem, 549

4. An instruction which in part is not based upon any evidence before the jury is erroneous, and is ground for reversing the judgment.

Rea's adm'x v. Trotter & Bro., 585

5. When an appellate court is of opinion that an instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous, the appellate court cannot undertake to determine, that the verdict, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction, is right upon the evidence, and therefore to affirm it. But the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Idem, 585

6. When the appellate court will not reverse a personal decree against an executrix, upon an objection first made in that court. See Executors and Administrators, No. 5, and Shands' ex'x v. Grove & als., 652

7. When upon reversing a decree the cause will be sent back, though the plaintiff had failed to make out his case in the court below. See Separate Estate, No. 7, and

Darnall & wife v. Smith's adm'r & als., 878

8. The jury having found a prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, and the court of trial having refused to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, the appellate court, even if they had some doubt about the sufficiency of the evidence to convict the prisoner of murder in the first degree, would not reverse the judgment.

Howell's case, 995

ARSON.

1. The 3d section of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, creates no offence. It declares nothing necessary to be noticed in pleading, either in the indictment or elsewhere. It is a mere incident to § 1 and 2 of the said chapter, and a mere limitation of the word "dwelling house" therein mentioned.

Page's case, 943

2. A count in an indictment, which charges that the prisoner at night did burn "a certain other house called a barn and stable of one R, there situate, the same being an outhouse not adjoining the dwelling house, nor under the same roof, but some persons usually lodging therein at night, to wit," &c., does not set out an offence for which the punishment is death. Idem, 943

3. On such a count the prisoner having been found guilty, and sentenced to be hung, the appellate court will reverse the judgment. But as the count does charge the burning of a barn and stable, which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary under § 5 of said chapter, the additional description of the barn in the count may be rejected as surplusage, and he will be remanded to be tried for the offence under the 5th section.

4. To make an outhouse a dwelling house, not under the same roof, parcel thereof within the meaning of § 1, of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, two things must appear: 1st, that such outhouse is within the curtilage of the dwelling house, and occupied therewith; and 2d, that some person usually lodges therein at night. Idem, 943

5. "A dwelling house," in the meaning of § 1, of ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, embraces all its parcels, including such an outhouse as parcel thereof. The burning of such an outhouse is the burning of a dwelling house, in the meaning of this law, and may be so described in the indictment; and proof of the burning of the outhouse will as much sustain the indictment, as would proof of the burning of the principal part of the dwelling house, or the whole of it including all the parcels.

Idem, 943

ASSIGNOR AND ASSIGNEE.

1. See Liens No. 3, and Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

2. See Separate Estate, No. 7, and Darnall & wife v. Smith's adm'r & als., 878

ATTACHMENTS.

1. In an attachment suit by F against M, there is no service of process on M, or order of publication; but there is a declaration in assumpsit with a special and general count; and counsel appears for him and pleads, and the cause is tried by a jury and a judgment for F. The record affords at least prima facie evidence, that the counsel was authorized to appear for M, and defend the action.

Fisher & Bro. v. March, 765

2. In a foreign attachment in chancery, the affidavit required by the statute may be made by the agent of the plaintiff, and it may be made after the suit is brought.

Idem, 765

3. If in such affidavit the affiant swears that the matters and things set forth in the bill are true, he adopts the bill as a part of the affidavit. Idem, 765

CARRIERS.

1. How far they may restrict their liabilities by contract. See Railroad Companies, No. 2, 3, and

CONFEDERATE CONTRACTS.

1. A Confederate contract for the sale and purchase of land in May 1863, upon a credit of one, two and three years, in which it was held, that the value of the land at the time of the contract was the most just measure of recovery; and one-third of the purchase money having been paid, the vendor must pay two thirds of the value of the land at the time of the sale, with interest.

Mott v. Carter's adm'r, 127

2. When and how a person acting as agent of a foreign party during the war, is to be charged with money of the principal collected by him. See Agents, No. 3, 4, 5, and

McVeigh v. The Bank of the Old Dominion, 188

1019 *3. In April 1862 P, at the request of A, paid to the bank, a note for an ante-war debt of A, which had been protested for non-payment, paying the bank the nominal amount with Confederate money, and A gave P his note for the amount with interest, payable in one year. The debt of A to P is a Confederate debt, and is to be scaled as of the date of the note, and not as of the date of its maturity.

Ashby's adm'r & als. v. Porter & als., 455

4. A sale of land by executors in October 1862, held, upon the time of sale, the surrounding circumstances and the evidence, to have been made with reference to Confederate treasury notes as the standard of value, and therefore that the purchase money was to be scaled as of the date of the sale.

Moore & als. v. Harnsberger's ex'ors, 667

5. An offer by a purchaser to one of the executors, a short time after it fell due, to pay the first bond due for the purchase money, he not showing any money, was not a good tender. Idem, 667

6. In April 1862 F lends to D $7,000, and takes his bond payable in six years in current money of Virginia payable semi-annually. For the loan D receives the checks of F on a bank which is then paying Confederate money. Nothing is said, either before or at the time of the loan, as to the kind of money in which the bond is to be paid, except what is stated in the bond. D pays the interest in Confederate money up to 1864. In September of that year he offers to pay the interest, but F refuses to receive the money. In December 1865, 1866, 1868 and February 1869, D made payments on the bond. HELD:

1. This is a Confederate contract, and is to be scaled as of the date of the contract. Fultz v. Davis, 903

2. In ascertaining the amount still due F on the bond, the value of the bond in gold at its date is first to be ascertained, then interest is to be charged upon the amount so ascertained, up to the time of the first payment, and the premium on the gold is then to be added to it, and the payments deducted at their nominal amount, from the amount so ascertained. Idem, 903

CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.

1. A bequest in favor of an attorney who writes the will is not necessarily invalid.

Riddell & als. v. Johnson's ex'r & als., 152

2. A case in which a large bequest to the attorney who wrote the will was held to be valid. Idem, 162

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAW.

1. The ordinance of the city of Richmond laying a license tax on telegraph companies doing business in the city, is constitutional. See Richmond No. 1, and

Western Union Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond, 1

2. The act of February 28, 1872, Acts of 1871-'72, ch. 124, § 9, which creates a Special Court of Appeals to consist of three judges of the circuit courts, is constitutional.

Bolling v. Lersner, 36

3. The ordinance of the Virginia convention passed June 24th, 1861, which provides that in cases specified the parties to negotiable notes, bills and checks, payable in such cities and towns (as before specified) shall remain bound after the maturity of such notes, &c., without demand, protest or notice, as if the requirements of the law in that behalf had been complied with, is, as to notes made and discounted before its passage, in violation of that provision of the constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts."

Farmers Bank of Va. v. Gunnell's adm'x, 131

4. The City council of Norfolk has authority, under the charter of the city and the constitution of Virginia, to assess the expense, or a part of the expense, of paving a street upon the owners of the property on the street, in the ratio of the front foot of their lots facing the street.

Norfolk City v. Ellis, 224

CONTRACTS.

1. During the year 1861 slavery was recognized as existing, both by the United States and Missouri, and slaves owed no allegiance to either; and there could be no demand for their services by the United States or the state, which would occasion a failure in part of the consideration of the notes given for their hire.

Booker v. Kirkpatrick, 145

2. T stores goods with R, and nothing is said as to the compensation which R is to receive for their storage. The law implies a contract that R shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, unless there be something in the relation of the parties, or the circumstances of the case which precludes the idea of such compensation; in which case there would be an implied agreement or understanding that no compensation was to be paid.

Rea's adm'x v. Trotter & Bro., 585

3. In assumpsit by T, a resident of Staunton, against R to recover the value of certain manufactured tobacco which T had stored with R in Winchester in July 1864, and which R had sold for Confederate money. If the tobacco was deposited by T with R, who received the same into his warehouse on storage, for a compensation to be paid to him by T, and agreed in consideration thereof to keep the same in store on account of T, and subject to his order, until T should demand the same, and then deliver it to T's order; and if R failed to keep the tobacco and deliver it up, he thereby became liable to pay to T the damages sustained by such breach of the contract; though R, before demand by T, sold the tobacco of T as well as his own, because of his apprehension that the Union forces were about to occupy said town, and would search his house and seize said tobacco; and said forces did after their occupation search R's house for tobacco.

Idem, 585

4. See Usury No. 1, and Coffman & Bruffy v. Miller & Co., 698

CONVEYANCES—FRAUDULENT.

1. A deed of trust to secure bona fide creditors, which conveys land, horses, cattle, &c., farming implements, household and kitchen furniture, growing grain and vegetables, the grantor to retain possession three years, by paying interest on the debts secured, is not fraudulent per se, though made without the knowledge of the creditors secured.

Sipe v. Earman & als., 563

2. Nor does the execution of the deed pending a suit against the grantor, by a creditor not secured by it, and a short time before the term at which it was probable judgment would be rendered against him, render the deed fraudulent. Idem, 563

3. Nor does a provision in the deed authorizing a sale of the property within three years at the instance of the grantor, render the deed fraudulent. Idem, 563

4. If there was a fraudulent intent in the grantor in making the deed, (of which there is no evidence in this case), as the deed is not fraudulent on its face, and the trustee and the creditors secured by it had no knowledge of its execution until it was done, they cannot be affected by such fraudulent intent; and the deed is valid. Idem, 563

5. D recovered a judgment against R in July 1868. In March 1871 R executed a deed of homestead, which embraced all his personal property; and on the 10th of August 1871 he conveyed the property to P, in trust for his wife and children. Held:

1. The declaration of homestead by R, having been made after D recovered his judgment, was null and void as to D's judgment.

Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

2. The deed of R to P, being not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law, and having been made after the judgment, was null and void as to D's judgment.

Idem, 705

3. Under § 2, ch. 179, of the Code of 1860. D, without having sued out execution at law, might impeach by a suit in equity the deed of homestead and the deed of trust.

Idem, 705

6. M and H, with others, were the sureties of J as sheriff, who, in 1865, was dead and insolvent. In January 1866 B recovered a judgment against H as surety for J, and in April 1866 B recovered a like judgment against M. M was an old man, not able to provide for himself, and there were several judgments against him. In March 1866 he conveyed to his nephew T, all his real estate, worth about $2,100, in consideration of $50 he owed T, and that T would provide for him during his life; T not knowing of the judgment against H, or that M was a surety of J. T paid off the judgments against M to the amount of $687.60, and paid for the support of M, after the deed and before March 1869, about $1,300. In March 1869 H files his bill against M and T, to set aside the deed on the ground of fraud; and T answers and denies fraud in himself, or any knowledge of a fraudulent intent on the part of M. Held:

1. Equity would vacate the deed and hold the land liable to the creditors of M if they interposed in due time in asserting their claims.

Henderson v. Hunton, 926

2. But the creditors of M having failed to assert their demands against the property until T had made considerable advances for the support of M, in performance of his contract, the deed is a valid security to the extent of these advances. Idem, 926

3. A conveyance on such a consideration is not to be regarded in law as merely voluntary; and the courts will not pronounce the consideration inadequate, unless it is manifest that the services to be rendered and the expense to be incurred are grossly disproportioned to the value of the property. Idem, 926

4. Such agreements are treated as founded on a valuable consideration; and consequently they are only fraudulent, so far as the grantee is concerned, when mala fides is justly attributable to him: he must be cognizant of the fraudulent intent of the grantor, if there was such intent.

5. When there is actual fraud, both parties participating, a deed is utterly void ab initio, and is not permitted to stand as security for any purpose. The fraud infects the whole transaction. Idem, 926

6. When the deed is merely constructively fraudulent, or when it appears that the grantee has acted bona fide, and did not participate in the fraud, the deed is permitted to stand as a security for what is justly due to the grantee, or for advances made by him subsequent to its execution. Idem, 926

7. A bona fide deed, in consideration of future support, though voidable at the suit of creditors, is not void. The legal title vests in the grantee by operation of the deed, good against all the world, except creditors; subject to be divested by them if they impeach it in due time. But the title remains in the grantee until the deed is vacated; and when vacated, it is not void ab initio, but only from the time of the decree. Idem, 926

8. The amount paid by T is so nearly the value of the property that the bill of H should be dismissed. Idem, 926

CORPORATIONS.

1. Corporations are to be deemed and taken as persons, when the circumstances in which they are placed are identical with those of natural persons expressly included in the statute.

Western Union Telegraph Co. v. City of Richmond, 1

2. Corporations which derive their existence, and exercise their franchises, under authority of State laws, but are employed by the national government for certain duties and services, whilst congress may exempt them from any state taxation which will really prevent or impede such services, yet in the absence of legislation by congress to indicate that exemption is deemed essential to the performance of governmental services, it cannot be claimed on the mere ground that the corporation is employed as an agency of the government. And the tax may be either upon the property or business of the corporation. Idem, 1

3. The cases recognize a distinction between taxation of the property belonging to a private corporation employed by the government, and taxation of the instrumentalities or means of the government in the possession of such corporations. The state may tax a banking institution; but it cannot tax the currency or the government bonds belonging to such bank. It may tax the railroad, but not the mail, or munitions or other property of the government. It may tax the contractor with the government though not the contracts. Idem, 1

4. A corporation, except when it is otherwise provided in its charter, expressly or by clear implication, in the use of its property, the exercise of its powers and the transaction of its business, stands upon the same footing as individuals, and is subject to the same control under the police powers of the state or a municipal corporation.

*COURTS.

1. The former County courts being courts of general jurisdiction had authority to remove and appoint a trustee for a married woman and her children. And the court having made such an order on the request of the married woman, with the assent of the trustee given in court, the order is valid, though made without either bill or petition.

Shelton v. Jones' adm'x & als., 891

2. If the children, not having been parties to the proceeding, might have had it set aside, they having acquiesced in it for a long period, the parties to the bond given by the appointed trustee cannot avoid the order on that ground. Idem, 891

3. The County court being a court of general jurisdiction, the validity of its order in the removal and appointment of a trustee cannot be questioned in any collateral proceeding. Idem, 891

4. The acts of the clerk done in presence of the court, and under its supervision, must be taken to be done by the direction of the court; and is the act of the court.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND PROCEEDINGS.

1. An indictment for felony contains three counts, and on the trial of the prisoner he is found guilty on the third count. He is entitled to a judgment of acquittal on the first and second counts. Page's case, 943

2. On a count in an indictment for burning a barn and stable, being an outhouse not adjoining the dwelling house, nor under the same roof, but some persons usually lodging therein at night, viz., &c., the prisoner is found guilty and sentenced to be hung. The appellate court will reverse the judgment; but as the count does charge the burning of a barn and stable, which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, under §5 of the ch. 188, of the Code of 1873, the additional description of the barn in the count may be rejected as surplusage, and he will be remanded to be tried for the offence under that 5th section. Idem, 943

DYING DECLARATIONS.

1. J receives wounds in a fight with S on the 8th of January, and on that night he expects to die very soon, and makes certain statements in relation to the fight. He lives until the 18th, encouraged by his physician, to entertain some hope of recovery, and probably having some hope. On the trial of S for the murder of J, the statements of J on the 8th of January are competent evidence as his dying declarations. Swisher's case, 963

EQUITABLE DEFENCES.

A & J, partners, give two notes to R. They both die, A being the survivor. At the death of A both notes are barred by the statute of limitations. After the death of A, R knowing that the notes were barred by the statute, fraudulently, or under a mistake of the law, represents to B, his administratrix, that said notes are unpaid, and are valid and in full force in law against the estates of A & J, and proposes, that if B will give her bond to R for one-half the amount of the notes, R will settle the other half with J's representative, who is R's daughter; and thereupon B trusting to these representations, executes her bond to R for the amount of one-half of the notes. Held:

1. If this was a misrepresentation of the law, still it is a case in which equity will relieve B; and the defence may be made at law by plea under the statute setting out the facts.

Brown v. Rice's adm'r, 467

2. But it was in truth a misrepresentation of a fact; and the facts set out in a plea is a good defence to an action on the bond by R's adm'r against B.

Idem, 467

EQUITABLE JURISDICTION AND RELIEF.

1. W is sued by R, in debt on the note of B & Co. He employs counsel to defend the suit, and states to him that he never was the partner of B & Co., or in any way liable for the debt. He lives in the county, but pays no further attention to the case. At the next term of the court the counsel examines the docket, and though he sees a case of R against B & Co., he does not suspect that that is the case against W, and therefore does not examine the papers; and no plea being entered the office judgment is confirmed. Equity will not relieve W.

Wallace v. Richmond, assignee, 67

2. In the progress of a suit a part of the property involved is sold under a decree by consent, and the proceeds deposited in bank to the credit of the cause, and by like consent the rest of the property is decreed to the defendant upon her giving bond with security to pay $300, upon a decision in favor of the plaintiff. If the case was not one of which equity had jurisdiction originally, yet the court having taken jurisdiction, and taken possession of the property and disposed of it, must proceed to decide the case.

Eacho v. Cosby, 112

3. See Equitable Defences, No. 1, and Brown v. Rice's adm'r, 467

4. A judgment creditor files a bill to set aside the deed of trust to secure certain creditors for fraud, and for general relief. Though the deed is held to be valid, the plaintiff is entitled to the surplus after paying the debts secured; and the bill should not be dismissed, but under the prayer for general relief he is entitled to an account of the debts secured by the deed, and to have a sale of the property.

Sipe v. Earman & als., 563

5. M and D as his surety, execute a bond to G, upon a settlement of an account for articles furnished by G to M. After the articles were furnished by G to M, but before the execution of the bond, M conveys his property in trust for his wife and children, subject to his then existing debts. The debt of M to G for the articles furnished, was a subsisting debt at the date of the deed; and in equity this debt was not merged in the bond, but the trust property is liable for it. And G having recovered a judgment on the bond, and execution being levied on D's property; and there being a suit in the same court by R's adm'r against M and others and G, to ascertain M's indebtedness at the date of the deed, and adjust the accounts between M's trust estate and G, who is largely indebted to said estate for rents; a bill by 1024 D stating the facts, and asking for *an injunction to a sale under the execution makes a good case for relief.

Meade v. Grigsby's adm'rs, 612

6. A court of equity will correct a mistake, clearly proved by parol evidence, in an agreement for the sale and purchase of real estate; and this, whether the contest is between the vendor and purchaser, or the vendor and creditors of the purchaser.

EQUITIES.

1. C contracts with M for the purchase of land, and pays a small part of the purchase money; but he does not have his contract recorded. The land is sold under a deed of trust given by M, and purchased by J, who is a creditor of M; and without notice of C's contract, J obtains from M an assignment of the balance of the purchase money after satisfying the debt secured by the deed of trust, in payment of M's debt to him. J's right to the surplus of the trust fund in the hands of the trustee, is superior to that of C, to be reimbursed for the purchase money he had paid M.

EVIDENCE.

1. The statements of agents of a railroad company, as to the condition of the brakes on the cars, or as to the condition of the road at the place where an accident occurred, said statements having been made some time before, and some time after the accident, and at some miles from the place, are not a part of the res gesta, and are not competent evidence for the plaintiff in a suit against the company to prove negligence in the company.

Va. & Tenn. R. R. Co. v. Sayers, 328

2. In an action of assumpsit by T against R to recover the value of goods stored by T with R, the receipt of R for the goods is competent evidence for T, and an account of the sales of the goods copied from the books of R with his assent and in his presence, and acknowledged by him to be correct, is competent evidence for T, as original and not secondary evidence.

Rea's adm'r v. Trotter & Bro., 585

3. In an attachment suit by F against M, there is no service of process on M, or order of publication; but there is a declaration in assumpsit with a special and general count; and counsel appears for him and pleads; and the cause is tried by a jury and a judgment for F. The record affords at least prima facie evidence that the counsel was authorized to appear for M, and defend the action.

EXCEPTIONS—BILL OF.

1. If no notice is given of an intention to except to a ruling of the court made upon the trial of a cause, until the jury come into court with their verdict, it is too late to except.

Peery's adm'r v. Peery, 320

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. J, executor of G, settles his accounts in 1860, and is found indebted to his testator's estate. He then qualifies as guardian of the legatee of the testator, and closes on his books his executorial account, and opens a guardian's account; and transfers the balance due from him as executor to his debit as guardian. At this time he has no property of his testator's estate in his hands. He afterwards in 1863, lays his account before a commissioner, and requests him to settle it as an account as guardian; but the commissioner settles it as an executorial account; and it is returned to the court as such. HELD:

1. The executor could not transfer his indebtedness as executor to himself as guardian, so as to exonerate his sureties as executor from liability to the legatee for the amount.

Smith & als. v. Gregory, 208

1025 *2. The account returned by the commissioner, is to be looked to as showing in what character J held the assets of the estate. Idem, 208

2. In 1866 J has a suit brought by his ward, by her next friend, against him, as executor and guardian, for the settlement of his accounts, and a commissioner reports the executorial account up to January 1863, and then opens a guardian's account from that day, and transfers the balance due from J as executor to him as guardian; and the report is confirmed by the court. The ward having had no agency in bringing or conducting the suit, and the sureties of the guardian not having been parties, neither the ward nor the sureties are bound by it. Idem, 208

3. M by his will gives his executor discretion to sell his whole real and personal estate. He lends it to his wife for the support of herself and his daughter L, until the daughter attains lawful age or marries; and then says: Should my wife not marry, I wish when L comes of age or marries, one-half of my estate to go to my wife for life and the other half to L absolutely; and at the death of my wife the other half. He appoints J his executor. The executor pays the debts, and sells the whole estate at public auction, nearly all of which is bought by the widow; and he takes her bond for the amount. He afterwards settles his accounts and is charged with the amount of the sales, and then settles with the widow and takes her receipt for the amount of her purchases. L marries, and she and her husband sue J and claim one-half the amount reported against him at once, and security for the other half to be paid on the death of the widow. HELD:

1. The will does not create a trust of the estate in the executor. And when he had paid the debts he properly turned over the remainder of the property to the widow; and her receipt was a discharge to him. His taking her bond did not affect his responsibility. Mason v. Jones & wife, 271

2. Having properly turned over the property to the widow, who was the life tenant, his office was fully discharged, and he is not liable to L, who took in remainder. Idem, 271

4. H recovers a judgment against W and P. Afterwards W and H die, and K qualifies as the executor of W and administrator of H. As administrator of H, K sues out a scire facias to revive the judgment against P, the surviving obligor, and P appears and files a general plea of payment, without stating the nature of the payment. He proves that H, in his lifetime, assigned the judgment to D, who was a debtor of T, who was a debtor of W; and that under an agreement between D and T that T would take in payment of his debt, any debt on W which K would take in payment of T's debt to W, D obtained this judgment from H, and assigned it to K, who credited it on T's debt to W. There was a verdict for the defendant, and on motion for a new trial, HELD:

1. The evidence should have been excluded from the jury, the defendant's plea not describing the payment so as to give plaintiff notice of its nature, as required by the statute, Code of 1860, ch. 172, § 4.
Peery's adm'r v. Peery, 320

2. K having taken the assignment to himself, and credited the amount upon the debt due from T to W, he made himself liable to his testator's estate for the amount; but having taken the assignment to himself, he was the owner of the judgment, and might as administrator of H maintain the scire facias to revive the judgment at law.
Idem, 320

3. The arrangement does not constitute a payment of the judgment at law, though it may constitute grounds of equities between W and P.
Idem, 320

5. G brings a creditor's suit against the executrix of S, to subject the estate of S to satisfy a judgment. The order of the court was destroyed, but some of the papers were preserved; and it was proved by a witness that G recovered a judgment against the R T. Co. and issued an execution upon it; and then, at the instance of S, sued out a suggestion against him as a debtor of the Co., and that S appeared in court and acknowledged his indebtedness to the Co., and judgment was rendered against him. The proceedings in both cases to the judgments are endorsed on the papers preserved. An account taken in the cause showed the executrix indebted to the estate for considerably more than the claim of the plaintiff, beside large assets in her hands; and an inquiry ordered as 1026 *to the debts of S was not acted on, no other creditor making claim. HELD:

1. G is entitled to recover his debt from the estate of S.
Shands' ex'x v. Grove & al., 652

2. The proceeding being against the estate of S as the debtor of G, the Co. was not a necessary party.
Idem, 652

3. No other creditor having presented a claim, and the executrix not having insisted upon an enquiry, a personal decree against her will not be reversed for the want of such enquiry, upon the objection first made in the appellate court.
Idem, 652

6. The personal representative of an accommodation endorser of a negotiable note protested for non-payment, can only acquire the note, whether by purchase or payment, in his fiduciary character.
Burton v. Slaughter, 914

7. The personal representative of the accommodation endorser of a negotiable note protested for non-payment, cannot in any event, either by purchase or payment, acquire larger rights than his testator or intestate would have had, had he paid the note in his lifetime and after protest.
Idem, 914

8. An administrator of an accommodation endorser of a negotiable note protested for non-payment, taking up the note after the death of his intestate, may maintain either -assumpsit or debt in his own name against the maker of the note, for the amount in value he has paid on the note.

Idem, 914

FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

1. During the year 1861 slavery was recognized as existing, both by the United States and Missouri, and slaves owed no allegiance to either; and there could be no demand for their services by the United States or the state, which would occasion a failure in part of the consideration of the notes given for the hire of slaves.
Booker v. Kirkpatrick, 145

FIXTURES.

1. The true rule in determining what are fixtures in a manufacturing establishment, where the land and building is owned by the manufacturer, is—That where the machinery is permanent in its character, and essential to the purposes for which the building is occupied, it must be regarded as realty, and passes with the building; and that whatever is essential to the purposes for which the building is used will be considered as a fixture, although the connection between them be such that it may be severed without physical or lasting injury to either.
Green v. Phillips & als., 752

FRAUD AND MISTAKE.

1. What misrepresentation whether of law or of fact, will be relieved in equity, and may be set up as an equitable defence in an action at law. See Equitable Defences, No. 1, and
Brown v. Price's adm'r, 467

2. A court of equity will correct a mistake, clearly proved by parol evidence, in an agreement for the sale and purchase of real estate; and this, whether the contest is between the vendor and purchaser, or the vendor and creditors of the purchaser.
Mauzy v. Sellars & als., 641

3. When court of equity will correct mutual mistakes. See Vendor & Purchaser, No. 4, and
Hoback v. Kilgores, 442

4. See Conveyances—Fraudulent, No. 6, and
Henderson v. Hunton & als., 926

GRAND JURIES.

1. On the 18th of September 1874, S, judge of the Corporation court of W, issued his order in vacation to the clerk of the court, directing that a grand jury of ten citizens, &c., be summoned to attend the court on the 21st of September. Upon this order the clerk issued his warrant to the sergeant to summon certain grand jurors, naming them. Of the list furnished the sergeant nine attended the court. At the September term of the court an order was entered as follows: This day came a grand jury, to wit: naming six of those who had been summoned by the sergeant; who being elected, &c. HELD:

1. It is not a valid objection to this grand jury that the list of the jurors was not made out and delivered to the sergeant five days before the term.

Mesmer's case, 976

2. The statute does not require the order of the judge to be entered of record.

And when it appears by the record
1027 *that six were elected, &c., it must be presumed that all this was done by direction of the court. Idem, 976

3. The acts of the clerk done in the presence of the court and under its supervision, must be taken to be done by direction of the court; and is the act of the court.

Idem, 976

4. All the statute requires is, that the number of grand jurors may be limited to six by the direction of the court. It does not require that the direction shall be matter of record. Idem, 976

5. Nor is it a valid objection to the grand jury, that it was composed of six of the nine summoned by order of the court in vacation. Idem, 976

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

1. About 1849 M executed his bond to E for a debt he owed him, without security. E died in 1852, and A qualified as his administrator, and as guardian of his children. On the 1st of January 1853 M, and K as his surety, executed to A, guardian of the legatees of E, a paper intended to be a bond, payable on demand, for $936.63, for the debt of M to E. A settled his accounts as guardian, charging himself with this bond. He died in 1867 or 1868, when the bond went into the hands of his administrators, one of whom offered it to the wards; but they declined to receive it; when he brought suit upon it against M and K, recovered judgment in December 1869, which was unproductive. From the date of the bond to the end of the war M and K were in independent circumstances. At the end of the war M was very much injured, but still owned valuable land. K was injured by the war, but he was able to pay his debts until 1869, when his land was greatly injured by a flood. HELD: The estate of A is liable to the wards for the debt.

Ergenbright & als. v. Ammon's adm'r & als., 490

2. A guardian of infants may maintain a suit for partition of real estate held jointly by the infants and other adult parties.

Zirkle v. McCue & als., 517

3. See Partition, & Judicial Sales No. 3, and Idem, 517

4. Land of infants is sold in 1859, upon credits extending to January 1862. Their guardian collected a part of the money in May 1862, and he invested it in March 1863, $3,500 in seven per cent. Confederate bonds, which were found after his death enclosed in a paper endorsed Wolfe's heirs; but the bonds were taken in his own name. HELD:

1. There is no sufficient evidence that the investment when made, was intended for his wards.

Ammon's adm'r v. Wolfe & al., 621

2. The debt due to the wards being a good ante-war debt well secured, he was not authorized to collect in Confederate money, and he could not be authorized under the statute so to invest it. Idem, 621

HOMESTEADS.

1. D recovered a judgment against R in July 1868. In March 1871 R executed a deed of homestead, which embraced all his personal property; and on the 10th of August 1871 he conveyed the property to P, in trust for his wife and children. HELD:

1. The declaration of homestead by R, having been made after D recovered his judgment, was null and void as to D's debt.

Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

2. The deed of R to P, being upon a consideration not deemed valuable in law, and having been made after the judgment, was null and void as to D's debt.

Idem, 705

3. Under § 2, ch. 179, of the Code of 1860, D, without having sued out execution at law, might impeach by a suit in equity the deed of homestead and the deed of trust.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. In November 1855 S made a deed by which he conveyed in fee to his wife E, his entire real estate lying in the county of P, his then residence, of about 700 acres; and seven days afterwards acknowledged the deed in the clerk's office of the county. At that time he owed no debts, and had personal property, including slaves, amounting to ten or twelve thousand dollars. He afterwards in the course of business, contracted debts; and losing his slaves by the results of the war, his personal property was not 1028 sufficient *to pay his debts. His wife died in 1864, leaving children. HELD:

1. The conveyance, though void at law, is valid in equity; and vests in the wife both the legal and equitable title to the land, as of her separate estate, in which the husband, the wife being dead, is not entitled to curtesy.

Sayers & als. v. Wall & als., 354

2. Upon the death of the wife, her heirs were entitled to the immediate possession of the land. Idem, 354

3. There being no charge or proof of fraud by S in making the deed, the subsequent creditors of S have no equity against E and her children, to entitle them to subject the land to the payment of the debts of S subsequently contracted. Idem, 354

4. Though the conveyance is not founded on a valuable, but only on a meritorious consideration, in favor of a wife and children, a court of equity will give effect to it against subsequent creditors of S.

2. A bill having been filed by the creditors of S to subject the land to the payment of their debts, without alluding to the deed from S to his wife, her children present their petition to the court setting out the deed, and ask that they may be made defendants in the suit, that they may defend their rights under it; and they are permitted, without objection by the plaintiffs, to file their answers. Held:

1. If they were not necessary parties, they were certainly proper parties; and having been permitted to appear and set up their claim, the plaintiffs cannot afterwards object that they were made parties.

Idem, 354

2. If it would have been more proper to assert their rights by a cross-bill, their petition may be treated as such.

Idem, 354

3. Quære. If a wife is competent to contract with her husband on an agreement for their separation.

Switzer v. Switzer, 574

4. A contract between a husband and wife, on an agreement for separation, if the wife is competent to make such a contract, cannot be sustained in any case in which it does not clearly appear, that in the negotiation which preceded the agreement, as well as at the time of executing it, the wife was in a position in which she could act and did act, not only with perfect freedom, but with a full knowledge and appreciation of the circumstances of her situation, and of her individual and marital rights; and the contract in itself must be fair and just, wholly free from exception, and such as a court of equity might have imposed upon the parties in a case in which their persons and their property had properly fallen under its jurisdiction and control.

Idem, 574

5. The statute prescribing the mode by which the interests of femes covert in real estate may be divested, applies to conveyances executed by the husband and wife to third persons, and not to deeds executed by the wife to the husband, or for his benefit. It is the union of the husband and wife as grantors that makes the instrument operative. A deed therefore by husband and wife of the wife's land to a trustee for the husband, can derive no validity from the privy examination of the wife.

Idem, 574

6. If a wife may contract with her husband on an agreement of separation, in this case the deed is invalid, on the ground of the disability of coverture, for the want of freedom of the will in the wife in executing it, as well as the inadequacy of the consideration.

Idem, 574

7. The deed being invalid as to the husband, is invalid as to the children. The disability, the constraint operating on the wife, and the inadequacy of the consideration, necessarily extend to them.

Idem, 574

8. As to wife's separate estate and her power over it. See Separate Estate, No. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and

INDICTMENTS.

1. "A dwelling-house," in the meaning of § 1 of ch. 188 of the Code of 1873, embraces all its parcels, including an outhouse within the curtilage of the dwelling-house, in which some persons lodge at night. The burning of such an outhouse is the burning of a dwelling-house, *in the meaning of the law, and may be so described in the indictment. Page's case, 943

INFANTS.

1. For sales of infants' lands in suits for partition, see Partition, passim, and

Frazier v. Frazier & als., 500

Zirkle v. McCue & als., 517

2. A guardian of infants may maintain a suit for partition of real estate held jointly by the infants and other adult parties.

Idem, 517

3. It is well settled in Virginia that an infant, as a general rule, is as much bound by a decree against him as a person of full age. He is not permitted to impeach such decree, except upon the same grounds as a person of full age may impeach it—such as fraud, collusion or error. Idem, 517

4. But in suits for partition, whenever the court sells and conveys an infant's inheritance, he is entitled to an opportunity of making a defence at any time within six months after he arrives at full age.

Co. v. Sheets & Co., 854

2. But when it does not so appear that the policy was filed with the declaration, yet if the parties proceed in the case without its being called for by the defendant, and it is obvious that the defendant knew what it was, without calling for it, the objection that it was not filed with the declaration cannot be taken for the first time, in the appellate court, though there was a demurrer to the declaration. Idem, 854

3. S & Co. have a policy of insurance against fire on buildings in a company of which R is president. The buildings are burned; and two days after the fire S writes to R describing the fire, and stating the loss, and then referring to what it will be necessary to be done by the company, and expressing himself as wishing to comply with the rules and regulations of the company. Upon the receipt of this letter by R the company proceed to act upon it. The letter having been intended by S as the notice required by the policy, and the company having acted upon it as such, the fact that it was not signed by S & Co., or addressed to R as president of the company, or to the company, as required by the rules, will be considered as waived; and the letter is competent evidence of notice. Idem, 854

4. If the evidence shows that the preliminary proofs, required by a policy of insurance, have been waived by the company, the insured is entitled to recover, though no such proofs were in fact taken. Idem, 854

5. When an insurance company is informed of a fire by the insured, and the company not saying anything about the preliminary proofs proceed to enquire whether the insurance is valid upon a specific ground independent of these proofs, and decide that upon this specific ground the insurance is not valid; this is a waiver of all objection to the insufficiency of these proofs. Idem, 854

6. By the constitution of a Mutual Assurance Company, no person who has claimed a homestead exemption shall be a member of the company. One of the members of the firm of S & Co. has claimed his homestead; and S & Co. sign the constitution and take out a policy on their partnership property. The fact that one of the partners has claimed his homestead does not impair the validity of the policy issued to the partnership. Idem, 854

7. If a policy of insurance does not require that the insured shall give in the liens or incumbrances on the property insured, or state what is his title to it, and no questions are asked of the insured by the insurers, the policy is not avoided by the failure of the insured, without any fraudulent intent, to mention a lien upon it. Idem, 854

8. If there be a warranty, or a representation which amounts to warranty, that there are no incumbrances on the property insured, whether such warranty or representation be given in answer to a question or not, if it be untrue the policy is void, even though the insured was not guilty of actual fraud. Idem, 854

9. In a declaration on a policy of insurance framed under the statute, plaintiffs say they have performed on their part all the conditions of the policy, and have violated none of its prohibitions. Under this declaration they may prove a waiver of performance of the conditions of the policy by the insurer; and this will be equivalent to proof of the performance of such conditions. Idem, 854

INTEREST.

1. When proper to charge interest on estimated rents. See Vendor and Purchaser, No. 2, and

Bolling v. Lersner, 36

2. A person acting as agent for a foreign party during the war, is to be charged with interest upon money collected by him, only from the end of the war.

McVeigh v. The Bank of the Old Dominion, 185

3. When interest on a debt due by trustee disallowed by the court below, not reversed on appeal. See Trusts and Trustees, No. 8, and

Kirby v. Goodykoontz & als., 298

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT COMPANIES.

1. See Railroad Companies, passim.

2. When commissioners are appointed by a County or Corporation court under § 6, ch. 56, of the Code of 1860, for the purpose of ascertaining what will be a just compensation to the tenant of the freehold for land taken for a work of internal improvement, it is the duty of such commissioners to hear all the legal and relevant testimony offered by either party, bearing upon the question of such compensation.

Wash. Cin. & St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Switzer, 661

3. The refusal of the commissioners to hear such testimony, when offered in due time, is of itself sufficient to vacate their report. Idem, 661

4. When such a report is returned to the court either party may show cause against its confirmation, upon the ground of excessive or inadequate compensation, improper conduct of the commissioners in refusing or failing to hear legal and proper evidence, or by proof of any other fact tending to show that said report ought not to be confirmed. Idem, 661

5. Under the statute all matters affecting the validity of the report and the action of the commissioners are open for investigation without notice. Idem, 661

6. On the motion of the company, a rule is made on the tenant of the freehold, to show cause why the report and assessment of the commissioners, made in such a case, should not be set aside, upon the ground that said assessment is excessive; and why other commissioners should not make said assessment. Upon the hearing the company will not be confined to the specific objection therein suggested to the confirmation of the report; but the company may impeach it by showing that the commissioners had improperly refused or failed to hear legal testimony offered by the company upon the question of compensation and damage. Idem, 661

7. If a tenant may be surprised by the offer of testimony on matters not referred to in the rule, it is competent for the court to continue the hearing to a future day or term. Idem, 661

JUDGMENTS.

1. When equity will not relieve against a judgment. See Equitable Jurisdiction and Relief, No. 1, and

Wallace v. Richmond, assignee, 67

2. The act of March 2, 1866, Sess. Acts 1865-'66, p. 191, ch. 77, § 1, "to preserve and extend the time for the exercise of certain civil rights and remedies," is retrospective in its operation, and applies in favor of a judgment creditor as to the docketing of his judgment.

Hill & als. v. Rixey & Starke and als., 72

3. The act of March 2, 1866, Sess. Acts 1865-'66, ch. 69, p. 180, called the stay law, does not apply to a judgment creditor *to relieve him from the necessity of docketing his judgment.

Idem, 72

4. R recovers a judgment against G in 1860, but it is not docketed until December 1868. W and others recover judgments against G in 1861 and 1865, which were docketed in November and December 1865 and in 1866. In November 1865 G conveys land in trust to secure other creditors; but it is not recorded until November 1867. HELD:

1. The deed having been recorded before the judgment of R was docketed, the lien of the deed has priority over the judgment of R.

Idem, 72

2. The judgments of W and others having been docketed before the deed was recorded, they have priority over the deed.

Idem, 72

5. When under the statute, Code of 1849, ch. 177, § 19, in suits on contracts judgment may be rendered for some and against others, and at different times. See Practice at Common Law, No. 5, 6, and

Bush v. Campbell, 403

6. Deed of homestead on personal property, and deed conveying this property in trust for wife and children, are void as to a judgment recovered before their execution; and under § 2, ch. 179 of the Code of 1860, the judgment creditor, without having sued out execution at law, may impeach them by a suit in equity.

Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

7. What is not a satisfaction of the judgment. See

Idem, 705

8. For equities between the vendor of land and judgment creditors of the purchaser, see Vendor and Purchaser, No. 11, and

Coffman v. Niswander & als., 737

9. F recovers judgment against M, on which execution is issued, but is stayed by order of plaintiffs' attorney. It appears, however, that some shares of stock were sold by the officer to satisfy the judgment; but there is no return of such sale by the officer. It appearing further, that the stocks did not sell for enough to discharge the judgment, F may have another execution, or bring another action for the balance still due.

Fisher & Bro. v. March, 765

10. In a suit by attachment, if the plaintiff recovers judgment against the defendant, without his appearance, such judgment will have no effect in another State, as a personal judgment against the debtor. But if the defendant appears and defends himself in person or by attorney, then the judgment will have the same force and effect everywhere, as a judgment recovered in an ordinary suit.

Idem, 765

11. In such a case the record may show upon its face that the debtor did or did not appear; and if it does, the judgment will have effect accordingly. If the record does not show whether he did or did not appear, the presumption is in favor of the validity of the judgment.

Idem, 765

12. But in such a case, if the record does not state that the debtor did or did not appear, or even if it states that he did appear, in a suit upon this judgment in another state, the defendant may by his pleading and evidence aver and prove the contrary.

Idem, 765

13. In a suit in equity to enforce a judgment, the questions whether it was an illegal contract on which the judgment was recovered, or whether the agent who made the contract was authorized to make it, are concluded by the judgment.

Idem, 765

14. Where the bill sets out a judgment correctly, as stated in the record of the judgment, there is no variance because a scire facias issued against garnishees, recites it as of a different amount, or that the endorsement on the papers by the clerk, of the proceedings in the cause, of the date of the judgment, is different from that stated in the bill.

Idem, 765

JUDICIAL SALES.

1. See Partition, No. 1, and Frazier v. Frazier & als., 500

2. See Partition, No. 3, 4, 5, 6, and Zirkle v. McCue & als., 517

3. The errors for which a judicial sale of an infant's land may be set aside must be substantial errors. A fair purchaser is not bound to go through all the proceedings, and to look into all the circumstances, and see that the decree is right in all its parts. He has the right to presume the court has taken the necessary steps to investigate the rights of the parties, and upon such investigation has properly decreed a sale. He will not be affected by any imperfection in the frame of the bill, if it contain sufficient matter

1032 to show the *propriety of the decree. The priority of the sale must be tested, and its validity determined by the circumstances then existing, and the surrounding circumstances. The only matter for enquiry is, Did the court have jurisdiction of the matter? Were the proper parties before it? Were the proceedings regular? Was the sale proper under all the circumstances then surrounding the parties? If so, the title of an innocent purchaser is not to be disturbed because, from subsequent events, the sale has proved unfortunate for the infants.

4. Bonds well secured, are given by purchasers at a judicial sale made in 1860, and they fall due in 1861, 1862 and 1863. In 1860 P is appointed a receiver to collect the purchase money; and he collects that due in 1862 and 1863, in Confederate money, and makes no report to the court; but retains it in his own hands. He was not authorized or justified in receiving Confederate money, and it is not to be scaled.

Peters v. Neville's trustees & als., 549

5. M buys land at a judicial sale in 1859, and gives his bonds payable annually down to 1863. He pays all but the last bond, and pays on that $2,000 in Confederate money; and a few days afterwards offers to pay the balance to the commissioner in Confederate money, who refuses to receive it. M then files his petition in the cause, stating that he owes this balance, and that the commissioner refused to receive it; that he is ready to pay it, and that he may be authorized to pay it, and that a commissioner may be directed to convey the land to him. The court decrees that M be authorized to pay to the general receiver the balance due, stating the amount, and upon its payment a commissioner named should convey the land to M. Held:

1. The decree being a proper decree upon its face, it could not have been altered on appeal.

Myers v. Nelson & als., 729

2. The decree did not authorize M to pay in Confederate money, and a payment to the receiver in that money was not a discharge of M's debt. Idem, 729

6. W is appointed a commissioner to sell land at public auction, but he is not to act under the decree until he gives bond, &c., faithfully to perform this and any future decrees made in the cause. He does not execute the bond, but he sells the land at private sale to H, which he reports to the court. The court confirms the sale, and directs W to collect the money and invest it, and H pays him the whole purchase money; only a part of which he invests; and dies insolvent. Held:

1. The sale having been made by a commissioner under a decree of the court, and that sale having been confirmed by the court, it is a judicial sale.

Hess & als. v. Rader & wife & als., 746

2. Whether made at public or private sale, it only becomes a sale at all, when confirmed by the court; that constitutes such sale a judicial sale. Idem, 746

3. W not having given the bond as required, had no authority to receive the purchase money; and H is responsible to the party who is entitled to the proceeds, for so much as has not been properly invested by W, and cannot be made out of W's estate. Idem, 746

4. The statute, Code of 1873, ch. 174, § 1, is imperative, that a bond shall be given, and it is the duty of a purchaser at a judicial sale to see that the bond has been given before he pays his money to the commissioner, or he does it at his own risk.

Idem, 746

7. When a decree is made for the sale of real estate for the payment of a debt secured by a deed of trust upon said real estate, the decree must be for the sale of the property upon the terms of the deed: and it is error to decree a sale upon credits not authorized by the deed. Fultz v. Davis, 903

LEGACIES AND LEGATEES.

1. A bequest in favor of an attorney who writes the will is not necessarily invalid.

Riddell & als. v. Johnson's ex'r & als., 152

2. A case in which a large bequest to the attorney who wrote the will was held to be valid. Idem, 152

3. In the absence of fraud on the part of a legatee, a court of equity will not enforce a parol charge upon his legacy.

Sprinkle & als. v. Hayworth & als., 384

*LIENS.

1. For priorities of liens by judgments and deed of trust, see Judgments, No. 4, and Hill & als. v. Rixey & Starke & als., 72

2. For priority of a deed of trust over judgments. See Trusts & Trustees, No. 5, and Blackford & als., trustees, v. Hurst & als., 203

3. In April 1868 R conveys land with general warranty to C: this deed is not recorded, though the deed of trust to secure the purchase money is. R assigns three of C's bonds to W, B and J—J being the last assignee. In July 1868 D recovers a judgment against R. In 1871 R executes a deed of homestead on all his personal property, and afterwards conveys it in trust for his wife and children. In May 1873 C is declared a bankrupt, his land is sold under the order of the court, and the priorities of his creditors fixed, D being the first, and J the last; but the fund is retained; and in April 1874 it being suggested that there was personal property of R which might be subjected to pay D's judgment, sufficient for the purpose, it was decreed that no part of the proceeds of C's land should be applied to pay it. In January 1874 J having purchased D's judgment, he files a bill against R, the trustee, &c., to set aside the deeds of homestead and trust, and subject this property to satisfy this judgment. Held:

1. The deeds are null and void as to the judgment, and under the statute, Code of 1860, ch. 179, § 2, without suing out executions at law, D may impeach the deeds by suit in equity.

Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

2. The decree of the bankrupt court of April 1874 was a final decree, and obligatory on all other courts; and it was a proper decree, as the judgment of D was a debt of R, and not of C, and R's property should be first applied to its payment.

Idem, 705

3. C's land being only liable to satisfy D's judgment because of his failure to have his deed recorded, if he had paid that judgment, or if it had been paid out of the proceeds of his land, he would have been substituted to all the rights and remedies of D against R; and he would also have had a remedy against R upon the warranty in R's deed. Idem, 705

4. J being the assignee of R of one of the bonds given for the purchase money of the land, and thus a creditor of C, and having a lien on the land to secure the bond, he has all the equities of C against R, and also an equity against R as assignor of the bond. Idem, 705

5. As holder of the bond J had but one fund upon which he could rely for payment, whilst D has two funds for the satisfaction of his judgment, the land of C and the personal property embraced in the deeds of homestead and trust. And a court of equity will marshal the assets, and compel D to exhaust the fund upon which J has no claim, that J may have the only fund within his reach. Idem, 705

6. Dis the only person who can complain of being required to resort to R's personal estate in relief of the land fund; and that, only on showing that such a course would operate to his prejudice. And if D did show this, J might satisfy his judgment and stand in his place. In this case he has done better by taking an assignment of the judgment. Idem, 705

7. Clothed with the rights and remedies of D, J may properly proceed against the property of R, to satisfy R's debts, and against the land of C, to satisfy the debt chargeable upon it. Idem, 705

LIMITATIONS—STATUTES OF.

1. The § 3, of the act of March 15, 1867, which amended § 3, of ch. 182, of the Code of 1860, changing the limitation of time for presenting a petition for an appeal from or writ of error or supersedeas to any final decree or judgment, from five to two years after it was made or rendered, did not amend § 26, of that chapter, which allows five years for perfecting the appeal, by giving bond, &c. But see now Code of 1873, ch. 178, § 17.

MARSHALING ASSETS.

1. See Liens, No. 3, and Russell v. Randolph & als., 705

*MECHANIC'S LIEN.

1. On the 1st of March 1866 F contracts with H, to build H a house on land in the country. At this time the only mechanic's lien was that provided for in the Code of 1860, p. 567, ch. 119, § 2, which provided for such liens only where the land on which the building was erected or repaired, was situate in a city or town; and that not being the fact in this case, F is not entitled to a mechanic's lien under that law, for the money due him for erecting the building.

Hendricks, by Stuart, v. Fields, 447

2. Though said § 2, of ch. 119, was amended by the act of April 13th, 1867, Sess. Acts 1866-'67, p. 805, ch. 36, and by that amendment gave a lien on land situate in a city or town or in the country, yet that act operates prospectively only, and not retrospectively also; and therefore does not give a mechanics' lien to F for the money due him on his contract made in March 1866. Idem, 447
